The Rev. STEPHEN P. HILL, the Chaplain of the Senate during the third session of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, opened the session with an impressive prayer.

ABSENCE OF THE VICE PRESIDENT.

The SECRETARY. The Vice President being absent, I will, with the permission of the Senate, read a letter which he has addressed to me on the subject of his absence:

LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY, November 28, 1857.

DEAR SIR: It will be impossible for me to be in attendance during the first week of the approaching Congress, and I beg of you to communicate the fact to the Senate in the mode customary upon such occasions.

Yours, very respectfully,

JOHN C. BRECKINRIDGE.

ASBURY DICKINS, Esq.,

Secretary of the Senate, Washington City, D. C.

NEW SENATORS.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. Secretary, I offer a resolution:

Resolved, That the oath prescribed by the Constitution be administered to the new Senators by the Hon. JESSE D. BRIGHT, the oldest member of the Senate present.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. BIGGS presented the credentials of Hon. ANDREW JOHNSON, chosen by the Legislature of Tennessee a Senator from that State for the term of six years, commencing March 4, 1857.

The credentials were read; and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. JOHNSON by Mr. BRIGHT, he took his seat in the Senate.

Mr. HALE presented the credentials of Hon. DANIEL CLARK, chosen by the Legislature of New Hampshire a Senator from that State, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Hon. James Bell, for the term ending on the 3d of March, 1861, which were read; and, the affirmation prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. CLARK, he took his seat in the Senate.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. ALLEN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, [The Vice President being absent.] That the Senate proceed to choose, by ballot, a President of the Senate pro tempore.

The SECRETARY. Senators will please prepare their ballots.

The ballots being counted, resulted as follows: Whole number of votes cast, 48; necessary to a choice, 25; of which—

Mr. Fitzpatrick received.....	23
Mr. Hamlin.....	19
Mr. Seward.....	1

The SECRETARY. Mr. FITZPATRICK, having received a majority of the whole number of votes given, is elected President of the Senate pro tempore.

Mr. FITZPATRICK, having been conducted to the chair by Messrs. ALLEN and JONES, said: GENTLEMEN OF THE SENATE: I acknowledge with feelings of lively sensibility the confidence you have reposed in me. The situation is new to me, and it could doubtless have been more appropriately assigned to a more experienced and older member of the body. You may rest assured, however, that I shall, to the extent of my ability, impartially and faithfully discharge the duties incident to the station, relying at all times upon the uniform courtesy and forbearance which have characterized the deliberations of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, it was Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that, in the absence of the Vice President, the Senate has chosen the Hon. BENJAMIN FITZPATRICK President of the Senate pro tempore.

On motion of Mr. BRIGHT, it was Ordered, That the Secretary wait on the President of the United States and inform him that, in the absence of the Vice President, the Senate has chosen the Hon. BENJAMIN FITZPATRICK President of the Senate pro tempore.

ORGANIZATION.

On motion of Mr. BRIGHT, it was Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate has assembled, and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

HOUR OF MEETING.

On motion of Mr. HALE, it was Ordered, That the daily hour of meeting of the Senate be twelve o'clock, m., until otherwise ordered.

CHAPLAIN TO THE SENATE.

Mr. MASON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate be authorized and requested to invite such clergymen as the office may be acceptable to, to officiate as Chaplain to the Senate during the present session, and in such alternation as may be agreeable to them.

This resolution will be printed of course. I wish it to lie on the table for the consideration of Senators, with an intimation that I shall call it up at an early day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over for consideration.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by J. B. HENRY, Esq., his Private Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message is of an executive character.

On motion of Mr. GWIN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened.

On motion of Mr. SEWARD, the Senate took a recess for half an hour; at the expiration of which time the President pro tempore resumed the chair.

Mr. STUART. It is very obvious that the other House will not organize in time to enable us to appoint a committee to wait on the President and hear from him to-day; and, therefore, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 7, 1857.

The House consists of two hundred and thirty-four Members and seven Territorial Delegates. The Delegates have no vote. Democrats (128) in Roman, Republicans (92) in Italic, and Native Americans (14) in Small Capitals; as follows:

At twelve o'clock, m., Hon. WILLIAM CULLOM, Clerk of the House of Representatives for the Thirty-Fourth Congress, called the House to order, and said:

The time fixed by the Constitution of the United States for the assembling of Congress having arrived, the Clerk will proceed to call the roll of members elect to the Thirty-Fifth Congress, made out from the prima facie evidence before him; and he respectfully requests that each member, as his name is called, will indicate his presence by an audible response.

The roll was called; and two hundred and twenty-four gentlemen answered to their names.

The following members failed to appear:

Messrs. ARNOLD, of Connecticut; KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania; DAVIS, of Maryland; TRIPPE, of Georgia; MARSHALL, of Kentucky; FARNSWORTH, of Illinois; WOODSON and CARUTHERS, of Missouri; HAWKINS, of Florida; and BRYAN, of Texas.

Pending the call of the roll—

Mr. PHELPS stated that his colleague, Mr. CARUTHERS, was detained by severe illness from attendance on the House.

ELECTION OF SPEAKER.

Mr. PHELPS. I move that the House do now proceed to the election of a Speaker for the Thirty-Fifth Congress by a viva voce vote.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I nominate for Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Thirty-Fifth Congress of the United States, JAMES L. ORR, a Representative from the State of South Carolina.

Mr. BANKS. I nominate as a candidate for the office of Speaker, GALUSHA A. GROW, a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I nominate HENRY WINTER DAVIS, a Representative from the State of Maryland, as a candidate for the office of Speaker of this House.

The CLERK appointed the following members as tellers to superintend the election of Speaker: Messrs. JONES of Tennessee, BANKS, MORRIS of Pennsylvania, and CLINGMAN.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I withdraw the name of HENRY WINTER DAVIS.

No further nominations being made, the House proceeded to vote viva voce for Speaker, with the following result: Whole number of votes cast, 225; necessary to a choice, 113; of which—

James L. Orr received.....	128

For James B. Ricard—Messrs. J. Morrison Harris and Zollicofer.

For Humphrey Marshall—Mr. Ricard.

For Francis P. Blair, jr—Mr. Grow.

For Valentine B. Horton—Mr. Campbell.

The CLERK then announced that JAMES L. ORR, a Representative from the State of South Carolina, having received a majority of all the votes cast, was duly elected Speaker of the House for the Thirty-Fifth Congress.

The SPEAKER elect, having been conducted to the chair by Messrs. STEPHENS and BANKS, a committee appointed by the Clerk for that purpose, addressed the House as follows:

GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES: I thank you for the honor you have conferred in selecting me to preside over your deliberations.

The delicate and responsible duties of the Chair will be comparatively light if I shall be so fortunate as to secure, as doubtless I shall, your co-operation in maintaining the dignity and preserving the decorum of this body. The rules you may adopt to regulate your proceedings I shall seek most earnestly to administer firmly, faithfully, and impartially.

The great interests confided to our charge by the people of this Confederacy admonish us to cultivate a patriotism as expansive as the Republic itself.

I cherish the ardent hope that our public duties here may be discharged in such manner as to uphold the Constitution, preserve the union of these States, quicken their prosperity, and build up the greatness and glory of our common country.

Mr. GIDDINGS, the oldest member of the House, then administered to the Speaker the oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

SWEARING IN OF MEMBERS.

The members were then called by States, and, approaching the Chair, were severally qualified by taking the usual oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

MESSAGE TO THE SENATE.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform that body that a quorum of the House of Representatives has assembled; that JAMES L. ORR, one of the Representatives of the State of South Carolina, has been chosen Speaker; and that the House is now ready to proceed to business; and that the Clerk do go with the said message.

RULES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. CLINGMAN offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the rules of the last House of Representatives be adopted as the rules of this House until otherwise ordered, with an amendment as follows, viz: that there be added to the 23d rule the following words: "Provided, That whenever any committee shall have occupied the morning hour on two days, it shall not be in order for such committee to report further until the other committees shall have been called in their turn."

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois.* I call for the reading of the 23d rule, that we may see what it is.

Mr. CLINGMAN. While the Clerk is looking for it, I will take the opportunity of saying this, so that gentlemen who are not conversant with the rules may see the object of my proposition: By the existing rule a committee is called in the morning hour. If it does not get through its business that day it is entitled to be called a second day, and a third, and so on; it is entitled to the floor until it voluntarily resigns it. The consequence is, that, at the long session of 1852, one of the committees—the Committee on Public Lands, of which I believe the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] has been some time a member—got the floor and held it during the whole of the long session, and during the whole of the next short session; and no other committee got an opportunity to report, in order, during that Congress. At the next Congress, in 1854, that same committee attempted the same thing. They held the floor for two or three months, till finally we succeeded in laying on the table several of their bills, and then they abandoned it. At the last Congress the same committee got the floor, at an early stage of the long session, and held it throughout the whole of that session and throughout the whole of the short session. Any other committees that accidentally got in their reports, only succeeded in doing so by the courtesy of the Committee on Public Lands.

If my proposition be adopted, the result will be that, if a committee be called to-day, and do not get through with their reports, they can continue them to-morrow; but after that they must give way, and allow other committees to report in their turn. By this means every committee of the House will have an opportunity of reporting once or twice in each month, instead of having the business blocked up in the way it has been. I hope the resolution will be adopted. I call the previous question.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask the gentleman from North Carolina to withdraw the call for the previous question, that I may offer a suggestion with a view of having his proposition modified.

Mr. CLINGMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would suggest to the gentleman to append to his resolution, instead of the proviso he proposes, a proviso raising a special committee to revise the rules, with power to report whenever they get ready to do so—

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will hear the gentleman's suggestion with great pleasure, but I would remind the gentleman that we had such a committee raised, but they never reported.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a point of order. I object now, in the beginning of the session, to gentlemen farming out the floor in this way.

Mr. CLINGMAN. There are no rules which the gentleman can call me to order for violating. I was about to say that we have had a committee on rules at every Congress of which I have been a member, and that that committee has never altered the rules. The gentleman himself, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] at the last Congress, or the Congress before, had such a committee raised on his own motion, and that committee never reported. I made many appeals to it to come forward and report; but it never did so, and the rules have not been amended.

I have no doubt that we could get a committee on rules, and that that committee would, as its predecessors did, give some attention to the subject; but it would either not report, or the House would not act.

I desire to get this amendment adopted at this time, for unless it is done now, a single objection will defeat the motion throughout the whole Congress. I hope, therefore, that gentlemen will be content to take this amendment at this time; and then, if there be a motion made to give us a committee on rules, I will support that likewise. I now move the previous question.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman from North Carolina allow me to suggest an amendment to his proviso?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will, if I do not lose the floor by it.

Mr. HOUSTON. My suggestion is this: the proviso which the gentleman proposes—

Mr. SEWARD. If there are no rules, I should like to know how the gentleman can put the previous question on his resolution.

The SPEAKER. We are acting under general parliamentary law.

Mr. SEWARD. That is what I understand.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The previous question is in order under parliamentary law.

Mr. HOUSTON. The amendment I would suggest is this, and the gentleman will see the force of it at once. It is to omit his proviso, and instead thereof, insert a proviso that all bills reported by the committees of the House shall be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, or to the Committee of the Whole House, unless the rules be suspended.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I have thought of that; but it sometimes happens that committees report bills and matters of such importance that they ought to be acted on at once. My proposition will answer every purpose, while the other would produce embarrassment.

Mr. HOUSTON. Two thirds can always suspend the rules.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Yes; but the motion to suspend the rules is in order only on Mondays. I move the previous question.

Mr. HOUSTON. Let us vote down the previous question.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. STANTON called for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

The yeas and nays were not ordered; only six members voting in favor thereof.

The main question was then ordered; and, under the operation thereof, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. CLINGMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. FLORENCE offered the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed on the part of the House, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses of Congress has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

Messrs. FLORENCE, QUITMAN, and CAMPBELL were appointed such committee on the part of the House.

ELECTION OF CLERK.

Mr. STEPHENS. I move that the House now proceed to vote for Clerk viva voce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I nominate for Clerk of the House of Representatives, James C. Allen, of the State of Illinois.

Mr. STANTON. I nominate for Clerk of the House of Representatives, B. Gratz Brown, of St. Louis, Missouri.

The SPEAKER appointed Messrs. JONES of Tennessee, STANTON, BENNETT, and RUFFIN tellers to count the votes for Clerk.

The House then proceeded to vote viva voce for Clerk, with the following result: Whole number of votes cast, 219; necessary to a choice, 110; of which—

James C. Allen received.....	128
B. Gratz Brown.....	85
William Cullom.....	4
J. M. Sullivan.....	2

JAMES C. ALLEN having received a majority of all the votes cast, was declared duly elected Clerk of the House.

The following is the vote in detail:

For James C. Allen—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoock, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Burnett, Burns, Caskey, Chapman, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hickman, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, Leitcher, Maclay, McKibbin, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miles, Miller, Milson, Montgomery, Moore, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Orr, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Whitley, Winslow, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright.

For B. Gratz Brown—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Banks, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Darnell, Davis of Iowa, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Dowdell, Durfee, Fenton, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leech, Leiter, Lovejoy, Matteson, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Fottle, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Wade, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburne, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood.

For William Cullom—Messrs. Campbell, Ezra Clark, Gilmer, and Maynard.

For J. M. Sullivan—Messrs. Edie and Purviance.

Mr. ALLEN then presented himself at the Speaker's desk, and was duly qualified by taking the oath of office.

ELECTION OF SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. In order to facilitate business, I submit the following resolution, to which I presume there will be no objection:

Resolved, That Adam J. Glossbrenner be, and he is hereby, appointed Sergeant-at-Arms for the House of Representatives of the Thirty-Fifth Congress.

It is in order, Mr. Speaker, under the 67th rule.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object to the resolution, and trust that the ordinary course in such cases will be pursued.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I withdraw the resolution.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the House proceed to the election of a Sergeant-at-Arms of the House, for the present Congress.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I nominate Adam J. Glossbrenner, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALDRON. I nominate Charles B. Babcock, of Michigan.

The House then proceeded to vote viva voce for Sergeant-at-Arms, with the following result: Whole number of votes, 213; necessary to a choice, 107; of which—

Adam J. Glossbrenner received.....	133
Charles B. Babcock.....	80

The following is the vote in detail:

For Adam J. Glossbrenner—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoock, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Burnett, Burns, Caskey, Chapman, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Enstis, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilmer, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hickman, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, Leitcher, Maclay, McKibbin, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Milson, Montgomery, Moore, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ricard, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Underwood, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Whitley, Winslow, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, Zollieoffer, and Mr. Speaker.

For Charles B. Babcock—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Banks, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Dremell, Davis of Iowa, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Fenton, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leech, Leiter, Lovejoy, Matteson, Morgan, Morrill, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Roberts, Royce, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Wade, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburne, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood.

ADAM J. GLOSSBRENNER having received a majority of the votes cast, was declared duly elected as Sergeant-at-Arms of the House for the Thirty-Fifth Congress; and was accordingly sworn in.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., its Secretary, notifying the House that a quorum of that body had assembled, and were ready to proceed to business; also that it had, in the absence of the Vice President, elected Hon. BENJAMIN FITZPATRICK, of Alabama, President pro tempore.

MEMBER SWORN IN.

GEORGE S. HAWKINS, Representative from the State of Florida, appeared, and qualified by taking the oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

BINDING OF THE ESTIMATES.

MR. HOUSTON. The estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury have been printed, and are ready to be laid on the desks of members. I desire to move that before they are so disposed of, the Clerk be directed to have one copy bound for each member. I submit that motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no information to the effect that the estimates have been delivered.

MR. HOUSTON. They have not been laid upon our desks yet; but they are in print. I have a copy myself. I propose, for the convenience of members, that before they are laid upon our desks, one copy for each member shall be bound.

The motion was agreed to.

ELECTION OF DOORKEEPER.

MR. FAULKNER. I move that the House do now proceed to the election for Doorkeeper of the House for the Thirty-Fifth Congress by a viva voce vote.

The motion was agreed to.

MR. JONES, of Tennessee. I nominate for that office Robert B. Hackney, of Virginia.

MR. FAULKNER. If there be no opposition to Mr. Hackney's election, I move that he be declared Doorkeeper.

MR. MORGAN. I shall have no objection to the motion of the gentleman from Virginia if he will make a very slight modification in it—a change of a word only. If the gentleman will substitute the name of Mr. Darling for that of Mr. Hackney, I shall be perfectly satisfied. [Laughter.]

MR. FAULKNER. If the gentleman wishes to nominate any one, I will not press the motion.

MR. MORGAN. I nominate Nathan Darling, of New York.

The SPEAKER appointed the following named gentlemen as tellers to count the votes: Messrs. FAULKNER, COX, MORGAN, and GROW.

The House then proceeded to vote viva voce for Doorkeeper, with the following result: Whole number of votes cast, 206; necessary to a choice, 104; of which—

Nathan Darling.....78

R. B. HACKNEY having received a majority of all the votes cast, was declared duly elected Doorkeeper of the House for the Thirty-Fifth Congress, and appeared and took the oath of office.

The following is the vote in detail:

For R. B. Hackney.—Messrs. Admin, Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocock, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Burnett, Burns, Caskey, Chapman, Horace P. Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dewar, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garrett, Cartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Hoyer, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Clancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, Maclay, McKibbin, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Millson, Montgomery, Moore, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Reagan, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Warren, Watkins, White, Whitely, Winslow, Wortendyke, Ward, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Mr. Speaker.

For Mr. Darling.—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Banks, Bennett, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Dremell, Davis of Iowa, Davis of Massachusetts, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Fenton, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kilgore, Knapp, Leech, Leiter, Lovejoy, Matteson, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, John Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Wade, Waldron, Walton, Elihu B. Washburne, Wilson, and Wood.

APPOINTMENT OF POSTMASTER.

MR. STEPHENS. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That Michael W. Cluskey be, and is hereby, appointed Postmaster to the House of Representatives for the Thirty-Fifth Congress.

My object in offering the resolution is to save time. I want to get through the organization of the House, and then to adjourn.

The question was put; and the resolution was agreed to.

The Speaker administered the oath of office to Mr. Cluskey.

MR. STEPHENS. I now move that the House adjourn till to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

MR. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to suggest, before that motion is put, the propriety of adopting a resolution that twelve o'clock be the hour of meeting of the House daily till it be otherwise ordered. The rules do not specify any hour of meeting.

MR. STEPHENS. The motion I made was to adjourn till to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

MR. WARREN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Georgia to withdraw his motion till we draw for seats.

MR. STEPHENS declined to withdraw his motion.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon, at thirty-five minutes past three o'clock, p. m., the House adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 8, 1857.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Hon. DAVID S. REID, of North Carolina, appeared in his seat to-day.

ORGANIZATION OF CONGRESS.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. JAMES C. ALLEN, its Clerk:

MR. PRESIDENT: I am directed, by the House of Representatives, to inform the Senate that a quorum of the House has assembled, that JAMES L. ORR, one of the Representatives from the State of South Carolina, has been chosen Speaker, and that the House is ready to proceed to business.

The House of Representatives has passed an order for the appointment of a committee, on its part, to join such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make, and has appointed Messrs. FLORENCE of Pennsylvania, QUITMAN of Mississippi, and LEWIS D. CAMPBELL of Ohio, the committee on its part.

MR. BRIGHT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of three members be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

On motion of Mr. BRIGHT, it was Ordered, That the committee be appointed by the President pro tempore.

Messrs. BRIGHT, BIGLER, and COLLAMER, were appointed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

MR. PEARCE. I have been requested to ask leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers relating to the claim of Carlisle and Coxe, administrators of C. P. Van Ness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inquire whether there has been an adverse report in that case.

MR. PEARCE. The papers are asked to be withdrawn for the purpose of reference to the Court of Claims. I do not know whether there has been an adverse report or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rule, if there has been an adverse report in the case, some explanation must be made, or some additional testimony presented, before the papers can be withdrawn.

MR. PEARCE. I do not know whether that rule relates to the withdrawal of papers for the purpose of presentation to the Court of Claims. I am aware of such a rule where the purpose is to have them re-referred to a committee of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is inclined to think the establishment of the Court of Claims varies the rule to that extent. The Chair will regard the sense of the Senate as in favor of withdrawing the papers, unless objected to.

There being no objection, the papers were withdrawn.

On motion of Mr. SEWARD, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw the documents in relation to the claims of Charles Reeder, Walter R. Johnson, and the legal representatives of Thomas P. Jones.

On motion of Mr. BELL, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw the memorial and papers of Nathan Towson and others, members of "Towson's artillery," in the war of 1812.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, it was Ordered, That Mary Petery, widow of Peter Petery, have leave to withdraw her petition and papers.

COAST SURVEY.

MR. EVANS presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Charleston, South Carolina, in favor of the vigorous prosecution of the coast survey; which were laid upon the table until the standing committees shall have been appointed.

BINDING OF A REPORT.

MR. HALE. Estimates of the appropriations required for the next fiscal year have been laid upon the tables of Senators. The book will be frequently required for use, and it is not now in a condition to be used. I therefore move that the Secretary of the Senate be directed to procure one copy of it to be bound for each member of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

MR. CLAY gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce the following bills:

A bill to detach the port of Selma, Alabama, from the collection district of New Orleans, and attach it to the collection district of Mobile, Alabama.

A bill repealing all laws or parts of laws allowing bounties to vessels employed in the bank or other cod fisheries.

MR. REID gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill making an appropriation for the removal of obstructions at the mouth of Cape Fear river, near Wilmington, North Carolina.

RECESS.

MR. MASON. It has been suggested by one or two Senators that no business will or can be done until we hear from the committee that has gone to wait on the President of the United States. In the mean time I suggest, at their instance, that the chair be informally vacated, to allow Senators to leave the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will regard that as the sense of the Senate, unless objected to. The Chair hears no objection.

On the return of the committee, the President pro tempore resumed the chair.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

MR. BRIGHT, from the committee appointed to wait upon the President of the United States, appeared and said: Mr. President, the committee appointed on the part of the Senate to meet a similar committee on the part of the House of Representatives, for the purpose of informing the President of the United States that the two Houses were organized and ready to receive any communication it might be his pleasure to make, have performed that duty, and received for answer that he would immediately make a communication to each House in writing.

Mr. J. B. HENRY, the President's Private Secretary, shortly afterwards appeared below the bar, and said:

I am directed by the President of the United States to deliver to the Senate his annual message in writing, with the accompanying documents.

The Secretary read the message. [See the Appendix for it.]

Mr. DOUGLAS. I offer the following:

Ordered, That the usual number of copies of the message and accompanying documents be printed, and fifteen thousand additional copies of the message and accompanying documents be printed for the use of the Senate.

Before I yield the floor, I desire simply to state that I have listened to the message with great pleasure, and concur cordially in much the greater part of it, and in most of the views expressed; but in regard to one topic—that of Kansas—I totally dissent from all that portion of the message which may fairly be construed as approving of the proceedings of the Lecompton convention. At an early period I shall avail myself of an opportunity to state my reasons for this dissent, and also to vindicate the right of the people of the Territory of Kansas to be left perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way according to the organic act.

Mr. GWIN. I offer this as a substitute for the resolution of the Senator from Illinois. I think it covers more ground:

Ordered, That the usual number of the message and documents be printed, and that fifteen thousand copies of the message and accompanying documents, in addition to the usual number, be printed for the use of the Senate, by the Printer of the Senate for the last Congress, at rates not exceeding those established by existing laws, and that all other orders for printing made, until a Printer shall be chosen, be executed by the late Printer on the same terms.

This is a resolution simply to point out the manner in which the work shall be printed, and by whom.

Mr. STUART. I do not propose to say anything on the subject of this last proposition; but I deem it my duty to say a word in concurrence with what has been said by the Senator from Illinois. The principal topics of the President's message have been treated in a manner which not only meets my entire approbation, but I think I may safely add, in as able a manner as was within the power of any man.

In respect to that portion of the message relating to the constitutional convention of Kansas, if I could agree with the President in his reasoning, in so far as he seeks to show that the principles of the organic act of that Territory have been complied with, I might agree with his conclusions; but believing that the principles of the organic act have been violated by the action of that convention, and that in no event can the people of the Territory be left as that act declared they should be—"perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way"—unless there shall be some future light which will show me that the action of this convention has been misrepresented and is not correctly understood either by the President or by myself, I never can give it my support.

At a future day I shall deem it my duty to go into this subject at length. I shall now conclude by saying that in my action upon this subject hereafter, as heretofore, I will insist to the extent of my ability that the people of Kansas shall be treated like all other people, and shall have the fullest, the freest opportunity to form and regulate such institutions as they may see fit to live under; and whether they are in accordance with my tastes or against them, will not at all affect my action on the question.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I think it is premature to discuss the message. I do not propose to do so. The remarks of the two honorable Senators on my right seem to be directed entirely to the action of the convention, and to the phrase about the people being left free to form their institutions in their own way. I could scarcely institute an argument on a proposition so plain as that the people may act either by popular vote or through their delegates; and it is a denial of sovereignty to the people to say they have not the power to elect their delegates and to invest them with authority to form an instrument which shall be binding on the body-politic. They might, if they chose, by popular vote settle the whole question. They did choose to have delegates in convention. They might, if they had so chosen, have directed those delegates to refer the question back to them; and so might the body-politic direct the Legislature to submit every act to a popular vote. It rests on them to decide one way or the other. I do not understand the doctrine to the extent of the remarks that are made.

Mr. BIGLER. I shall certainly not engage in any discussion of the main question at this time; but as two distinguished Senators from the northern part of the Union, of my own party, have declared an emphatic difference with the President on so much of his message as relates to the affairs of Kansas, I desire simply to say, that I just as emphatically concur in these views. I cannot agree with my friend from Illinois as to the construction he has given to the rights of the people of Kansas. Nor can I see that any right of theirs under the organic act, or that their liberty to any extent, is to be impaired by the doctrines of the message. Of course it would be unbecoming to go into the details of the argument at present. I do not intend to do so. I simply rose for the purpose of declaring that when we shall have heard the extended remarks of the Senator from Illinois, with all deference to his admitted intelligence and ability on this subject, I shall make the best reply I can, unless he convinces me that the President is mistaken as to the facts and theory of this case; of which I have no apprehension.

Mr. BROWN. I think that a discussion of this question now is altogether premature. Intimations are thrown out first on one side and then on the other, which I think, in the present aspect of the subject, can lead to no good result; and that we may all sleep to-night on the message before we undertake to discuss it, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no. Withdraw the motion.

Mr. BROWN. If the vote on the order for printing can be taken without further discussion, I will not press the motion.

Mr. HUNTER. If there is to be a debate on this question, I ask to be allowed, by general consent, to move that the report of the Secretary of the Treasury be taken up, with a view to its printing.

Mr. GWIN. There is no objection to printing the message.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is something to be said in regard to that.

Mr. PUGH. I wish to ask the Senator from California a question in reference to his amendment. Does the motion to print the ordinary number of copies of the message include the documents? The journal of the convention, the constitution, the census which was taken, the apportionment, and some other documents relating to Kansas, I should like to have printed, at as early a day as practicable; for my own opinion will depend, in a great degree, on what is contained in them. I hope the Senator will make his motion so that not only the message, but those documents which relate to the affairs of Kansas, may be printed in advance of any others, that we may have copies within a few days, especially if there is to be a debate on the subject.

Mr. COLLAMER. The two resolutions before us, as I understand them, involve very different subjects. That of the Senator from Illinois is merely for printing the President's message, and extra numbers of that message; the other is a proposition for printing extra numbers of the message and accompanying documents, and regulating the manner of their printing. This is a subject which ought to be discussed and considered. For one, I have no objection at all to printing the President's message, but I have an objection to printing extra numbers of that message. My objection is simply that it is utterly useless. Formerly, in the early stages of our Government, these extra numbers were printed for purposes of distribution. Now, before we can get a copy of the message printed here and sent off, it will be in all the papers of the Union, and in every house in the country. I have no objection to printing the message for the use of members, but I have an objection to printing extra numbers of it, because to do so is utterly useless; and I trust that this usage of the Senate, which originated early, may cease. As to printing extra numbers of the accompanying documents, I take it that is a subject which should go to the Committee on Printing. In due time we can consider it, but it should not be passed on at the present moment.

Mr. GWIN. My proposition is in almost the same words as the resolution adopted two years ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remark to the Senate that, under the rule, the usual number can be printed, by a vote of a majority of the Senate, at once. A motion to print extra numbers must go to the Committee on Printing, when such a committee shall be organized, unless by unanimous consent the reference be dispensed with.

Mr. HAMLIN and others. The usual number is enough.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will accept the amendment of the Senator from California, in order to expedite the question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask that the resolution as now amended may be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Ordered, That the usual number of the message and documents be printed, and that fifteen thousand copies of the message and accompanying documents, in addition to the usual number, be printed for the use of the Senate, by the Printer of the Senate for the last Congress, at rates not exceeding those established by existing laws; and that all other orders for printing, made until a Printer to the Senate shall be chosen, be executed by the late Printer on the same terms.

Mr. FESSENDEN. With regard to the last part of the proposition, as to who shall do this work, I have no interest in that matter, and desire to say nothing about it. Most of the Senators who were members of the last Congress, will undoubtedly recollect that we had a slight discussion on the question of printing at the beginning of the last session. I do not know that it would do any good to allude to the point, but there is a little question of economy in reference to it, which you, sir, and I, are familiar with from having considered the subject in the Committee on Printing of which we were then members. It is useless, as stated by my friend from Vermont, to print extra copies of the message proper. It was urged very strongly then that it was perfectly useless; but certain Senators desired and perhaps thought it was important to send this matter to their constituents in the form of a printed sheet, and therefore it passed. The expense of that alone is not great; but the resolution as it stands involves the printing of all the documents, and printing them immediately. The Printing Committee last year came to the conclusion, as many others did, and as must be obvious to everybody, that there is a vast deal of matter communicated to Congress in the annual message and accompanying documents that is not of the slightest service in the world to anybody. Nobody ever reads it, and it would be of no consequence if it were read. I allude to the tables and bids for contracts, and all sorts of things, that only go to lumber up the books, and make them unwieldy and unprofitable in every particular to us and their readers, and yet which involve a large expense in printing.

Now, what I am about to suggest is, that before we adopt the order for printing the usual number of copies, the whole matter, with regard to the documents, should be sent to the Committee on Printing. Let us have that matter investigated and reported upon before making the order, because the moment you print the usual number of copies, that involves the printing of the whole; and, when the whole is printed, or put in type ready to be struck off, the argument is, that it is a very slight expense to print the extra number, and therefore we may as well print the whole, now that we have begun to print a portion. I ask whether the motion to print cannot be divided so that we may take the question in the first place on the motion to print the message alone, which is of immediate interest, with extra numbers, if members desire that extra numbers be printed; and that the question with regard to printing the documents accompanying the President's message may first go to the Committee on Printing in order to ascertain how much of the matter that is communicated it is advisable to print. If it is in order, I ask for a division of the question, so that we may vote first on printing the message alone.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A division of the motion is in order.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have nothing to say on the particular branch of the motion under consideration; but I wish to address a word or two to the general question. Perhaps I owe an apology to the Senate for saying a word, because the question that has arisen seems to be a sort of family matter in which an outsider ought not to interfere. If it were not that I supposed there was some responsibility attached to all of us here, I should not say a word.

When I address myself to this subject, I am not at all embarrassed by having to say that I approve of any part of the message, or that I was one of the friends of the Kansas-Nebraska act, and am very desirous to see the principles of that act carried out. I do not exactly understand what the principles of that act were; but I believe the President is carrying them out pretty fairly. I do not mean to say that he is carrying out the intention that existed in the heart of the patriotic gentleman who framed it and brought it in here; but as a matter of public policy, and as a matter of the politics of the country, I believe that the act has been pretty fairly carried out ever since it was adopted, and that it is proposed to be so carried out now.

But there is a single assertion made by the President of the United States in his message, upon which I wish to make an issue—not an issue of veracity, of course—but of history, and of fair construction of language. As I understand his message from the hurried reading I have given it, the President labors very hard to explain away some little inadvertencies which he may have committed in deference to this principle of popular sovereignty in his instructions to Governor Walker. He says—honest, simple-hearted man as he is!—he never had a doubt that this question was to be fairly submitted to the people of that Territory. It was in the exercise of this comfortable assurance, this Christian faith, that it would be so carried out that he penned those lines in Governor Walker's instructions. After having done this, he goes on to argue that on the whole it has been carried out, and at last comes to the conclusion, that—"In the schedule providing for the transition from a territorial to a State government, the question has been fairly and explicitly referred to the people, whether they will have a constitution with or without slavery."

Now, sir, I deny this entirely; and when I deny it I do so in the manner I have stated. I make no question of veracity with any one, but I base the denial upon the construction of words, the meaning of language. I have read a paper which purports to be the constitution and the schedule, and I take it for granted, until the contrary appears, that it is a true copy. Instead of that constitution and schedule submitting to the people of Kansas the question whether they will have a constitution with or without slavery, it submits to them the question whether they will have the constitution—the difference between the definite and indefinite article—with slavery in the constitution, and in the schedule too, or whether they will simply have slavery in the schedule so tied up that it can never be abolished. That is the question submitted; because, if I have read the constitution aright, if the people vote to have the constitution without slavery, then the article providing for slavery in the constitution is to be stricken out, but the schedule remains, which makes slavery perpetual, and gives a monopoly to those who own slaves now in the Territory, keeping off outsiders, and thus enhancing their price. The people of Kansas go to the polls, the President says, to vote upon what has been "fairly and explicitly" submitted to them. Suppose they vote for the constitution without slavery. What then? They only get the latter clause of slavery: the article in the constitution tolerating slavery is stricken out, but the schedule, which goes into detail, which makes it binding, which ties up the hands of the Legislature, and attempts to tie up the hands of all future conventions, so that slavery can never be touched there, remains. This is the perfect liberty which the people of Kansas have.

I was rejoiced when I heard the distinguished Senator from Illinois, who was the author of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, intimate that at some time he would give his views upon the subject. I should like to know whether this is the perfect freedom which he understood the people of Kansas were to have; but I believe he has indicated that he does not think so. Now, I wish to tell you what the President says. He declares that

"The friends and supporters of the Nebraska and Kansas act, when struggling on a recent occasion to sustain its wise provisions before the great tribunal of the American people, never differed about its true meaning on this subject."

That struggle, that great struggle of which the President speaks, occurred at the time when he was a candidate for the Presidency of the United States. He says that on that occasion "everywhere throughout the Union," the friends of that bill—he means those who supported James Buchanan—

"Everywhere throughout the Union they publicly pledged their faith and their honor that they would cheerfully submit the question of slavery to the decision of the bona fide people of Kansas, without any restriction or qualification whatever."

Well, sir, the President says they have done this. He says they have submitted the question, "without any restriction or qualification whatever," to the people of Kansas. Upon that point I desire to speak. I am not embarrassed by any of the other questions which have been referred to, but upon this question I desire, at some suitable time, when it will be most convenient to the Senate, to be heard; and I give notice now to those who care anything about what I may say upon this question, I take issue with the President. I deny in whole and in part, in general and in detail, that the pledge spoken of by the President has, in any manner, been redeemed; but, on the contrary, I assert that, in no sense, general or special, have the people of Kansas, by this constitution, the right of deciding upon the institutions under which they may live. It is no apology for the President to say that after they come into the Union as a State they may amend the constitution, and blot out whatever is obnoxious; because, by the constitution which he recommends, and desires us to adopt, the men who have framed it have done everything they could to tie up the hands of the bona fide people of Kansas. If they have this liberty left, if a liberty of any sort remains to them to judge and determine as to their institutions, they will not have it in virtue of this constitution, nor in virtue of the proceedings of the Lecompton convention; but they will have it in spite and in defiance of this constitution, by riding over it, and trampling its authority under foot, in virtue of the great principle of popular sovereignty, of which this is but a mockery. Having said this much, I do not wish any longer to detain the Senate.

Mr. SEWARD. If I thought it was expedient, Mr. President, that this day should close upon a debate on the President's message—a document which surveys the condition of the whole country, and presents to mankind the state of every interest in it—or is intended to do so, while only one question, and that the question concerning Kansas and slavery in Kansas, was examined or considered or reflected upon by the Senate of the United States, I should not think it necessary to say anything. In regard to that, I agree that the debate which has been indicated is well postponed. I see that it enlists an affirmative and a negative side. We have been promised, on the part of the friends of the President of the United States who approve of this message and the principles contained in it, an explanation, a defense of it. I am sure I feel for one that the message is very lame and impotent in its argument in this respect; and that something more will be necessary to satisfy me with the position assumed by the President than is contained in the document itself. I am willing to wait until we shall hear, as I think the country will require to hear, the argument which is promised in support of this part of the message.

On the other hand, as the President and those who differ from him stand on a common ground in the beginning of this debate, that of the acceptance of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, I feel that it is due to those members of the Senate who, standing upon that ground, differ from the President in the exposition he now gives of those principles at this stage in the progress of Kansas from a territorial to a State government, that they should have an opportunity to be heard first. I believe that their argument, standing upon that ground, will have a greater effect than even an argument of the same merit proceeding upon the same ground from those who have always opposed the policy and principles of that bill. I shall, therefore, cheerfully wait for that debate, only saying that the circumstances of Kansas and of the cause of freedom in Kansas are imminent, and that I hope the debate will not be procrastinated or delayed. Before we are aware of it there may be civil war in Kansas, and I pray that the debate, while it is conducted so as to give every person an opportunity to be heard, will be brought on and closed here as early as possible.

I will take this occasion to say that I congratulate the Senate and the country, and I thank the President of the United States for the improved spirit in which this difficult, in some respects painful, and yet most important subject is presented—the great improvement on the messages which have been received by Congress from his predecessors, in the exalted station which he fills.

Now, in order that all the parts of this message may be known to have had some consideration here, I wish to notice that portion of the message which relates to the commercial and financial troubles of the country, and to say, that if the President and his Administration shall be able to suggest any measures which shall tend to fortify the currency of the country and to save its industrial interests from the periodical convulsions to which they are subject, I hope those measures will be communicated to Congress at an early day. I apprehend there will be found a cheerful response on the part of the representatives of the States and people to any judicious and safe measures that may be adopted for that purpose; but mere declamation on the subject will do little or nothing. I must take occasion to add, that while I think I shall make no objection, as at present advised, to a general bankrupt law which shall exercise a salutary control over the fiscal institutions of the several States, yet I do not understand a bankrupt law which is confined merely to fiscal operations to be a "uniform" bankrupt law within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States. I regret to see that there is not only no intimation of a desire on the part of the Administration to extend the provisions of any bankrupt law which may be passed to debtors other than corporations, but that such purpose seems to be excluded from the view of the Administration in the message which has been presented to us.

The message treats of our foreign relations. I think it may be regarded as a subject on which we can congratulate the people of the country that the disposition of the Administration is pacific at the same time that it is firm and national; and I am happy to be able to add, for myself, the expression of great satisfaction with the course which the Administration indicates, in regard especially to the subject of our relations with Great Britain and the States on this continent, involving Central America; I have felt mortified and humiliated to learn—after the pains which had been taken, and the concessions which had been made, by the President and Senate of the United States—that the just and liberal treaty offered them at the last session has been rejected.

There is another disturbance, perhaps more seriously painful and more immediately dangerous than any to which I have alluded, and that is the troubles in the Territory of Utah. On that subject I hope it may be understood that the opinion of the American Congress is substantially unanimous, and that the world may be assured that the Government of the United States will not suffer its name to be tarnished, its power to be insulted, the lives of its citizens to be destroyed by an enemy, intrenched although he be in the Rocky Mountains under the forms of the constitution of a Territory of the United States. I do not immediately commit myself to the project of increasing the Army by the addition of four regiments; but I do say that every measure which shall be proposed, and be best calculated to establish peace and order in that Territory, shall have my most cheerful support. I beg leave to suggest to that portion of the Senate who may constitute hereafter a Committee on Military Affairs, and may have charge of this subject, whether it will not be worth their while to consider whether the Pacific coast will not furnish the proper scene for the enlistment of men, and for the dispatch of soldiers to quell this rebellion, and whether the operations necessary cannot be more advantageously instituted in California than on this side of the mountains.

Mr. DOUGLAS. As there seems to be a disposition to debate this question before we can have a vote on the motion to print, and as there have been intimations on both sides of the Chamber (for I seem to stand between the parties) that they are waiting to hear what I may have to say upon this point, if it be agreeable to the Senate I will very briefly state my reasons of dissent tomorrow when the Senate shall meet, in order not to delay the vote on the motion to print the message.

Mr. HALE. I would suggest the course that was taken last year in this very case. A debate then arose on the President's message, and I think, by a suggestion either of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] or the late Senator from Texas, [Mr. Rusk,] the vote on printing the message was taken, and then a motion was made to reconsider it, and the debate went on upon the motion to reconsider, while the documents were being printed.

Mr. GWIN. I hope that course will be pursued now.

Mr. HUNTER. The documents would have to be printed by general consent while the debate went on upon the motion to reconsider, because a motion to reconsider suspends the operation of the resolution which has been passed and is proposed to be reconsidered.

Mr. HALE. I wish to propose that.

Mr. HUNTER. Very well.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senate is to act now, I think it would be better to submit a motion of another description, because my objection is to voting to print these documents as they stand, entire. I submit (and I think it will not lead to delay) a motion to commit the whole subject of printing the message and documents to the Committee on Printing. They can readily consider what ought to be done, and the debate can go on in the mean time.

Mr. GWIN. There is no such committee. If there was, I would agree to the suggestion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The committees will probably be appointed within a day or two.

Mr. GWIN. Not until Monday.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It will take much longer than Monday to print these documents. We shall not get them for many weeks at any rate. In the mean time, much expense will be saved (if that is of any consequence in these days) by having the matter properly investigated and reported on. I therefore make a motion, if it is in order, that the whole subject of printing the message and documents be referred to the Committee on Printing. Perhaps the Senators on the other side can tell me when the committee will be appointed.

Mr. MASON. I submit to the Senator that such a motion either cannot be in order, or will be of no avail, as there is no such committee. I do not know how it is with other Senators, but before this debate is gone into, I should be very much gratified to have an opportunity of examining those documents upon which the President rests his judgment in the communication he has sent us. Kansas is a very distant place from us; and for one, I am free to declare that all the information I have been enabled to obtain from there for the last six months has come through very questionable sources, upon every subject, whether of incidents occurring there, or of their laws or their action. We are to take it for granted that the President has sent to us a body of information derived officially, on which he has rested the judgment he has given in his message. I submit to honorable Senators, therefore, whether we should not, for the propriety of the occasion, as well as for our own information, allow these documents to be printed as speedily as possible?

Being on my feet, I will take the occasion to declare that, if I understand by the President's message he means that the action of the Kansas convention, being a legitimate convention, be the action of the convention what it may, is to be respected by the Congress of the United States, I not only agree with him, but I here aver that there is no jurist in the land who could not demonstrate, as a question of law, that the Federal Government was bound to respect it under the existing law—I mean the Kansas-Nebraska act. That act gave to those people the whole political power, without any reservation, submitting it only in its exercise to the Constitution of the United States. If we are now to criticize what they have done, provided they pursued the forms of their own laws—and I presume they did—far less if we are to abrogate it, we cannot do so unless we take back all that we have done, repeal the existing law organizing that Territory, and bring those people back to a state of pupilage by declaring to them, "we have trusted you with political power; you have shown yourselves incapable of exercising it; and, therefore, we, as your masters, will now govern you." I say such are the impressions I derive from all the information I have in relation to this subject. If I construe the President's message correctly, his position is entirely impregnable on that subject; but I should be exceedingly sorry to be obliged to go into this debate—and I should be very sorry if the honorable Senator from Illinois, who has given the challenge—I mean a challenge to public opinion—at the very first hop of the ball, should find himself constrained to go into this debate without having the benefit of all the information upon which the President's message rests. I hope, therefore, that the honorable Senator from Maine will not persist in his motion to refer the proposition to print; but that, as has been suggested for mutual convenience, the vote to print will be taken, and that the printing may go on while the debate continues, for it will take a long while, I presume, to print the voluminous mass of documents before us.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I had but a single object, and I do not feel disposed to urge it against the wish and feelings of Senators. My only desire was to call the attention of the Senate to what has been considered heretofore a matter of some consequence. I have no interest in it other than as one of the Senators.

Mr. PUGH. Allow me to make a suggestion which will, I think, obviate the difficulty. I suppose we do not care about seeing very soon the documents relative to foreign affairs. The Senator from Maine does not doubt that it will be important to print in full all the documents relative to Kansas. I suggest, therefore, that we make simply an order to print the ordinary number of the President's message and the documents relating to Kansas. The rest of it we can look after when we have a committee and printer.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I accept the amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before the message passes from the consideration of the Senate at this time, I desire to say a word in regard to an assumption which is made in it, which I think is not founded in fact, and upon which the whole argument of the President in regard to Kansas is based. I believe it right and proper to combat error upon all occasions, and to meet it at the threshold.

The President, in treating upon this Kansas question, speaks of the convention which met at Leecompton, and framed a constitution, as if it were a legitimate convention. The honorable Senator from Virginia has just spoken of it as a legitimate convention. Now, sir, I deny in toto that that convention possessed any authority whatever; and I do not place my denial on the ground that the Territorial Legislature of Kansas was a fraudulent Legislature. I believe that to be so. I believe that the Legislature had no authority to act upon any subject; but, conceding that it was the legitimate Legislature of the Territory of Kansas, properly convened under the organic act, I deny that it had any authority whatever to initiate a convention to form a constitution for the people of Kansas, and destroy the territorial government.

The Congress of the United States, at its last session, refused repeatedly to authorize the people of Kansas to form a State constitution. Bill after bill was presented to give authority to the people to hold a convention and form a constitution, preparatory to admission into the Union; but all failed. Such an act was passed in regard to Minnesota, and such has been the usual course in regard to all the Territories. Now, I do not undertake to say that Congress may not take up and ratify the proceedings of a convention which is called without legal authority. They have done so in several instances, as in Michigan and California. Congress has not always passed an enabling act in the first instance, but usually it has. I do say, however, that the convention which met to form a constitution in Kansas, under the authority of the Territorial Legislature, was not a convention convened in pursuance of law; because a Territorial Legislature has no authority to do any act destructive of the territorial organization, and the authority granted in the Kansas act authorizing the Territorial Legislature to legislate on all rightful subjects, not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States and the organic act, is not different from the authority which was granted to Territories in previous instances. In looking at the act for the organization of the Territory of Minnesota, I find that its sixth section declares, "that the legislative power of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation, consistent with the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of the" organic act. So, also, the territorial act establishing the Territory of Arkansas provided that its Legislature should have authority "to pass any law for the administration of justice in said Territory," which should not be repugnant to the organic act, or inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States. In regard to Michigan, the organic act gave authority to the Legislature to make laws in all cases for the good government of the district, not repugnant to the ordinance of 1787, under which it was organized.

Now, sir, I wish to call attention to a precedent on this subject, for it is no new question. Some years ago an attempt was about being made in the then Territory of Arkansas to get up a convention under the territorial act. The Governor of Arkansas addressed the President of the United States, at that time General Jackson, to know what course he should pursue, in case the Territorial Legislature attempted to call a convention to form a State constitution. General Jackson referred the communication to the Attorney General of the United States, and here is his opinion:

"The Legislative power is vested in a General Assembly, composed of two branches—the Legislative Council and the House of Representatives; both of which are elected by the people. The act providing for the government of the Territory of Missouri, approved June 4, 1812, and which is adopted in the laws relating to Arkansas, as defining the powers of the legislative department, declares 'that the General Assembly shall have power to make laws in all cases, both civil and criminal, for the good government of the people of said Territory, not repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the Constitution and laws of the United States.' This part of the law is to be taken in connection with the other provisions contained in it; and when so considered, it will be seen that the whole law was designed to accomplish the single purpose of organizing a temporary territorial government, which was intended to remain subject at all times to the control of Congress, under the authority conferred upon it by the Constitution of the United States. In the exercise of this authority, Congress may, at pleasure, repeal or modify the laws passed by the Territorial Legislature, and may, at any time, abrogate and remodel the Legislature itself, and all the other departments of the territorial government.

"To suppose that the legislative powers granted to the General Assembly include the authority to abrogate, alter, or modify the territorial government established by the act of Congress, and of which the Assembly is a constituent part, would be manifestly absurd. The act of Congress, so far as it is consistent with the Constitution of the United States, and with the treaty by which the territory, as a part of Louisiana, was ceded to the United States, is the supreme law of the Territory; it is paramount to the power of the Territorial Legislature, and can only be revoked or altered by the authority from which it emanated. The General Assembly and the people of the Territory are as much bound by its provisions, and as incapable of abrogating them, as the Legislatures and people of the American States are bound by and incapable of abrogating the Constitution of the United States. It is also a maxim of universal law, that when a particular thing is prohibited by law, all means, attempts, or contrivances to effect such thing are also prohibited. Consequently, it is not in the power of the General Assembly of Arkansas to pass any law for the purpose of electing members to form a constitution and State government, nor to do any other act, directly or indirectly, to create such new government. Every such law, even though it were approved by the Governor of the Territory, would be null and void. If passed by them, notwithstanding his veto, by a vote of two thirds of each branch, it would still be equally void."

This was the ground taken by the administration of General Jackson in regard to Arkansas; and the position is an unanswerable one. Any law passed by the Territorial Legislature of Kansas—which possessed no greater authority than the Territorial Legislature of Arkansas—initiating a convention, is utterly null and void.

The Attorney General then goes on to discuss the right of the people to petition, and to get up a Government and present it to Congress, asking to be admitted as a State into the Union. He argues that they have no power to put into operation a constitution emanating from the people, without congressional authority, but they have the right to assemble and petition for a redress of grievances, and, if they think proper, to present their petition in the form of a constitution, as the people of Kansas did the Topeka constitution, leaving it to Congress to determine whether to admit them or not. But this convention which met at Lecompton originated in a call of the Territorial Legislature, and is entitled to just as much respect, and no more than would be a call emanating from the same number of persons who are equally respectable, and not members of that Legislature.

But, sir, there is other authority than the Administration of General Jackson and the opinion of the Attorney General in 1835. We have authority which I apprehend will be satisfactory even to the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BAKER,] who indorsed this message in full. In the debate which took place upon the admission of Michigan into the Union, an objection was raised that the convention which assembled in the Territory of Michigan had not been authorized by the Territorial Legislature, but emanated from spontaneous meetings got up in the Territory—a sort of voluntary convention. Mr. Buchanan answered that objection.

Mr. HALE. What Buchanan was that?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. James Buchanan, now President of the United States. I will read what he said from the Congressional Globe of that day:

"We ought not to apply the rigid rules of abstract political science too rigorously to such cases. It has been our practice heretofore to treat our infant Territories with parental care, to nurse them with kindness, and when they had attained the age of manhood, to admit them into the family without requiring from them a rigid adherence to forms. The great questions to be decided are: Do they contain a sufficient population? Have they adopted a republican constitution? And are they willing to enter the Union upon the terms which we propose? If so, all the preliminary proceedings have been considered but mere forms, which we have waived in repeated instances. They are but the scaffolding of the building, which is of no further use after the edifice is complete. We have pursued this course in regard to Tennessee, to Arkansas, and even to Michigan. No Senator will pretend that their Territorial Legislatures had any right whatever to pass laws enabling the people to elect delegates to a convention for the purpose of forming a State constitution. It was an act of usurpation on their part."

That was the language of James Buchanan, now President of the United States, who encamped his army round about this Lecompton convention, declared it legal, and now talks about it as a legitimate convention, and speaks in his message here of an election which is to be held under its authority as legitimate. It was an act of usurpation on the part of the Legislature, to use his own language, ever to have passed an act calling into being a convention to form a State constitution. How idle is it then to talk of this Lecompton convention as a legitimate one, emanating from competent authority! In the same speech, from which I before read, Mr. Buchanan remarked:

"The Senator from Ohio [Mr. Ewing] has contended that the second Michigan convention had no power to assent, because the first convention which was held had refused."

"Mr. Ewing said he had asked whether, if the first convention had assented to the condition proposed by the act of Congress, there would have been any objection to this assent because it had been called by virtue of an act of the Legislature?"

"Mr. BUCHANAN said certainly not. It never could have been contended that this act of the Legislature had vitiated the subsequent proceedings of the convention. Although it was not necessary to give them validity, yet it would not destroy them. It could neither make the case better nor worse."

That was the opinion of Mr. Buchanan in regard to the authority of a Territorial Legislature possessing all the powers under the organic act which the Kansas Territorial Legislature possessed to call a convention to form a constitution. Now, sir, I undertake to say that this Lecompton convention was not a legitimate convention; that it possessed no authority whatever, and that all its enactments which it has undertaken to carry into effect, such as ordering an election to be supervised by its president, are void; that every act which it has attempted to establish over the people of Kansas without their subsequent ratification is, in the language of Mr. Buchanan, a usurpation, and no man is bound to submit to it. If the convention submit their proceedings to the action of the people, and the people indorse them, that might give them validity; but without such indorsement they can have no binding force, because they do not emanate from a legitimate source.

There is one other point in regard to this Kansas matter to which I desire to allude. The President speaks of the submission of the slavery question to the people of Kansas in the manner in which it is submitted—but imperfectly at the most—as a fair carrying out of the principle of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. That bill has been held up before the country as establishing the great principle of self-government; as establishing the principle for which our fathers fought to secure our independence—the principle of allowing the people to regulate their own domestic institutions in their own way; and what does it amount to, according to Mr. Buchanan? It amounts simply to giving the free white people of Kansas a right to determine the condition of a few negroes hereafter to be brought into the State—and nothing more. The condition of those now there cannot be touched. To this has the great principle of self-government now come, according to the recognized exponent of the party which inaugurated the Kansas act! The free people of Kansas have no right, under the Lecompton constitution, to determine on the organic law under which they shall live. They have no right to determine the institutions for the government of white men—not at all. They cannot determine what sort of a Legislature they shall have, of how many members it shall consist, what the qualifications for membership shall be. They cannot pass on the right of suffrage. They cannot determine as to the creation of banks, other corporations, and a thousand other things which are put into the constitutions by the people in all our States, for the government of free white men; but they may determine what shall be the condition of a few negroes, hereafter to be introduced; and that is the great principle of popular sovereignty according to the message!

I shall have occasion at some future time, to speak more at length in regard to this document. My only object in rising now was to meet the assumption, not founded as I conceive in correct law, that the convention which assembled under the authority of the Territorial Legislature was a legitimate convention. It was not as good a convention as the one which met at Topeka, because that convention did emanate from a portion of the people at least, whereas the Lecompton convention emanated, as I insist, from a set of usurpers.

Mr. BROWN. An hour and a half since, I moved an adjournment; because I then saw, and stated, that we were about to be hurried prematurely into a discussion of the merits of this message. A document of so much importance needs, I think—so far as I myself am concerned I know—to be deeply studied before Senators can express opinions upon it which are to bind them, and, to a very great extent, give direction to public opinion throughout the Union, and, I may say, throughout the world.

There seems to me, sir, to be an eagerness to enter upon this discussion; an anxiety to find fault on the one side, and to applaud on the other, but more especially it seems to find fault with the message imperfectly heard from the Secretary's desk, and perhaps more imperfectly understood. Among the junior members of the Senate, the appeal perhaps comes badly from me to ask a day, that Senators may sleep a night on this document before they insist on embracing opinions, and sending them in newspapers and upon telegraphic wires throughout all the country, to give direction to public opinion upon great questions, particularly upon one question which the Senator from New York has indicated, may yet give rise to civil war. I cannot follow the logic of that Senator, when he says that he is anxious, impatient for the debate; but yet, as I understood him, he said that, before we reached the coming in of the next year, we might have civil war in Kansas. Sir, if there be civil war lying in our path, and not a month off, how vastly important must it be to this deliberative body that every Senator who speaks shall speak upon deliberation.

Have Senators well considered the importance which the country will attach to words spoken here to-day, perhaps lightly thrown off, the impulses of the moment, the feelings of the instant produced by the reading of the important paper? Yet, sir, at the very moment while I address this august body, words already spoken here are being carried to the remotest part of the Republic to produce their impression. Possibly, before this body shall have met again to-morrow, these words will be in print and be read in Kansas to inflame public feeling there. I implore Senators to consider well before they take positions and utter sentiments which I am sure cannot be well-matured on fifteen minutes' reflection, or rather upon no reflection at all. To test the sense of the Senate on this question, I renew my motion to adjourn; and I will not withdraw it at the instance of any Senator.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 8, 1857.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

QUALIFICATION OF A MEMBER.

Mr. JOHN C. KUNKEL, a member from the State of Pennsylvania, appeared and took the oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

ELECTION OF PRINTER—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CLEMENS obtained the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. I arise to what I suppose to be a privileged question—that is, to complete the organization of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama cannot take the floor from the gentleman from Virginia, on a motion to proceed to complete the organization of the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, I hope the gentleman from Virginia will allow us to complete the organization of the House before he proceeds to other matters.

Mr. CLEMENS. I will do so with great pleasure, if the Speaker will assign the floor to me when the organization is complete. I beg the unanimous consent of the House for the purpose of making a personal explanation.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the gentleman will allow us to complete the organization of the House, and then he can make his personal explanation.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I would suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that perhaps there would be some objection to my colleague going on after the organization of the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Alabama as objecting?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do object for the present. And now I move that the House proceed to the election of a Printer to the Thirty-Fifth Congress; and on that I ask the previous question.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I would be very glad—and I would state that it is important it should be done—that this resolution which I send up should be first acted on.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I understood the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] to object to the explanation of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. CLEMENS,] and to offer his motion. Then, I object to the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, and insist on the regular order.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Will it be in order to move to lay the motion of the gentleman from Alabama on the table?

Mr. CLEMENS. I appeal to the gentleman from Virginia to let me make my statement.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] is the gentleman to be appealed to.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I raise the question of order that this discussion is out of order.

The SPEAKER. Debate is entirely out of order if objection be made, the previous question having been demanded.

Mr. CLEMENS. I desire simply to state that my personal explanation relates to the election of Public Printer.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I insist on my point of order.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. STEPHENS. All of us who want to hear the explanation of the gentleman from Virginia

[Mr. CLEMENS] should vote down the previous question, and then he can speak.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I stated that I had a resolution to offer in connection with this question. Is it in order to make a motion of this description—to lay the motion of the gentleman from Alabama on the table? On that motion I desire to make some remarks, if it is in order.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Then I ask that my resolution, which is very brief, shall be read.

Several MEMBERS objected.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I move to lay the motion of the gentleman from Alabama on the table; and on that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CLEMENS. I appeal to the friends of Mr. Wendell to permit me—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CLEMENS] is not in order.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. At the suggestion of gentlemen around me, I will agree to withdraw my motion, and will concur in voting down the previous question.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I rise to make an inquiry. If the demand for the previous question be voted down, I presume that the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama will be then debatable, and that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CLEMENS] will have the opportunity of making his personal explanation.

Several MEMBERS. Certainly; we understand it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. And, as I am in favor of free discussion, I am in favor of voting down the previous question.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to this debate in the shape of an inquiry.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order.

Mr. HOUSTON demanded tellers upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HOUSTON, and SMITH of Virginia, were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes forty-eight, noes not counted.

So the previous question was not seconded.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was here received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had appointed a committee to join a committee appointed by this House to wait upon the President of the United States to inform him that a quorum of the two Houses has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION RESUMED.

Mr. CLEMENS. I beg leave now to submit the following correspondence, which sufficiently explains itself:

WASHINGTON CITY, December 6, 1857.

DEAR SIR: I had left the caucus last night a few moments before the incident occurred to which I now take the liberty of inviting your attention. I learn that in the course of your remarks upon the proposition to postpone the nomination of a Public Printer, you were understood very broadly and distinctly to intimate that you were possessed of some facts calculated to impeach the integrity of Mr. Wendell, the present incumbent of that office, and although several times interrogated, that you declined to disclose to the meeting the facts upon which you based your conclusions as to his character. As the caucus will resemble to-morrow night for the purpose of acting upon the only unfinished business, the nomination of a Public Printer, allow me, as one of your colleagues, to inquire what are the facts upon which you have made this attack upon Mr. Wendell? I wish them for the guidance of my conduct in the choice which I shall be called upon to make between the competing candidates. And permit me further to suggest the propriety of your authorizing me to submit your reply to Mr. Wendell, that he may have an opportunity of making such explanations or defense as the case may require. In making this last suggestion, I am not acting at the instance nor as the friend of Mr. Wendell, for I have had no conversation with him on the subject, nor have I as yet at any time decided to give to him my support as Public Printer. But I think some such course on your part would be fair, manly, and just—due to your own character, due to your associates in Congress, and especially due to an individual who, whatever may be his errors, did, to my certain knowledge, in the presidential canvass of 1856, signalize his zeal for the success of the Democratic party by acts of extraordinary liberality and public spirit.

Yours, truly,

CH. JAS. FAULKNER.

Hon. SHERRARD CLEMENS.

Mr. KEITT. I rise to a question of order, I wish to know what connection this matter has with the motion before the House, which I understand to be the election of Printer to the House?

I do not wish to throw any obstacle in the way of the gentleman from Virginia, but if the character of the Democratic party is arraigned and upon trial, or if the character of Mr. Wendell as an officer of this House is arraigned and upon trial, I can see some pertinency in this course; but if neither the character of the Democratic party nor of Mr. Wendell is on trial, I beg to know what pertinency there is in this matter to the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not like to rule the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia out of order, for he does not know the application he proposes to make of the correspondence he has read.

Mr. KEITT. I then take the ground that it requires unanimous consent to proceed.

Several VOICES. He has it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not so understand it. The motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] was to proceed to the election of a Printer. The previous question was demanded, but not seconded. The gentleman from Virginia sought the floor—and was recognized by the Chair—to speak upon the pending proposition, "Shall the House proceed to the election of a Public Printer?" He has the floor upon that question. The Chair thinks that the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, if objection is made to them, are out of order, because of their irrelevancy.

Mr. STEPHENS. It seems to me that anything which the gentleman from Virginia may say relating to the public printing, or the candidates before the House, would be relevant. The letter which the gentleman is reading relates to the public printing; and it may be that the gentleman will follow it with some remarks upon that correspondence directly pertinent to the question before us.

The SPEAKER. That is true; and the Chair regretted that the point of order was pressed, inasmuch as the gentleman from Virginia might make the discussion entirely relevant and legitimate.

Mr. STEPHENS. I trust the gentleman from South Carolina will withdraw the objection, and let us hear the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. CLEMENS. I trust my friend from South Carolina, as an act of justice to myself, will withdraw his point of order.

Mr. KEITT. I withdraw it.

Mr. CLEMENS, (resuming.) To this letter of my colleague I gave the following reply:

WASHINGTON CITY, December 7, 1857.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of yesterday was left, in my absence, in my room.

After a night's deliberation upon the only suggestion in it which it is requisite for me now to notice, I have concluded that, under the circumstances, it is more manly to apprise the Printer of the House of the nature of the accusation which I shall bring against him.

As you have voluntarily proposed to be the medium to accomplish this object, I empower you to submit the inclosed statement, in writing, (which I shall lay before the Democratic caucus to-night) to him, and, under no circumstances, to any other person.

I shall be obliged to you to return to me the said statement, with this letter, in time for the meeting this evening.

Very truly, yours,

SHERRARD CLEMENS.

Hon. CHARLES JAMES FAULKNER.

The statement inclosed in this letter was as follows:

Statement prepared to be submitted to the Democratic caucus of members of the House of Representatives, for the Thirty-Fifth Congress, at the adjourned meeting, December 7, 1857.

After what occurred in the Democratic caucus on Saturday night last, I had a right to expect that I should be called on, in some authoritative form, for the facts upon which the statement I then orally made was predicated. I proceed, therefore, to detail them in writing. I have hitherto systematically refused to answer any personal interrogatories upon the subject, for the simple reason that I had the right to place the whole affair in written language, beyond misconstruction or misrepresentation.

It may be well to state, in the outset, that I am not acquainted with the present Printer of the House, and do not even know him by sight.

On Saturday last, the 5th day of this month, I was accosted by a person with whom I have had an acquaintance of some years' standing. At the close of a somewhat protracted conversation, he informed me that he was interested in procuring the House printing, during the present Congress, for Cornelius Wendell, of New York, at present Printer of the House.

He suggested that a specific consideration could be secured to my mother, dependent upon one of two contingencies: First, That I should cast my vote for said Cornelius Wendell, in the election for House Printer at the present session; Second, That I should abstain from voting by absenting myself from the House at the time of the vote.

Without dilating upon my emotions at such an overture, it is sufficient to say, that I referred him to the sixth section of the act of Congress of February 26, 1853, by which the proposed crime was punishable; I told him that he had put himself in my power; that he had mistaken his man; that the intimation of such a thing was a gross personal insult to myself; and that I should exact from him the amplest reparation.

He became deeply agitated; supplicated my pardon in the most impassioned terms; said that he had been mistaken and misled; that he knew I had the power to ruin him, and all connected with him, and beseeched me to spare him the infamy which would attach to the exposure of his name. At present, I have nothing further to say, except that he never has been, to my knowledge, a citizen of Virginia; and that in this whole affair, I have acted on my individual responsibility alone, and that the course I have taken has been prompted entirely by the duty I owe the Government, whose officer I am.

This statement I am ready to verify in the most solemn of all forms.

SHERRARD CLEMENS.

My colleague then addressed the following letter to Mr. Wendell himself:

WASHINGTON, December 7, 1857.

SIR: I herewith inclose to you a letter and statement received this morning from Hon. SHERRARD CLEMENS, which, in fairness and justice, should be promptly laid before you for such explanations as you may deem proper. I should be pleased to have your reply in time to lay it before the Democratic caucus, which meets this evening at 7 o'clock. You will perceive, from the letter of Mr. CLEMENS, that he does not wish his statement shown to any other person than yourself. This, in my judgment, does not preclude you from showing it to some few confidential friends with whom you might choose to consult on the subject.

I am, truly, yours,

CH. J. FAULKNER.

CORNELIUS WENDELL, Esq.

Subsequently, Mr. Wendell addressed the following letter to my colleague:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 7, 1857.

SIR: Herewith I inclose you my reply to the statement of the Hon. SHERRARD CLEMENS.

You will very much oblige me by laying the same before the Democratic caucus this evening.

With sentiments of the highest regard, I remain your obedient servant,

C. WENDELL.

Hon. C. J. FAULKNER.

This is the statement to which reference is made in Mr. Wendell's letter:

To the Honorable the Democratic Members of the House of Representatives:

GENTLEMEN: The Hon. SHERRARD CLEMENS having, at the earnest solicitation of my friends, submitted to me a copy of a statement, indirectly affecting my character, which statement he intends to lay before you this evening, I reply:

First.—I have no knowledge of the facts alluded to, other than that contained in his paper.

Second.—So far as the inference is sought to be drawn from his statement that any person approached him in an improper manner, with my authority or knowledge and in my behalf, I hereby most solemnly deny, and earnestly protest against any such inference on the part of any gentleman, based as it is, thus far, on a nameless author; and am utterly at a loss to imagine who the individual is to whom he alludes.

If the Hon. SHERRARD CLEMENS, or any other member, has any charge to make against me, touching the public printing or otherwise, and which shall be made to assume a tangible form, susceptible of disproof, I hold myself ready to disprove it to the satisfaction of every unprejudiced and honorable man.

I do most solemnly assert that I have never directly or indirectly, either in person or by any agent, offered any pecuniary or other consideration to any member of Congress, to secure their vote for me for the office of Public Printer. This declaration I wish to be understood as full, clear, and explicit, without any mental or other reservation, denying and defying the proof in any manner or shape whatsoever.

Relative to other charges of plunder and corruption—emanating, as they heretofore have, from the hungry leeches who infest the lobbies of the House, too lazy to work, too proud to beg, and too cowardly to steal openly—I have not heretofore deemed them worthy my notice. But finding their assertions have produced an impression upon some members who are personally unacquainted with me, I now challenge and defy any and every one of them to substantiate even the least of their allegations against me.

In conclusion, as I am not personally acquainted with Mr. CLEMENS, I would take this occasion to state that I should take it as a great personal favor if he would communicate to me privately, if he does not wish to do so publicly, the name of the individual who thus dared to approach him in my behalf.

With great respect,

C. WENDELL.

Now, Mr. Speaker, up to this moment, I do not know Cornelius Wendell. I have had no conscious conversation with him at any period of my life. I do not know him even by sight; and in this whole affair, from its commencement to its close, I aver here, on my responsibility in the dread hereafter, that I have had no purpose to accomplish—that I have had no end to subserve—except the duty which I conceived was due to myself and to my country. Acting on this line of duty, and on this alone, I have conceived it incumbent on me, in the position in which I have been placed, to eliminate this question of all matters touching myself personally; and to that end, since last evening when I retired from the Democratic caucus, I have made it my purpose to prosecute the necessary inquiries with reference to the person referred to in the paper that has been read. It will be remembered that the occurrence took place on Saturday last. I intimated it to a colleague, who is now in my eye, and to him alone. I came to the Democratic caucus that evening, fretting under the emotions which the proposition itself produced; and, actuated by the convictions of my heart, when the name of Mr. Wendell was presented, I stated in the hearing of every one who was then present, that Mr. Wendell was at least most unfortunate in his friends; for, however it might be with him, corruption at least attached to them. Is or is not that the statement in substance which I made, at the time to which I refer? I call on the gentleman from Virginia—my colleague—who sat by my side, to say whether that is not the substance of what I said?

Mr. HOPKINS. I recollect that that was the substance.

Mr. CLEMENS. After Saturday the events are sufficiently explained in the correspondence. I have conceived it my duty, acting in the path to which I have referred, to see whether the person referred to in the inclosed statement would, or would not, stand up to what he said. I am satisfied that there is a disposition on his part to skulk behind my body from the disgrace in which he has voluntarily involved himself; and, although he has forfeited all claim at my hands, there is something due to his family and to his connections; and—unprincipled scoundrel as he is—I profess that I am not here to stand as his protector, but to act as a shield for those who are innocent, and to protect them from the effects of his acts.

Under these circumstances, then, I conceive it to be nothing more than a public duty to say, weighing calmly and impartially everything connected with this, the most disagreeable subject of my life, I take this occasion to avow that, under all the circumstances, and as my mind is at present inclined, I take the statement of Mr. Wendell in preference to that of the person referred to in so far as Mr. Wendell denies all complicity in, or knowledge of, the proposition which was made to me.

I shall go no further than that; I conceive it to be an act of simple duty; and I do this act of justice to a man whom I never saw in my life, simply because I do not desire hereafter, come what may, to let the reflection rest on my conscience of having, either knowingly or unknowingly, done an act of injustice to a man who may possibly be innocent.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The question is on proceeding to the election of Printer. I move to amend the motion, by substituting the following resolutions:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed by the Speaker to examine into the laws in relation to the printing for the House of Representatives, the prices paid therefor, and the duties of the Public Printer, whose duty it shall be to report thereon with the least practicable delay, together with such change or improvement therein as they may deem advisable.

Resolved, further, That until such report and action thereon by this House, the election of Public Printer shall be postponed.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to a question of order. Is the resolution now before the House? If not, then I object to it, because there is a pending proposition, to which it cannot be offered, either as an amendment by way of substitute, or otherwise.

The SPEAKER. The resolution can only be received as a substitute for the motion of the gentleman from Alabama. The Chair thinks it is in order as a substitute.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I beg to assure you, sir, and this House, that I have no purpose to subserve, no interest to promote, no object to effect, except that which is in harmony with the duty that I owe to myself and to the country. It is known to this House—for we are from the people—that there is a very profound complaint existing in the public mind as to the enormous expense to the Treasury of this branch of the public service. It is known, also, I presume, to every member of the House, that it is believed this enormous expenditure is connected more or less with very large corruption. Under such circumstances as these, it is our duty as representatives of the people, and as the guardians of the public interests, to institute an investigation into a subject connected so gravely and so seriously with the well-being of the country. It is represented, and believed, that there was a profit realized of forty per cent. upon the public printing of this House for the last session. It is believed, sir, that the printing ordered during the last Congress, amounting to $2,000,000, will pay a profit of $800,000. It is believed that the Public Printer elected to-day could sell his rights and privileges for a quarter of a million of dollars, the money to be paid within thirty days after those rights are vested.

Is it possible, under such circumstances, that this House will hesitate to institute an inquiry by which the truth of these allegations and representations are to be ascertained? Is it possible that this House can pause for an instant in their course in relation to a subject which involves so heavy an expenditure, and one which pays so heavy a profit to the person performing the duty of Public Printer?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I think, if the gentleman will make one modification of his resolution, it will not meet with opposition from any quarter. Let us go on and elect a Printer, and then raise a committee to investigate the matter.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I understand that suggestion, and I think that the gentleman who makes the suggestion, and his friends, must know that a suggestion of that sort amounts to nothing as a measure of reform. We know perfectly well that the Public Printer is not only an officer, but an officer who acquires vested rights which cannot be disturbed. Anticipating that this suggestion would be made, I came here, not only with the general principles familiar to every lawyer in this Hall, but with the act providing for the appointment of a Public Printer, and prescribing his rights and duties, in which this very point is provided for.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Is not the gentleman's proposition a proposition to keep in the present Public Printer?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Now, see how the cat jumps! I will read the thirteenth section of the act passed in 1852:

"And be it further enacted, That all acts or joint resolutions conflicting with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed; and nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize the cancellation of any contract now or heretofore entered into with any printer under the law heretofore in force, or to abrogate his rights in any way, without his consent."

So, you observe, that the very question involved—the vested rights of the Public Printer—is guarded in the act passed in 1852. If, then, we go into the election of a Public Printer now, the Printer we may elect will acquire rights beyond our reach during the present Congress. He will be able to reap this rich harvest, which has been reaped heretofore by every man who has filled the office of Public Printer. Every man, within my recollection, who has occupied that office, has grown suddenly rich. I say suddenly rich, because he has realized a fortune in a year, which is seldom acquired only by the labors of a life time.

It is not my purpose to discuss this subject at large, and I propose now only to answer a single objection. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] says that the effect of the adoption of this resolution will be to keep in office the present Printer. Somebody must do the work. The resolution I have had the honor to submit, provides for the appointment of a committee whose duty it shall be to make a report without unnecessary delay. All parties will be interested to bring the matter to a termination at the earliest possible moment. In view of the heavy expenditure in printing, it becomes the duty of the majority of this House, as also it is the duty of the minority, to concur in a reform by which this burden is to be taken, to some extent, from a Treasury now almost exhausted.

I have submitted this view of the subject because I deemed it my duty. I shall be perfectly content with the decision of the House. Each member will give his vote upon his own responsibility, and to that decision I am perfectly willing to leave the subject. Thank God I have no personal feeling, and no purpose to subserve in the matter.

Mr. KEITT. I suppose it is proper that I should say I have no purpose to subserve; and I may add, from the manifestations around me, that the country will be admirably taken care of. It seems that we are all for the country, and not for ourselves, or the "rest of mankind."

The proposition now before the House is not Mr. Wendell or anybody else. It is whether we shall proceed to the election of a Public Printer in the usual and ordinary way. My friend from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] says: "I care nothing about this matter; I rise to a question of public importance, and I shall be satisfied with the decision of the House." Very good. I understand, then, that he cares nothing about Mr. Wendell or anybody else, and that he knows no one in the matter. But my friend from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] said to him, "modify your resolution, and provide for the election of a Public Printer, and the appointment of a committee to inquire afterwards." "Ay," says my friend from Virginia, "your party is now in power, and you want your man."

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I beg leave to say that I have no recollection of having referred to "your party." You may say "your party."

Mr. KEITT. He referred to our friends upon this side. "Well," said the gentleman from North Carolina, "do not you want to keep in the present Public Printer?" "Now, see how it jumps," replied the gentleman from Virginia. The other side wants—what? Not the present Public Printer. What does the gentleman from Virginia want? He wants the present Public Printer—at least that is the inference from what he says.

But my friend from Virginia says he would not have voted for Wendell until after this attack. What does this attack mean? What does the gentleman say? That men in two years have grown suddenly rich. Did he not say that we had run up our printing bill most extravagantly, and that corruption stains it? If, then, corruption stains it, I ask whether corruption does not stain the Public Printer?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Will the gentleman be good enough to remember what I said?

Mr. KEITT. I will try.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I said it was a known fact that the expenses of the public printing, for the last two years, were of the most onerous and enormous character; and I said that the impression on the public mind is, that this expenditure is the cover of large corruption. That is what I said. I expressed no opinion upon the subject, for I know nothing about it.

Mr. KEITT. Exactly; but the gentleman from Virginia, in embodying the rumors and impressions of the community, gives his sanction to them, more or less; and I say that by any expression, upon his part, of rumors of corruption, he more or less discolors and stains the character of the Printer. These charges of corruption, by implication, come now from those who are defending Mr. Wendell—not from those said to have made the charges. The gentleman says he would not have voted for Mr. Wendell until the charges were made. If the charges for the public printing have been onerous—the gentleman did not say unjust, but that is a necessary inference—or if there has been an unusual and unnecessary quantity of printing done, and in this way the bill has been run up, then the error lies somewhere; it lies either in this House, in the Committee on Printing, or in the Public Printer. Bring it down as you may, it must come to a charge against the House, the Public Printer, or the Committee on Printing. Well, sir, I am willing to investigate the matter; but while we are investigating charges here of extraordinary extravagance on the part of the Printer, shall we continue him in office? We are asked to postpone the election in order that we may examine into this matter. If it be of sufficient magnitude to make us hold our hand, is it not of sufficient magnitude for us to get somebody else to carry on the printing ad interim?

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I wish to make a statement to the gentleman just at this point; and I desire to do it because it is known to all the members of the House that I was one of the warm friends of Mr. Wendell. I did not do him much good, but I did all I could for him, because I believe him to be an honest man, and a good printer. I state here, by his authority, that he adheres to, and feels himself honorably bound by, the action of the Democratic caucus, and that he supports the nominee of that caucus.

Mr. KEITT. Oh, I suppose so. I am only arguing against the suggestions of the gentleman from Virginia. I have no doubt the Democratic party will stick to their nominee. Those who know as well as I do what good disciplinarians they are, will have no doubt about that. I do not belong to that party myself. I am a sort of outsider. I did not go into the caucus. I am not bound by its decision. I shall vote for its nominee because he suits me: if he had not done so, I should have voted against him. I am arguing now only against the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia for a postponement of the election. I say that if there is any necessity at all for a postponement upon the ground which has been stated by him, then we should at once get rid of the present Printer, and elect some one to fill his place ad interim. Why not then accept the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN]—go on now and elect a Printer ad interim, and then raise a committee of investigation afterwards. I believe, sir, I will move the previous question.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I hope the gentleman will let me say a word or two. I am very glad of the remark made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. SMITH], because it shows that I have no connection with Mr. Wendell.

Mr. KEITT. Oh, I did not charge that you had any.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. It shows that I had no purpose to subvert his interests. Now I shall be perfectly satisfied if gentlemen will agree to elect a Printer pro tempore, and not for the Congress. I do not care who he may be. But my object is to prevent an election for the entire Congress, giving vested rights, and placing any reform beyond the power of the House. Can any gentleman who really desires the good of the country, and sound, healthy reform in the public expenditures, object to that? Can the gentleman from South Carolina object to it?

I have already read a section from the act creating the existing establishment, to show that Congress itself has guarded the rights that may vest in this officer at his election, and provided that they shall not be taken away from him. I say again, that I have no personal interest in the world in this matter. Gentlemen can see, from the statement made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. SMITH], that I am in connection with nobody. I did not even consult a colleague or brother member upon this question. It is my own movement, and, thank God! I am very much in the habit of acting just as I please.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I desire to say a word, because I am very anxious that we shall not get into a wrangle at this time in reference to the organization of the House. I am satisfied that it will do harm and no good. I think that all these imputations of corruption that go out in every direction against both sides are only bringing discredit upon Congress, are doing no good to the country, and are stopping up and clogging the business of the House. As a friend of Mr. Wendell, I state that he stands by the action of the caucus, and will not inquire into the means by which the nomination was obtained. I do not know Mr. Steadman. I was very much mortified at Mr. Wendell's defeat. But the best way, in my judgment, is to go on and elect a Printer. Let us have no distraction in the House as we had two years ago. And then, if an investigation is needed, let a committee be raised; and, as a friend of Mr. Wendell, I say that he bids defiance to all who charge him with corruption. I am for Mr. Steadman, and I am in favor of going on with the election of a Public Printer now, and having no wrangle here, which can have the effect only to bring discredit upon the House of Representatives.

Mr. KEITT. I will now yield the floor to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON], to enable him to modify his resolution.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON THE PRESIDENT.

The Committee on the part of the House, appointed yesterday to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him of the assembling and organization of Congress, and that the House was prepared to receive any communication he desired to make, appeared at the bar; when

Mr. FLORENCE, the chairman of the committee, reported that the committee had performed the duty assigned to them, and that the President had replied that he would immediately communicate to the House a message in writing.

ELECTION OF PUBLIC PRINTER—AGAIN.

Mr. HOUSTON. I propose to modify my motion, and put it in the form of a resolution; not that I believe in the correctness of the conclusions of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH], for I do not. I have no doubt we have the power at any time to reduce or in any way change the rates of pay or any other part of the law regulating that subject, but I do not wish to argue the question with him at this time, because I do not want to consume the time of the House in useless debate; nor do I want to see those with whom I act seem to be placed in opposition to ample and proper reforms in the public printing. I am willing that the matter shall be investigated. If abuses exist, let them be exposed, and let the law be so modified as to secure the public interests, and to secure, as far as we can, the fidelity and good conduct of the officer we may elect. I do not desire to comment at all upon the very extraordinary zeal of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH]. New lights seem to have broken in upon the vision of my distinguished friend, who, notwithstanding he has been for many years a member of the House of Representatives, has until now remained perfectly quiet, and even silent, upon the subject of the enormous profits of the Public Printer. I will pass that by for the present. I propose to modify my resolution, so as to put it in a shape to which there can, I think, be no objection, and I will accept, as an addition to it, the first part of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HOUSTON's resolutions, as modified, are as follows:

Resolved, That the House now proceed to the election of a Printer for the House of Representatives during the Thirty-Fifth Congress, with the proviso that the House retains the right in Congress to modify the existing law on the subject of public printing, as it may see proper, the Printer who may be elected under this resolution receiving said appointment or election with and upon the condition above set forth.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed by the Speaker to examine into the laws in relation to the printing for the House of Representatives, the prices paid therefor, and the duties of the Public Printer, whose duty it shall be to report thereon, with the least practicable delay, together with such change or improvement therein as they may deem advisable.

Mr. KEITT. I now call the previous question.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I am willing to withdraw the last resolution; but I take this occasion, while I am on the floor—

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The gentleman from South Carolina has moved the previous question.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order. It is, that this last resolution which was offered as an amendment, is not in order, as it proposes a modification on the part of the House which would dispense with the law of the land.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is a matter of construction for the House, and not for the Speaker.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I wish to discuss the question of order.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I suggest that debate cannot exist on the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is very well aware of that. The gentleman from Kentucky cannot discuss the question of order.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I can draw attention, I suppose, to the question of order, so as to make it understood.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can state his point of order.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman will indulge me so far as not to call the previous question, and let me state my question of order, that the House may understand it. I do not raise it from captious motives, or from any other desire than that the House may not do what in my opinion would be a vain act.

Mr. KEITT withdrew the call for the previous question.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The gentleman from South Carolina having withdrawn the call for the previous question, I wish to call the attention of the House—

Mr. GROW. I object to the gentleman withdrawing it with the condition that he shall have the floor again. I object to gentlemen farming out the floor.

The SPEAKER. Before the gentleman from Kentucky proceeds, the Chair desires to understand whether the previous question has been withdrawn?

Mr. KEITT. It is withdrawn for the time being; but I hold the floor.

Mr. SEWARD. Then I object.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. It is a matter of construction whether the gentleman holds the floor or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would notify the gentleman from South Carolina that he cannot hold the floor, objection being made to it, if he withdraws the previous question.

Mr. KEITT, (to Mr. MARSHALL.) Will you renew it?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The eighth section of the law as it stands is this:

"There shall be elected a Public Printer for each House of Congress, to do the public printing for the Congress for which he or they may be chosen."

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The annual message, in writing, of the President of the United States, was here received by the hands of his Private Secretary.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the message will be read at once by consent of the House.

Mr. GROW. I desire to ask whether, if the message be read now, it will be open to discussion while this question stands pending?

The SPEAKER. When the question arises the Chair will decide it.

Mr. GROW. Then I will object to the reading of the message. I desire to state my point. Here is a question pending before the House. Now, if the message come in and be read by unanimous consent—

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order.

Mr. GROW. I want to state my point of order.

The SPEAKER. There is no point of order before the House, except that of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL].

Mr. GROW. I make a point of order on the reading of the message.

The SPEAKER. There can be no point of order raised, inasmuch as the House is already entertaining one point of order raised by the gentleman from Kentucky. The message can only be read by unanimous consent. If objection be made, it cannot be read.

Mr. GROW. I would state my objection to be because the message cannot be open to be acted upon till this other question is disposed of. If there be unanimous consent that it should be, then I make no objection. I do not object to having it read if it be left open for debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Pennsylvania to object to the message being read.

Mr. GROW. The Chair does not understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I made no objection to the reading, if it be read by unanimous consent, and left open for action.

The SPEAKER. But if not, you do object.

Mr. GROW. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Exactly. That is what the Chair understood.

Several MEMBERS. There is no objection made.

The SPEAKER. Very well. The Clerk will report the message.

The message was then read. It will be found in the Appendix.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the message be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be printed; and on that I ask the previous question.

Mr. BANKS. I wish the gentleman from Tennessee to so far modify his motion as to provide that one copy of the message and reports of the Secretaries be printed for each member of the House, so that we shall have them in two or three days, at furthest.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. We could not have them so early, I suppose.

Mr. BANKS. I mean only copies of the message and of the reports of the heads of the Departments. We could have them in two or three days. Otherwise we may have to wait for eight or ten weeks. The expense would be very slight indeed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That is a departure from the general rule, and I do not wish it.

Mr. BANKS. I ask the House to vote down the call for the previous question till the amendment I have suggested be put in.

Mr. BOYCE. I move that twenty thousand extra copies be printed.

The SPEAKER. That motion would of necessity go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BOYCE. No, not necessarily; not in reference to the President's message.

Mr. BANKS. I ask leave to present an amendment, providing that the message and reports of the Secretaries shall be printed, one copy for each member of the House, so that we can have them in two or three days.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. As the gentleman from Massachusetts seems to have some interest in it, I have no objection to his proposition. I accept it.

Mr. BANKS's proposition, as accepted by Mr. JONES, was read as follows:

That the President's message and the reports of the Secretaries of the Departments be printed together—one copy for each member of the House.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, under its operation, Mr. JONES's motion, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOYCE. I move that twenty thousand extra copies of the President's message and accompanying documents be printed.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances, equally important with any other document we shall have, I understand is upon the Speaker's table. It is not necessary that it should be read, and I ask that it be ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. If it is the pleasure of the House, the Chair will present the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury upon the state of the finances.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that it be laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FLORENCE. It has been the practice to order an extra number of the President's message and accompanying documents to be printed. There is no Committee, as yet, upon Printing. I desire to expedite this work, and by a resolution of the House it can go immediately to the Public Printer.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will remark that the law requires that a motion to print an extra number of any document shall go to the Committee on Printing. As soon as the committee is organized it must be taken up by them.

Mr. FLORENCE. It has been the practice to print the message and accompanying documents without referring the matter to the committee.

The SPEAKER. An order to print the usual number has already been made.

Mr. FLORENCE. But not for extra numbers.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that twenty thousand copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury upon the finances be printed for the use of the House, and one thousand copies for the use of the Secretary.

The motion was referred, under the rule, to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I suppose it is the duty of that committee to report a resolution for printing extra numbers.

The SPEAKER. The subject-matter is brought to the attention of the committee by motions made in the House, which motions will be referred to the Committee on Printing as soon as organized.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I suppose when the report comes in it will be time to make objection in reference to printing extra numbers. I desire to break up the habit of printing extravagant numbers of public documents.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I believe it is the law, and not the rule of this House, which requires all motions to print extra numbers to go to the Committee on Printing. When the committee reports, the subject is open for discussion, and the House can determine what they will have.

The SPEAKER then, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following communications; which were severally laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed:

A communication from the Department of State, showing the expenditure of the contingent fund of that Department, and other contingent expenses;

A letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting an abstract of returns of registered American seamen for the year ending September 30, 1857; and

A communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a statement of the contingent expenses of that Department.

THE PUBLIC PRINTER.

The SPEAKER. The message and accompanying documents being disposed of, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KEITT. I wish it understood that I yield the floor to the gentleman from Kentucky upon one condition—that he renews the call for the previous question after he closes his remarks. Otherwise I do not yield the floor. The gentleman from Kentucky wants this discussion to go on; I do not want it to proceed.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I do not want any question with the gentleman as to whether I am upon the floor; nor do I understand that it is competent for him to say whether I have the floor or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asked the question of the gentleman from South Carolina, whether he yielded the floor? The Chair understood that he did, and upon that understanding recognized the gentleman from Kentucky. The objection of the gentleman from South Carolina comes too late, the gentleman from Kentucky being upon the floor unconditionally.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I obtained the floor for the purpose of making a point of order, and, therefore, I shall not discuss the propriety of electing a Public Printer at this time. The only object I have in view is to bring the House to a proper conclusion on the amendment. My point of order is framed upon the proposition contained in the eighth section of the law of 1852, which reads as follows:

"There shall be elected a Public Printer for each House of Congress to do the public printing for Congress for which he or they may be chosen, and such printing for the Executive Departments and bureaus of the Government of the United States as may be delivered to him or them, to be printed by the Superintendent of the Public Printing. The following rates of compensation shall be paid," &c.

The modification of the original proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, and which the gentleman from Alabama appears to have accepted, proposes that this House shall go into the election of a Public Printer, and that he shall take an office, created by law, with a condition put upon it by the House—all of which is clearly illegal and improper; and, although it might sound one way to the country, it will mean a different thing under the construction which will be put upon it by the courts. In other words, if the Chair shall rule it in order, and the House adopt the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, as modified, it will be no more nor less than going into the election of a Public Printer now; and I suggest to the party having the power of the House, that the resolution will read more gracefully and more properly, if they will say that they intend to elect a Public Printer, and that he shall have what by law belongs to him.

Mr. BOCKOCK obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. My desire is to get before the House the proposition as I designed to modify it.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is my proposition.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I modify my own proposition. I propose to retain my proposition as it originally stood.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from Virginia withdrew his proposition after I modified mine; and the previous question having been called, he has no right to renew it now.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I only agreed to withdraw one branch of it; and the previous question has not been sustained, nor is it pending. I ask, in all justice, to be allowed to modify my own proposition. I believe members have that right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, upon inquiring of the Clerk, is informed that the gentleman from Virginia was not understood to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Certainly not. Upon reflection, I conclude to modify my first proposition. That is done every day. I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. KEITT. I object.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I contend that I have the right to do so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to know whether the gentleman did withdraw his proposition or not? If he did, of course there can be no modification. If he did not, he can modify his proposition.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I did not withdraw my proposition, sir. I only agreed to a partial modification of one of the resolutions which I offered, and it was accepted by the gentleman from Alabama. I propose now to modify my resolution. My main resolution—the first one—is still before the House. I never gave it up at all, nor did I undertake to do it.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I must claim the floor now; but if, at the conclusion of my remarks, my colleague appeals to me to yield him the floor, I will do so. I want to go on now and say what I have to say.

And, in the first place, in relation to the position taken by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] I wish to say that it is a question of legal construction, and not a point of order. I do not contend for a single moment, Mr. Speaker, that a resolution of this House can repeal a law; but the fact that a resolution of this House cannot repeal a law of the land does not deprive us of the parliamentary power to pass the resolution. I say, then, it is not a question of order, but it is a question of construction.

Having thus disposed of that matter, I wish to state furthermore, that in relation to many of the positions taken by my colleague [Mr. SMITH] in the remarks which he made this morning, and in the objects to the accomplishment of which his resolutions look, I entirely and cordially sympathize. But I must confess that I have my doubts if the extraordinary amounts are paid for the public printing which my colleague says. I have my doubts whether my colleague could find a man willing, as soon as the election of a Printer is made, to pay $250,000 for the contract for printing. He may think so; he may have been told so; but when the money came to be raised he would find that he was mistaken.

But what I wish to say in relation to this matter is, that I do not understand the law to which my colleague has referred, and to which the gentleman from Kentucky has referred, as depriving this House of the power, at any time it chooses, of altering, modifying, and reducing the rates paid to the Public Printer. Mr. Speaker, I ask the attention of gentlemen to the language of the law. The law provides that a Public Printer shall be elected for the Congress, but it does not say that the rates of pay for the Congress shall be so and so. The law provides that a Public Printer shall be elected for the Congress, but it declares in general terms that the prices of printing shall be so and so, all the time leaving it at the power of Congress. Suppose, sir, an office is created which is to be held for life, and the rates of pay of that office are fixed at a certain amount: does that, I ask you, preclude the legislative authorities of the country forever from reducing those rates of pay? Not at all, sir; not at all. We, Mr. Speaker, are elected to the Congress of the United States for two years. We come here at a certain rate of pay. By our own action during the last Congress we increased that rate of pay. I submit it to my colleague, and to gentlemen upon this floor, if we had a right to increase our regular pay, had not we a right also to reduce that pay? The law says, in general terms, that the rates of pay shall be so and so, and such and such, but it does not say how long they shall be so; it does not say that they shall remain the rates of pay during the Congress, or even during a session. The law merely provides that the pay shall be so and so until otherwise provided by law.

And not only so, Mr. Speaker, but I stand here authorized to say in behalf of the gentleman who has been nominated by the Democratic party as its candidate for Public Printer, that that is his construction of the law, and that he will interpose no objection to any modification that may hereafter be made.

Now, sir, if these things be so, why, I ask, should not we proceed at once to an organization of this House? Why should we keep the House agitated in relation to the subject? Why not conclude our organization and go to work? And, as gentlemen have said frequently, why not show to the country the great contrast between the executive power of the party to which we belong, and that which controlled this House in the last Congress of the United States? Instead of taking weeks and weeks to organize, let us complete our organization here on the second day of the session, and then I pledge to my colleague my cordial cooperation to ferret out corruption and extravagance and everything hostile, as far as we can find it out, to the public interests. I promised to yield him the floor at the conclusion of my remarks, if he desired it.

Messrs. SMITH of Virginia, and GROW, simultaneously addressed the Speaker, who assigned the floor to the latter.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I have not yet yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that the gentleman had done so.

Mr. BOCKOCK. No, sir; but I will yield it now for a moment or two to my colleague, [Mr. SMITH.]

Mr. GROW. I object to this farming out of the floor on one side of the House all day. It is not fair.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I do not want to make a speech. Just let me get my resolutions before the House in the form in which I desire them to stand. My proposition, the House will recollect, involved the postponement of this election until a certain examination could be made. The second resolution, partially carrying out that design, was, at the suggestion made by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Housen], withdrawn by me, or rather, I submitted to his modification; but, upon reflection, I am satisfied that my views cannot be carried out without the adoption of that second resolution in a somewhat modified shape, and I ask that it be now read as I have modified it.

Mr. BOCKOCK. With the understanding that my colleague's proposition shall be read, I now call the previous question.

Mr. GROW. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to withdraw the call. I do not propose to enter into a discussion with reference to the candidates for Printer, but I desire to say a word or two upon the subject of the public printing.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I am willing to withdraw the call, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will renew it when he has concluded his remarks.

Mr. GROW. I do not like to do that. I shall not take five minutes.

Several MEMBERS, (to Mr. Bockock.) Insist on the previous question.

Mr. GROW. I will consent to do it, if it is necessary to make a bargain to obtain the floor of the House.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

The resolutions offered by Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, as modified by him, were then read, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of — be appointed by the Speaker to examine into the laws in relation to the printing for the House of Representatives, the prices paid therefor, and the duties of the Public Printer, whose duty it shall be to report thereon with the least practicable delay, together with such change or improvement therein as they may deem advisable.

And be it further resolved, That until such report and action thereon by this House, the election of Public Printer shall be postponed; and that, in the mean time, the Clerk of the House shall have such printing executed on the best terms practicable as may be required by the House.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I withdraw my point of order to the resolutions as modified.

Mr. GROW. It is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to prolong this debate, nor to enter into any discussion in regard to the person who should be selected as Printer of this House. I have only sought the floor to say one word on the abuse of public printing that has been commented on to-day. The abuse begins with the orders of this House. You have brought up your cost of printing—as has been alleged to-day by the gentleman from Virginia—to $2,000,000. And how is the reform to begin? Not by making charges of corruption and malfeasance against your officer acting under your orders. A person wants a book printed; he comes to this House, and a majority of this House order one, two, or three hundred thousand copies of it printed. Thus the Government printing office is converted into a great book manufactory; and to-day we send over this country book after book that is hardly worth the paper on which it is printed.

It is the order of the House of Representatives, and your Printer is entitled to his pay for the books which you order. Then let the reform begin here by curtailing this enormous expenditure, by ceasing your orders for publishing books, and by discontinuing the plan of converting the Government printing office into a rival establishment of the book manufactories of the country. I am against all printing that is not in the direct legitimate line of the Government business.

Mr. SAVAGE. I rise to a point of order. I do not think that this discussion is at all pertinent to the question that we have got before us. I have submitted to it a good while. I would rather have the execution of the order than have this discussion. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] has said enough to meet what has been said on this side. My point of order is, that the discussion is irrelevant to the question before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania are in order. He thinks they are directly pertinent to the subject before the House.

Mr. GROW. I have no more remarks to make. I have been seeking the floor to-day simply to call the attention of members to the origin of the abuses they are complaining of. I promised the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Bockock,] as the only way by which I could obtain the floor, after trying for it all day, that I would call the previous question. I therefore do so, and leave it with the House to vote it down if they like.

Mr. RITCHIE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at three o'clock and fifteen minutes, p. m.) the House adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 9, 1857.

Prayer by Rev. STEPHEN P. HILL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances; which was, on motion of Mr. BIGGS, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate, a letter of the Secretary of State, communicating, in obedience to law, an abstract of returns of American seamen; which was, on motion of Mr. SEWARD, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of State, made in obedience to law, showing the disbursements of that Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857, including disbursements for contingent expenses of foreign intercourse; which was, on motion of Mr. HAMLIN, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. SEWARD, it was Ordered, That W. G. Bucknor, executor of John J. Bulow, jr., have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

RESOLUTIONS OF CALIFORNIA.

Mr. GWIN presented a resolution of the Legislature of California in favor of the payment of the claim of A. M. Winn, for money expended by him for charitable purposes in the city of Sacramento, California, in 1849 and 1850; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of California in favor of the speedy construction of a national railroad from the valley of the Mississippi to some point in California; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of California in favor of the establishment of certain mail routes in that State; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. PUGH gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill for the improvement of navigation at the falls of the Ohio river.

Also, a bill to provide for the survey of the Ohio river, and its principal tributaries.

Also, a bill to authorize writs of error in all cases prosecuted by indictment.

Mr. GWIN gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to authorize and facilitate the construction of a northern, a southern, and a central Pacific railroad and magnetic telegraph through the Territories of the United States.

Also, a bill to organize the Territory of Arizona, and to create the office of surveyor general therein, to provide for the examination of certain land claims, to grant donations to actual settlers, to survey the public and private lands, and for other purposes.

CHAPLAINS TO THE SENATE.

Mr. MASON. I submitted a resolution the other day upon the subject of Chaplains to the Senate, which, unless any gentleman wishes further time to consider the subject, I ask to have taken up for action.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. Mason on Monday last:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate be authorized and requested to invite such clergymen as the office may be acceptable to, to officiate as Chaplains to the Senate during the present session, and in such alternation as may be agreeable to them.

Mr. COLLAMER. This resolution requests the President to invite all clergymen to whom the office may be acceptable to officiate as Chaplains. It seems to me that it will be somewhat impracticable to carry it out, and that it will give a great deal of trouble to our President. The office might be acceptable to clergymen from every part of the Union visiting friends here, and that would be constantly interfering with any arrangement which might be made with the clergymen of the city on whom we could rely. If we relied on the clergymen of the city, they could arrange among themselves the order in which they should officiate; whereas, if the invitation be extended to all clergymen, we never can know when they are to attend and when not. I therefore move that the words "of the city of Washington" be inserted after the word "clergymen."

Mr. MASON. It would be better to insert the words "of the District of Columbia."

Mr. COLLAMER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. MASON. I accept the modification. I have no choice in the matter one way or the other. I offered the resolution in order that we might dispose, in this general way, of the subject of a Chaplain to the Senate. Every Senator, I have no doubt, has had some experience (I think it is very unfortunate, but perhaps it is incident to the subject-matter) that a sort of competition has grown up by the usage of the Senate in electing a Chaplain, which I have thought is not altogether consistent with the office of a clergyman or a pastor. I will not say, by any means, a competition so much among the clergymen themselves, perhaps, as amongst Senators, who desire to prefer particular persons; but the fact is that it has become a matter of that kind, and it is not entirely agreeable to me, certainly, and I dare say is not to other Senators, to have that state of things existing.

My idea of the practice that will arise under this resolution, especially now, since it is confined to the clergymen of the District of Columbia, is that the President of the Senate, at the commencement of each session of Congress, will submit to the clergymen of the District that those to whom the office may be agreeable shall arrange among themselves and prescribe the mode in which they shall alternate, in order that we may have their services every morning as usual, and that the service so proffered shall be gratuitous—which is the true footing, I have always understood, of a clergyman's position. Whether there may not be a proper acknowledgment of the services of these gentlemen at the end of the session, every Senator will decide for himself. My own opinion is fixed on that point.

Mr. BIGGS. Mr. President, I understand, from the remarks of the honorable Senator from Virginia, that the design and object of this resolution is substantially to abolish the office of Chaplain as it has heretofore existed under the practice of the Senate, and to invite the clergymen of this District to open the daily sessions of this House with prayer. I am apprehensive, however, that there may be some difficulty in attaining this object, on account of the wording of the resolution. I am glad that the Senator from Virginia has introduced this resolution. It seems to me a very appropriate one, in view of all the circumstances that surround the Senate and the practice that has heretofore obtained on the subject. I would suggest, however, in order to avoid any difficulty hereafter, that the resolution be amended so as to attain, beyond all doubt, what is desired by myself, as well as, I believe, by the Senator from Virginia, by adding to it the words: "And that the office of Chaplain of the Senate is hereby abolished."

Mr. MASON. I do not understand that there is any such office as Chaplain to the Senate. I do not remember whether there is a rule on the subject; but the usage of the Senate has been (in conformity, I suppose, to the general public opinion of the land) that our duties here should be commenced by a proper appeal to the Almighty every morning; but I do not look upon it as an office. I certainly do not at all contemplate interfering with the usage of opening our deliberations in the morning with Divine services; but on the contrary, to continue it and to place it on what seems to me a more reputable and more proper footing. If the honorable Senator were to offer a proposition to abolish the office, it would perhaps engender some difference of opinion among Senators, which I would rather avoid.

Mr. BIGGS. My object is precisely the same as that of the Senator from Virginia. I am decidedly with him as to the manner of opening the daily sessions with prayer. I think it is entirely proper. But if I understand the usage of the Senate, connected with the rules of this body and some joint resolutions that have been passed by both Houses, the office of Chaplain is recognized. So far as I am concerned, my object will be attained if the effect of this resolution be to rid us of the office without introducing any amendment at all—and I understand the Senator from Virginia in the resolution designs that. That being the design and effect of the resolution, my object is accomplished.

Mr. MASON. If there be any rule in relation to the Chaplain, I ask that the Chair direct it to be read; and if it be inconsistent with this resolution, I propose to repeal it.

Mr. HAMLIN. There is a joint rule on the subject between the two Houses.

The SECRETARY. It is a provision passed at each session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not aware of any rule for the joint action of both Houses on this subject.

Mr. MASON. I was not.

Mr. CLAY. I am opposed to the adoption of this resolution, believing, as I do, that it will prove both unwise and inexpedient in practice. The Senator from North Carolina, as I understand him, contemplates procuring the services of a Chaplain, without any remuneration whatever. I do not so understand the Senator from Virginia. I think we should not "muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn." I believe that "the laborer is worthy of his hire." I think we shall find, if we adopt this resolution, and it shall be construed as it is understood by the Senator from North Carolina, that patriotism will fail, that even religion will fail, to induce men to come here every morning gratuitously to pray for this body. I think, if we intend and desire to have the sessions of this body opened with daily prayer, we can only achieve that desire by employing and paying a man for the purpose. I do not myself see any serious objection to that. In these degenerate days, I know none of the clergy who live purely by charity, who take their staff and walk abroad, getting their daily meals and their clothing, as wayfaring men, from every good Samaritan they may meet. I know, in my own State, that all the stationed clergy receive regular salaries or compensation for their services. I understand that it is so in this city. What right have we to expect that the clergymen of this city, purely for the honor of the thing, or purely for the sake of serving God, will come here and open our sessions with service without any compensation whatever? There is an old adage, and a very true one, that "what is everybody's business is nobody's business;" and, if we adopt the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, and empower you, sir, or the Vice President, to invite the clergymen of the city generally to officiate, we shall find that oftentimes we shall have to go to work without prayers. I trust that the resolution will not be adopted.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, I hope the honorable Senator who last addressed the Senate will reconsider the opinion he has formed on this subject, and suffer this resolution to pass. I have felt, ever since I have been here, that it brought scandal on the cause of the Christian religion to have an active canvass here for Chaplain; and I am very glad that there is a mode proposed by which that scandal can be hereafter removed.

The form which is suggested by the Senator from Virginia commends itself entirely to my approbation; and the more so because to me it is not new. So long as I have been acquainted with public affairs in the State of New York, or for nearly all that period—certainly for fifteen or twenty years—there has been no single appointment of a chaplain by the Legislature of New York; but each House of the Legislature, either severally or the two Houses together, pass a resolution substantially like this, intimating their desire that the clergymen of the city of Albany, the State capital, to be designated by the presiding officer or officers, shall alternately perform this religious service for the two Houses, at such times and under such arrangement as may be agreeable to them.

The difficulty which is suggested by the honorable Senator from Alabama does not exist there, because their resolution always closes with a provision that the usual amount of per diem shall be distributed amongst the clergymen who perform the service, in proportion to the number of days they attend. Such an amendment to this resolution would remove from it all objection, and would be perfectly proper. For one, I should have no objection to it; but, at the same time, I am quite willing that that part of the subject shall be postponed until we have made an experiment of the new mode; and then, at the close of the session, an appeal can be made to the Senate in regard to the Chaplains. I have no doubt it will be responded to as well at the end of the session as at the commencement. My desire is that the old system shall be changed, and I am quite willing to adopt the one now proposed.

Mr. MASON. Perhaps it is becoming, having offered the resolution, that I should say a single word in reply to the honorable Senator from Alabama. I have not conferred with the clergymen of the city of Washington or the District at all. I did show what I proposed to do, to the reverend and excellent gentleman who was Chaplain at the last session, [Rev. Mr. Hill,] who happened to be present, who is one of the clergymen of this city, and he said that he was satisfied it would be considered a compliment, and a very grateful one, to the clergy of the District. I have just learned, what I am told is an undoubted fact, that the first clergyman who officiated in the Continental Congress, was the late Bishop White, of Pennsylvania, and that he did it on the express condition that no compensation should be offered. I think, appreciating as I do the office of a clergyman—although they are a class of our fellow-citizens with whom it has not been my fortune to be much connected in any way, but I do appreciate their office—it will be peculiarly acceptable to the clergymen if presented in this form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the resolution; and it was adopted.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

On motion of Mr. DOUGLAS, the Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made by him yesterday, to print the President's message and accompanying documents, with fifteen thousand extra copies.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, when yesterday the President's message was read at the Clerk's desk, I heard it but imperfectly, and I was of the impression that the President of the United States had approved and indorsed the action of the Lecompton convention in Kansas. Under that impression, I felt it my duty to state that, while I concurred in the general views of the message, yet, so far as it approved or indorsed the action of that convention, I entirely dissented from it, and would avail myself of an early opportunity to state my reasons for my dissent. Upon a more careful and critical examination of the message, I am rejoiced to find that the President of the United States has not recommended that Congress shall pass a law to receive Kansas into the Union under the constitution formed at Lecompton. It is true that the tone of the message indicates a willingness on the part of the President to sign a bill if we shall see proper to pass one receiving Kansas into the Union under that constitution. But, sir, it is a fact of great significance, and worthy of consideration, that the President has refrained from any indorsement of the convention and from any recommendation as to the course Congress should pursue with regard to the constitution there formed.

The message of the President has made an argument—an unanswerable argument in my opinion—against that constitution, which shows clearly, whether intended to arrive at that result or not, that, consistently with his views and his principles, he cannot accept that constitution. He has expressed his deep mortification and disappointment that the constitution itself has not been submitted to the people of Kansas for their acceptance or rejection. He informs us that he has unqualifiedly expressed his opinions on that subject in his instructions to Governor Walker, assuming, as a matter of course, that the constitution was to be submitted to the people before it could have any vitality or validity. He goes further, and tells us that the example set by Congress in the Minnesota case, by inserting a clause in the enabling act requiring the constitution to be submitted to the people, ought to become a uniform rule, not to be departed from hereafter in any case. On these various propositions I agree entirely with the President of the United States, and I am prepared now to sustain that uniform rule which he asks us to pursue, in all other cases, by taking the Minnesota provision as our example.

I rejoice, on a careful perusal of the message, to find so much less to dissent from than I was under the impression there was, from the hasty reading and the imperfect hearing of the message in the first instance. In effect, he refers that document to the Congress of the United States—as the Constitution of the United States refers it—for us to decide upon it under our responsibility. It is proper that he should have thus referred it to us as a matter for congressional action, and not as an Administration or Executive measure, for the reason that the Constitution of the United States says that "Congress may admit new States into the Union." Hence we find the Kansas question before us now, not as an Administration measure, not as an Executive measure, but as a measure coming before us for our free action, without any recommendation or interference, directly or indirectly, by the Administration now in possession of the Federal Government. Sir, I propose to examine this question calmly and fairly, to see whether or not we can properly receive Kansas into the Union with the constitution formed at Lecompton.

The President, after expressing his regret and mortification and disappointment, that the constitution had not been submitted to the people in pursuance of his instructions to Governor Walker, and in pursuance of Governor Walker's assurances to the people, says, however, that by the Kansas-Nebraska act the slavery question only was required to be referred to the people, and the remainder of the constitution was not thus required to be submitted. He acknowledges that, as a general rule, on general principles, the whole constitution should be submitted; but according to his understanding of the organic act of Kansas, there was an imperative obligation to submit the slavery question for their approval or disapproval, but no obligation to submit the entire constitution. In other words, he regards the organic act, the Nebraska bill, as having made an exception of the slavery clause, and provided for the disposition of that question in a mode different from that in which other domestic or local, as contradistinguished from Federal questions, should be decided. Sir, permit me to say, with profound respect for the President of the United States, that I conceive that on this point he has committed a fundamental error, an error which lies at the foundation of his whole argument on this matter. I can well understand how that distinguished statesman came to fall into this error. He was not in the country at the time the Nebraska bill was passed; he was not a party to the controversy, and the discussion that took place during its passage. He was then representing the honor and the dignity of the country with great wisdom and distinction at a foreign court. Thus deeply engrossed, his whole energies were absorbed in conducting great diplomatic questions that diverted his attention from the mere territorial questions and discussions then going on in the Senate and the House of Representatives, and before the people at home. Under these circumstances, he may well have fallen into an error, radical and fundamental as it is, in regard to the object of the Nebraska bill and the principle asserted in it.

Now, sir, what was the principle enunciated by the authors and supporters of that bill when it was brought forward? Did we not come before the country and say that we repealed the Missouri restriction for the purpose of substituting and carrying out as a general rule the great principle of self-government, which left the people of each State and each Territory free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States? In support of that proposition, it was argued here, and I have argued it wherever I have spoken in various States of the Union, at home and abroad, everywhere I have endeavored to prove that there was no reason why an exception should be made in regard to the slavery question. I have appealed to the people if we did not all agree, men of all parties, that all other local and domestic questions, should be submitted to the people. I said to them "We agree that the people shall decide for themselves what kind of a judiciary system they will have; we agree that the people shall decide what kind of a school system they will establish; we agree that the people shall determine for themselves what kind of a banking system they will have, or whether they will have any banks at all; we agree that the people may decide for themselves what shall be the elective franchise in their respective States; they shall decide for themselves what shall be the rule of taxation and the principles upon which their finance shall be regulated; we agree that they may decide for themselves the relations between husband and wife, parent and child, guardian and ward; and why should we not then allow them to decide for themselves the relations between master and servant? Why make an exception of the slavery question by taking it out of that great rule of self-government which applies to all the other relations of life?" The very first proposition in the Nebraska bill was to show that the Missouri restriction, prohibiting the people from deciding the slavery question for themselves, constituted an exception to a general rule, in violation of the principle of self-government, and hence that that exception should be repealed, and the slavery question, like all other questions, submitted to the people to be decided for themselves.

Sir, that was the principle on which the Nebraska bill was defended by its friends. Instead of making the slavery question an exception, it removed an odious exception which before existed. Its whole object was to abolish that odious exception, and make the rule general, universal, in its application to all matters which were local and domestic, and not national or Federal. For this reason was the language employed which the President has quoted: that the eighth section of the Missouri act, commonly called the Missouri compromise, was repealed because it was repugnant to the principle of non-intervention established by the compromise measures of 1850, "it being the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States." We repealed the Missouri restriction because that was confined to slavery. That was the only exception there was to the general principle of self-government. That exception was taken away for the avowed and express purpose of making the rule of self-government general and universal, so that the people should form and regulate all their domestic institutions in their own way.

Sir, what would this boasted principle of popular sovereignty have been worth, if it applied only to the negro, and did not extend to the white man? Do you think we could have aroused the sympathies and the patriotism of this broad Republic, and have carried the presidential election last year in the face of a tremendous opposition, on the principle of extending the right of self-government to the negro question, but denying it as to all the relations affecting white men? No, sir. We aroused the patriotism of the country and carried the election in defense of that great principle, which allowed all white men to form and regulate their domestic institutions to suit themselves—institutions applicable to white men as well as to black men—institutions applicable to freemen as well as to slaves—institutions concerning all the relations of life, and not the mere paltry exception of the slavery question. Sir, I have spent too much strength and breath, and health, too, to establish this great principle in the popular heart, now to see it frittered away by bringing it down to an exception that applies to the negro, and does not extend to the benefit of the white man. As I said before, I can well imagine how the distinguished and eminent patriot and statesman now at the head of the Government fell into the error—for error it is, radical, fundamental, and, if persevered in, subversive of that platform upon which he was elevated to the Presidency of the United States.

Then, if the President be right in saying that, by the Nebraska bill, the slavery question must be submitted to the people, it follows inevitably that every other clause of the constitution must also be submitted to the people. The Nebraska bill said that the people should be left "perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way"—not the slavery question, not the Maine liquor-law question, not the banking question, not the school question, not the railroad question, but "their domestic institutions," meaning each and all the questions which are local, not national, State, not Federal. I arrive at the conclusion that the principles enunciated so boldly, and enforced with so much ability by the President of the United States, require us, out of respect to him and the platform on which he was elected, to send this whole question back to the people of Kansas, and enable them to say whether or not the constitution which has been framed, each and every clause of it, meets their approbation.

The President, in his message, has made an unanswerable argument in favor of the principle which requires this question to be sent back. It is stated in the message, with more clearness and force than any language which I can command; but I can draw your attention to it and refer you to the argument in the message, hoping that you will take it as a part of my speech—as expressing my idea more forcibly than I am able to express it. The President says that a question of great interest, like the slavery question, cannot be fairly decided by a convention of delegates, for the reason that the delegates are elected in districts, and in some districts a delegate is elected by a small majority; in others by an overwhelming majority; so that it often happens that a majority of the delegates are one way, while a majority of the people are the other way; and therefore it would be unfair, and inconsistent with the great principle of popular sovereignty, to allow a body of delegates, not representing the popular voice, to establish domestic institutions for the mass of the people. This is the President's argument to show that you cannot have a fair and honest decision without submitting it to the popular vote. The same argument is conclusive with regard to every other question as well as with regard to slavery.

But, Mr. President, it is intimated in the message that although it was an unfortunate circumstance, much to be regretted, that the Lecompton convention did not submit the constitution to the people, yet perhaps it may be treated as regular, because the convention was called by a Territorial Legislature which had been repeatedly recognized by the Congress of the United States as a legal body. I beg Senators not to fall into an error as to the President's meaning on this point. He does not say, he does not mean, that this convention had ever been recognized by the Congress of the United States as legal or valid. On the contrary, he knows, as we here know, that during the last Congress I reported a bill from the Committee on Territories to authorize the people of Kansas to assemble and form a constitution for themselves. Subsequently, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS] brought forward a substitute for my bill, which, after having been modified by him and myself in consultation, was passed by the Senate. It is known in the country as "the Toombs bill." It authorized the people of Kansas Territory to assemble in convention and form a constitution preparatory to their admission into the Union as a State. That bill, it is well known, was defeated in the House of Representatives. It matters not, for the purpose of this argument, what was the reason of its defeat. Whether the reason was a political one; whether it had reference to the then existing contest for the Presidency; whether it was to keep open the slavery question; whether it was a conviction that the bill would not be fairly carried out; whether it was because there were not people enough in Kansas to justify the formation of a State;—no matter what the reason was, the House of Representatives refused to pass that bill, and thus denied to the people of Kansas the right to form a constitution and State government at this time. So far from the Congress of the United States having sanctioned or legalized the convention which assembled at Lecompton, it expressly withheld its assent. The assent has not been given, either in express terms or by implication; and being withheld, this Kansas constitution has just such validity and just such authority as the Territorial Legislature of Kansas could impart to it without the assent, and in opposition to the known will, of Congress.

Now, sir, let me ask what is the extent of the authority of a Territorial Legislature as to calling a constitutional convention without the assent of Congress? Fortunately this is not a new question; it does not now arise for the first time. When the Topeka constitution was presented to the Senate nearly two years ago, it was referred to the Committee on Territories, with a variety of measures relating to Kansas. The committee made a full report upon the whole subject. That report reviewed all the irregular cases which had occurred in our history in the admission of new States. The committee acted on the supposition that whenever Congress had passed an enabling act authorizing the people of a Territory to form a State constitution, the convention was regular, and possessed all the authority which Congress had delegated to it; but whenever Congress had failed or refused to pass an enabling act, the proceeding was irregular and void, unless vitality was imparted to it by a subsequent act of Congress adopting and confirming it. The friends of the Topeka constitution insisted that although their proceedings were irregular, they were not so irregular but that Congress could cure the error by admitting Kansas with that constitution. They cited a variety of cases, amongst others the Arkansas case. In my report, sanctioned by every member of the Committee on Territories, except the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] I reviewed the Arkansas case as well as the others, and affirmed the doctrine established by General Jackson's administration and enunciated in the opinion of Mr. Attorney General Butler, a part of which opinion was copied into the report and published to the country at the time.

Now, sir, in order to ascertain what we understood on the 12th of March, 1856—little more than a year and a half ago—to be the true doctrine on this point, let me call your attention to the opinion of Mr. Butler in the Arkansas case. The Governor of the Territory of Arkansas sent a printed address to President Jackson, in which he stated that he had been urged to call together the Legislature of the Territory of Arkansas, for the purpose of allowing them to call a convention to form a constitution, preparatory to their admission into the Union as a State. The Governor stated that, in his opinion, the Legislature had no power to call such a convention without the assent of Congress first had and obtained; but he asked instructions on that point. The President referred the case to the Secretary of State, and he asked for the advice of the Attorney General, whose opinion was given, and adopted as the plan of action, and communicated to the Governor of Arkansas for his instruction. I will read some extracts from that opinion:

"Consequently, it is not in the power of the General Assembly of Arkansas to pass any law for the purpose of electing members to form a constitution and State government, or to do any other act, directly or indirectly, to create such new government. Every such law, even though it were approved by the Governor of the Territory, would be null and void. If passed by them, notwithstanding his veto, by a vote of two thirds of each branch, it would still be equally void.

"If I am right in the foregoing opinion, it will then follow that the course of the Governor, in declining to call together the Territorial Legislature for the purpose in question, was such as his legal duties required; and that the views he has expressed in his public address, and also in his official communication to yourself, so far as they indicate an intention not to sanction or concur in any legislative or other proceedings towards the formation of a State government until Congress shall have authorized it, are also correct."

That is what I have understood to be the settled doctrine as to the authority of a Territorial Legislature to call a convention without the consent of Congress first had and obtained. The reasoning is very clear and palpable. A Territorial Legislature possesses whatever power its organic act gives it, and no more. The organic act of Arkansas provided that the legislative power should be vested in the Territorial Legislature, the same as the organic act of Kansas provides that the legislative power and authority shall be vested in the Legislature. But what is the extent of that legislative power? It is to legislate for that Territory under the organic act, and in obedience to it. It does not include any power to subvert the organic act under which it was brought into existence. It has the power to protect it, the power to execute it, the power to carry it into effect; but it has no power to subvert, none to destroy; and hence that power can only be obtained by applying to Congress, the same authority which created the Territory itself. But while the Attorney General decided, with the approbation of the administration of General Jackson, that the Territorial Legislature had no power to call a convention, and that its action was void if it did, he went further:

"No law has yet been passed by Congress which either expressly or impliedly gives to the people of Arkansas the authority to form a State government."

Nor has there been any in regard to Kansas. The two cases are alike thus far. They are alike in all particulars so far as the question involving the legality and the validity of the Lecompton convention is concerned. The opinion goes on to say:

"For the reasons above stated, I am, therefore, of opinion that the inhabitants of that Territory have not at present, and that they cannot acquire otherwise than by an act of Congress, the right to form such a government."

General Jackson's administration took the ground that the people of Arkansas, by the authority of the Territorial Legislature, had not the power to hold a convention to form a constitution, and could not acquire it from any source whatever except from Congress. While, therefore, the legislative act of Arkansas was held to be void, so far as it assumed authority to authorize the calling of a convention to form a constitution, yet they did not hold, in those days, that the people could not assemble and frame a constitution in the form of a petition. I will read the rest of the opinion, in order that the Senate may understand precisely what was the doctrine on this subject at that day, and what the Committee on Territories understood to be the doctrine on this subject in March, 1856, when we put forth the Kansas report as embodying what we Nebraska men understood to be our doctrine at that time. Here it is. This was copied into that report:

"But I am not prepared to say that all proceedings on this subject, on the part of the citizens of Arkansas, will be illegal. They undoubtedly possess the ordinary privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States. Among these is the right to assemble and to petition the Government for the redress of grievances. In the exercise of this right, the inhabitants of Arkansas may peaceably meet together in primary assemblies, or in conventions chosen by such assemblies, for the purpose of petitioning Congress to abrogate the territorial government, and to admit them into the Union as an independent State. The particular form which they may give to their petition cannot be material, so long as they confine themselves to the mere right of petitioning, and conduct all their proceedings in a peaceable manner. And as the power of Congress over the whole subject is plenary and unlimited, THEY MAY ACCEPT ANY CONSTITUTION, HOWEVER FRAMED, WHICH IN THEIR JUDGMENT MEETS THE SENSE OF THE PEOPLE TO BE AFFECTED BY IT. If, therefore, the citizens of Arkansas think proper to accompany their petition with a written constitution, framed and agreed on by their primary assemblies, or by a convention of delegates chosen by such assemblies, I perceive no legal objection to their power to do so, nor to any measures which may be taken to collect the sense of the people in respect to it; provided, always, that such measures be commenced and prosecuted in a peaceable manner, in strict subordination to the existing territorial government, AND IN ENTIRE SUBSERVIENCY TO THE POWER OF CONGRESS TO ADOPT, REJECT, OR DISREGARD THEM, AT THEIR PLEASURE."

While the Legislature of Arkansas had no power to create a convention to frame a constitution, as a legal constitutional body, yet, if the people chose to assemble under such an act of the Legislature for the purpose of petitioning for redress of grievances, the assemblage was not illegal; it was not an unlawful assemblage; it was not such an assemblage as the military power could be used to disperse, for they had a right under the Constitution thus to assemble and petition. But if they assumed to themselves the right or the power to make a government, that assumption was an act of rebellion which General Jackson said it was his duty to put down with the military force of the country.

If you apply these principles to the Kansas convention, you find that it had no power to do any act as a convention forming a government; you find that the act calling it was null and void from the beginning; you find that the Legislature could confer no power whatever on the convention. That convention was simply an assemblage of peaceable citizens, under the Constitution of the United States, petitioning for the redress of grievances, and, thus assembled, had the right to put their petition in the form of a constitution if they chose; but still it was only a petition—having the force of a petition—which Congress could accept or reject, or dispose of as it saw proper. That is what I understand to be just the extent of the power and authority of this convention assembled at Lecompton. It was not an unlawful assemblage like that held at Topeka; for the Topeka constitution was made in opposition to the territorial law, and, as I thought, intended to subvert the government without the consent of Congress, but, as contended by their friends, not intended. If their object was to subvert it without the consent of Congress, it was an act of rebellion, which ought to have been put down by force. If it was a peaceable assemblage simply to petition and abide the decision of Congress on the petition, it was not an unlawful assemblage. I hold, however, that it was an unlawful assemblage. I hold that this Lecompton convention was not an unlawful assemblage; but, on the other hand, I hold that they had no legal power and authority to establish a government. They had a right to petition for a redress of grievances. They had a right in that petition to ask for the change of government from a territorial to a State government. They had a right to ask Congress to adopt the instrument which they sent to us as their constitution; and Congress, if it thought that paper embodied the will of the people of the Territory, fairly expressed, might, in its discretion, accept it as a constitution, and admit them into the Union as a State; or if Congress thought it did not embody the will of the people of Kansas, it might reject it; or if Congress thought it was doubtful whether it did embody the will of the people or not, then it should send it back and submit it to the people to have that doubt removed, in order that the popular voice, whatever it might be, should prevail in the constitution under which that people were to live.

So far as the act of the Territorial Legislature of Kansas calling this convention was concerned, I have always been under the impression that it was fair and just in its provisions. I have always thought the people should have gone together en masse and voted for delegates, so that the voice expressed by the convention should have been the unquestioned and united voice of the people of Kansas. I have always thought that those who staid away from that election stood in their own light, and should have gone and voted, and should have furnished their names to be put on the registered list, so as to be voters. I have always held that it was their own fault that they did not thus go and vote; but yet, if they chose, they had a right to stay away. They had a right to say that that convention, although not an unlawful assemblage, is not a legal convention to make a government, and hence we are under no obligation to go and express any opinion about it. They had a right to say, if they chose, "We will stay away until we see the constitution they shall frame, the petition they shall send to Congress; and when they submit it to us for ratification we will vote for it if we like it, or vote it down if we do not like it." I say they had a right to do either, though I thought, and think yet, as good citizens, they ought to have gone and voted; but that was their business and not mine.

Having thus shown that the convention at Lecompton had no power, no authority, to form and establish a government, but had power to draft a petition, and that petition, if it embodied the will of the people of Kansas, ought to be taken as such an exposition of their will, yet, if it did not embody their will, ought to be rejected—having shown these facts, let me proceed and inquire what was the understanding of the people of Kansas, when the delegates were elected? I understand, from the history of the transaction, that the people who voted for delegates to the Lecompton convention, and those who refused to vote—both parties—understood the territorial act to mean that they were to be elected only to frame a constitution, and submit it to the people for their ratification or rejection. I say that both parties in that Territory, at the time of the election of delegates, so understood the object of the convention. Those who voted for delegates did so with the understanding that they had no power to make a government, but only to frame one for submission; and those who staid away did so with the same understanding.

Now for the evidence. The President of the United States tells us, in his message, that he had unequivocally expressed his opinions, in the form of instructions to Governor Walker, assuming that the constitution was to be submitted to the people for ratification. When we look into Governor Walker's letter of acceptance of the office of Governor, we find that he stated expressly that he accepted it with the understanding that the President and his whole Cabinet concurred with him that the constitution, when formed, was to be submitted to the people for ratification. Then look into the instructions given by the President of the United States, through General Cass, the Secretary of State, to Governor Walker, and you there find that the Governor is instructed to use the military power to protect the polls when the constitution shall be submitted to the people of Kansas for their free acceptance or rejection. Trace the history a little further, and you will find that Governor Walker went to Kansas and proclaimed, in his inaugural and in his speeches at Topeka and elsewhere, that it was the distinct understanding, not only of himself, but of those higher in power than himself—meaning the President and his Cabinet—that the constitution was to be submitted to the people for their free acceptance or rejection, and that he would use all the power at his command to defeat its acceptance by Congress, if it were not thus submitted to the vote of the people.

Mr. President, I am not going to stop and inquire how far the Nebraska bill, which said the people should be left perfectly free to form their constitution for themselves, authorized the President, or the Cabinet, or Governor Walker, or any other territorial officer, to interfere and tell the convention of Kansas whether they should or should not submit the question to the people. I am not going to stop to inquire how far they were authorized to do that, it being my opinion that the spirit of the Nebraska bill required it to be done. It is sufficient for my purpose that the Administration of the Federal Government unanimously, that the administration of the territorial government, in all its parts, unanimously understood the territorial law under which the convention was assembled to mean that the constitution to be formed by that convention should be submitted to the people for ratification or rejection, and, if not confirmed by a majority of the people, should be null and void, without coming to Congress for approval.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1857.

NEW SERIES...No. 2.

Not only did the National Government and the territorial government so understand the law at the time, but, as I have already stated, the people of the Territory so understood it. As a further evidence on that point, a large number, if not a majority, of the delegates were instructed in the nominating conventions to submit the constitution to the people for ratification. I know that the delegates from Douglas county, eight in number, Mr. Calhoun, president of the convention, being among them, were not only instructed thus to submit the question, but they signed and published, while candidates, a written pledge that they would submit it to the people for ratification. I know that men, high in authority and in the confidence of the territorial and National Government, canvassed every part of Kansas during the election of delegates, and each one of them pledged himself to the people that no snap judgment was to be taken; that the constitution was to be submitted to the people for acceptance or rejection; that it would be void unless that was done; that the Administration would spurn and scorn it as a violation of the principles on which it came into power, and that a Democratic Congress would hurl it from their presence as an insult to Democrats who stood pledged to see the people left free to form their domestic institutions for themselves.

Not only that, sir, but up to the time when the convention assembled, on the 1st of September, so far as I can learn, it was understood everywhere that the constitution was to be submitted for ratification or rejection. They met, however, on the 1st of September, and adjourned until after the October election. I think it was wise and prudent that they should thus have adjourned. They did not wish to bring any question into that election which would divide the Democratic party, and weaken our chances of success in the election. I was rejoiced when I saw that they did adjourn, so as not to show their hand on any question that would divide and distract the party until after the election. During that recess, while the convention was adjourned, Governor Ransom, the Democratic candidate for Congress, running against the present Delegate from that Territory, was canvassing every part of Kansas in favor of the doctrine of submitting the constitution to the people, declaring that the Democratic party were in favor of such submission, and that it was a slander of the Black Republicans to intimate the charge that the Democratic party did not intend to carry out that pledge in good faith. Thus, up to the time of the meeting of the convention, in October last, the pretense was kept up, the profession was openly made, and believed by me, and I thought believed by them, that the convention intended to submit a constitution to the people, and not to attempt to put a government in operation without such submission. The election being over, the Democratic party being defeated by an overwhelming vote, the Opposition having triumphed, and got possession of both branches of the Legislature, and having elected their territorial Delegate, the convention assembled, and then proceeded to complete their work.

Now let us stop to inquire how they redeemed the pledge to submit the constitution to the people. They first go on and make a constitution. Then they make a schedule, in which they provide that the constitution, on the 21st of December—the present month—shall be submitted to all the bona fide inhabitants of the Territory on that day, for their free acceptance or rejection, in the following manner, to wit:—thus acknowledging that they were bound to submit it to the will of the people, conceding that they had no right to put it into operation without submitting it to the people, providing in the instrument that it should take effect from and after the date of its ratification, and not before; showing that the constitution derives its vitality, in their estimation, not from the authority of the convention, but from that vote of the people to which it was to be submitted for their free acceptance or rejection. How is it to be submitted? It shall be submitted in this form: "Constitution with slavery or constitution with no slavery." All men must vote for the constitution, whether they like it or not, in order to be permitted to vote for or against slavery. Thus a constitution made by a convention that had authority to assemble and petition for a redress of grievances, but not to establish a government—a constitution made under a pledge of honor that it should be submitted to the people before it took effect; a constitution which provides, on its face, that it shall have no validity except what it derives from such submission—is submitted to the people at an election where all men are at liberty to come forward freely without hindrance and vote for it, but no man is permitted to record a vote against it.

That would be as fair an election as some of the enemies of Napoleon attributed to him when he was elected First Consul. He is said to have called out his troops and had them reviewed by his officers with a speech, patriotic and fair in its professions, in which he said to them: "Now, my soldiers, you are to go to the election and vote freely just as you please. If you vote for Napoleon, all is well; vote against him, and you are to be instantly shot." That was a fair election. [Laughter.] This election is to be equally fair. All men in favor of the constitution may vote for it—all men against it shall not vote at all. Why not let them vote against it? I presume you have asked many a man this question. I have asked a very large number of the gentlemen who framed the constitution, quite a number of delegates, and a still larger number of persons who are their friends, and I have received the same answer from every one of them. I never received any other answer, and I presume we never shall get any other answer. What is that? They say if they allowed a negative vote the constitution would have been voted down by an overwhelming majority, and hence the fellows shall not be allowed to vote at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, that may be true. It is no part of my purpose to deny the proposition, that that constitution would have been voted down if submitted to the people. I believe it would have been voted down by a majority of four to one. I am informed by men well posted there—Democrats—that it would be voted down by ten to one; some say by twenty to one.

But is it a good reason why you should declare it in force, without being submitted to the people, merely because it would have been voted down by five to one if you had submitted it? What does that fact prove? Does it not show undeniably that an overwhelming majority of the people of Kansas are unalterably opposed to that constitution? Will you force it on them against their will simply because they would have voted it down if you had consulted them? If you will, are you going to force it upon them under the plea of leaving them perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way? Is that the mode in which I am called upon to carry out the principle of self-government and popular sovereignty in the Territories—to force a constitution on the people against their will, in opposition to their protest, with a knowledge of the fact, and then to assign, as a reason for my tyranny, that they would be so obstinate and so perverse as to vote down the constitution if I had given them an opportunity to be consulted about it?

Sir, I deny your right or mine to inquire of these people what their objections to that constitution are. They have a right to judge for themselves whether they like or dislike it. It is no answer to tell me that the constitution is a good one and unobjectionable. It is not satisfactory to me to have the President say in his message that that constitution is an admirable one, like all the constitutions of the new States that have been recently formed. Whether good or bad, whether obnoxious or not, is none of my business and none of yours. It is their business and not ours. I care not what they have in their constitution, so that it suits them and does not violate the Constitution of the United States and the fundamental principles of liberty upon which our institutions rest. I am not going to argue the question whether the banking system established in that constitution is wise or unwise. It says there shall be no monopolies, but there shall be one bank of issue in the State, with two branches. All I have to say on that point is, if they want a banking system let them have it; if they do not want it let them prohibit it. If they want a bank with two branches, be it so; if they want twenty it is none of my business, and it matters not to me whether one of them shall be on the north side and the other on the south side of the Kaw river, or where they shall be.

While I have no right to expect to be consulted on that point, I do hold that the people of Kansas have the right to be consulted and to decide it, and you have no rightful authority to deprive them of that privilege. It is no justification, in my mind, to say that the provisions for the eligibility for the offices of Governor and Lieutenant Governor require twenty years' citizenship in the United States. If men think that no person should vote or hold office until he has been here twenty years they have a right to think so; and if a majority of the people of Kansas think that no man of foreign birth should vote or hold office unless he has lived there twenty years, it is their right to say so, and I have no right to interfere with them; it is their business, not mine; but if I lived there I should not be willing to have that provision in the constitution without being heard upon the subject, and allowed to record my protest against it.

I have nothing to say about their system of taxation, in which they have gone back and resorted to the old exploded system that we tried in Illinois, but abandoned because we did not like it. If they wish to try it and get tired of it and abandon it, be it so; but if I were a citizen of Kansas I would profit by the experience of Illinois on that subject, and defeat it if I could. Yet I have no objection to their having it if they want it; it is their business, not mine.

So it is in regard to the free negroes. They provide that no free negro shall be permitted to live in Kansas. I suppose they have a right to say so if they choose; but if I lived there I should want to vote on that question. We, in Illinois, provide that no more shall come there. We say to the other States, "Take care of your own free negroes and we will take care of ours." But we do not say that the negroes now there shall not be permitted to live in Illinois; and I think the people of Kansas ought to have the right to say whether they will allow them to live there, and if they are not going to do so, how they are to dispose of them.

So you may go on with all the different clauses of the constitution. They may be all right; they may be all wrong. That is a question on which my opinion is worth nothing. The opinion of the wise and patriotic Chief Magistrate of the United States is not worth anything as against that of the people of Kansas, for they have a right to judge for themselves; and neither Presidents, nor Senates, nor Houses of Representatives, nor any other power outside of Kansas, has a right to judge for them. Hence it is no justification, in my mind, for the violation of a great principle of self-government, to say that the constitution you are forcing on them is not particularly obnoxious, or is excellent in its provisions.

Perhaps, sir, the same thing might be said of the celebrated Topeka constitution. I do not recollect its peculiar provisions. I know one thing: we Democrats, we Nebraska men, would not even look into it to see what its provisions were. Why? Because we said it was made by a political party, and not by the people; that it was made in defiance of the authority of Congress; that if it was as pure as the Bible, as holy as the ten commandments, yet we would not touch it until it was submitted to and ratified by the people of Kansas, in pursuance of the forms of law. Perhaps that Topeka constitution, but for the mode of making it, would have been unexceptionable. I do not know; I do not care. You have no right to force an unexceptionable constitution on a people. It does not mitigate the evil, it does not diminish the insult, it does not ameliorate the wrong, that you are forcing a good thing on them. I am not willing to be forced to do that which I would do if I were left free to judge and act for myself. Hence I assert that there is no justification to be made for this flagrant violation of popular rights in Kansas, on the plea that the constitution which they have made is not particularly obnoxious.

But, sir, the President of the United States is really and sincerely of the opinion that the slavery clause has been fairly and impartially submitted to the free acceptance or rejection of the people of Kansas, and that, inasmuch as that was the exciting and paramount question, if they get the right to vote as they please on that subject they ought to be satisfied; and possibly it might be better if we would accept it, and put an end to the question. Let me ask, sir, is the slavery clause fairly submitted, so that the people can vote for or against it? Suppose I were a citizen of Kansas, and should go up to the polls and say, "I desire to vote to make Kansas a slave State; here is my ballot." They reply to me, "Mr. Douglas, just vote for that constitution first, if you please." "Oh, no!" I answer, "I cannot vote for that constitution conscientiously. I am opposed to the clause by which you locate certain railroads in such a way as to sacrifice my county and my part of the State. I am opposed to that banking system. I am opposed to this Know Nothing or American clause in the constitution about the qualification for office. I cannot vote for it." Then they answer, "You shall not vote on making it a slave State." I then say, "I want to make it a free State." They reply, "Vote for that constitution first, and then you can vote to make it a free State; otherwise you cannot." Thus they disqualify every free-State man who will not first vote for the constitution; they disqualify every slave-State man who will not first vote for the constitution. No matter whether or not the voters state that they cannot conscientiously vote for those provisions, they reply, "You cannot vote for or against slavery here. Take the constitution as we have made it, take the elective franchise as we have established it, take the banking system as we have dictated it, take the railroad lines as we have located them, take the judiciary system as we have formed it, take it all as we have fixed it to suit ourselves, and ask no questions, but vote for it, or you shall not vote either for a slave or free State." In other words, the legal effect of the schedule is this: all those who are in favor of this constitution may vote for or against slavery, as they please; but all those who are against this constitution are disfranchised, and shall not vote at all. That is the mode in which the slavery proposition is submitted. Every man opposed to the constitution is disfranchised on the slavery clause. How many are they? They tell you there is a majority, for they say the constitution will be voted down instantly, by an overwhelming majority, if you allow a negative vote. This shows that a majority are against it. They disqualify and disfranchise every man who is against it, thus referring the slavery clause to a minority of the people of Kansas, and leaving that minority free to vote for or against the slavery clause, as they choose.

Let me ask you if that is a fair mode of submitting the slavery clause? Does that mode of submitting that particular clause leave the people perfectly free to vote for or against slavery as they choose? Am I free to vote as I choose on the slavery question, if you tell me I shall not vote on it until I vote for the Maine liquor law? Am I free to vote on the slavery question, if you tell me that I shall not vote either way until I vote for a bank? Is it freedom of election to make your right to vote upon one question depend upon the mode in which you are going to vote on some other question which has no connection with it? Is that freedom of election? Is that the great fundamental principle of self-government, for which we combined and struggled, in this body and throughout the country, to establish as the rule of action in all time to come?

The President of the United States has made some remarks in his message which it strikes me it would be very appropriate to read in this connection. He says:

"The friends and supporters of the Nebraska and Kansas act, when struggling on a recent occasion to sustain its wise provisions before the great tribunal of the American people, never differed about its true meaning on this subject. Everywhere throughout the Union they publicly pledged their faith and honor that they would cheerfully submit the question of slavery to the decision of the bona fide people of Kansas, without any restriction or qualification whatever. All were cordially united upon the great doctrine of popular sovereignty, which is the vital principle of our free institutions."

"Had it then been insinuated, from any quarter, that it would have been a sufficient compliance with the requisitions of the organic law for the members of a convention, thereafter to be elected, to withhold the question of slavery from the people, and to substitute their own will for that of a legally ascertained majority of their constituents, this would have been instantly rejected."

Yes, sir, and I will add further, had it been then intimated from any quarter, and believed by the American people, that we would have submitted the slavery clause in such a manner as to compel a man to vote for that which his conscience did not approve, in order to vote on the slavery clause, not only would the idea have been rejected, but the Democratic candidate for the Presidency would have been rejected; and every man who backed him would have been rejected too.

The President tells us in his message that the whole party pledged our faith and our honor that the slavery question should be submitted to the people, without any restriction or qualification whatever. Does this schedule submit it without qualification? It qualifies it by saying, "You may vote on slavery if you will vote for the constitution; but you shall not do so without doing that." That is a very important qualification—a qualification that controls a man's vote and his action and his conscience, if he is an honest man—a qualification confessedly in violation of our platform. We are told by the President that our faith and our honor are pledged that the slavery clause should be submitted without qualification of any kind whatever; and now am I to be called upon to forfeit my faith and my honor in order to enable a small minority of the people of Kansas to defraud the majority of that people out of their elective franchise? Sir, my honor is pledged; and before it shall be tarnished, I will take whatever consequences personal to myself may come; but never ask me to do an act which the President, in his message, has said is a forfeiture of faith, a violation of honor, and that merely for the expediency of saving the party. I will go as far as any of you to save the party. I have as much heart in the great cause that binds us together as a party as any man living. I will sacrifice anything short of principle and honor for the peace of the party; but if the party will not stand by its principles, its faith, its pledges, I will stand there, and abide whatever consequences may result from the position.

Let me ask you, why force this constitution down the throats of the people of Kansas, in opposition to their wishes and in violation of our pledges. What great object is to be attained? Cui bono? What are you to gain by it? Will you sustain the party by violating its principles? Do you propose to keep the party united by forcing a division? Stand by the doctrine that leaves the people perfectly free to form and regulate their institutions for themselves in their own way, and your party will be united and irresistible in power. Abandon that great principle, and the party is not worth saving, and cannot be saved, after it shall be violated. I trust we are not to be rushed upon this question. Why shall it be done? Who is to be benefited? Is the South to be the gainer? Is the North to be the gainer? Neither the North nor the South has the right to gain a sectional advantage by trickery or fraud.

But I am beseeched to wait until I hear from the election on the 21st of December. I am told that perhaps that will put it all right, and will save the whole difficulty. How can it? Perhaps there may be a large vote. There may be a large vote returned. [Laughter.] But I deny that it is possible to have a fair vote on the slavery clause; and I say that it is not possible to have any vote on the constitution. Why wait for the mockery of an election, when it is provided unalterably that the people cannot vote—when the majority are disfranchised?

But I am told on all sides, "Oh, just wait; the pro-slavery clause will be voted down." That does not obviate any of my objections; it does not diminish any of them. You have no more right to force a free-State constitution on Kansas than a slave-State constitution. If Kansas wants a slave-State constitution she has a right to it; if she wants a free-State constitution she has a right to it. It is none of my business which way the slavery clause is decided. I care not whether it is voted down or voted up. Do you suppose, after the pledges of my honor that I would go for that principle and leave the people to vote as they choose, that I would now degrade myself by voting one way if the slavery clause be voted down, and another way if it be voted up? I care not how that vote may stand. I take it for granted that it will be voted out. I think I have seen enough in the last three days to make it certain that it will be returned out, no matter how the vote may stand. [Laughter.]

Sir, I am opposed to that concern because it looks to me like a system of trickery and jugglery to defeat the fair expression of the will of the people. There is no necessity for crowding this measure, so unfair, so unjust as it is in all its aspects, upon us. Why can we not now do what we proposed to do in the last Congress? We then voted through the Senate an enabling act, called "the Toombs bill," believed to be just and fair in all its provisions, pronounced to be almost perfect by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. Hale,] only he did not like the man, then President of the United States, who would have to make the appointments. Why can we not take that bill, and, out of compliment to the President, add to it a clause taken from the Minnesota act, which he thinks should be a general rule, requiring the constitution to be submitted to the people, and pass that? That unites the party. You all voted, with me, for that bill, at the last Congress. Why not stand by the same bill now? Ignore Lecompton, ignore Topeka, treat both those party movements as irregular and void; pass a fair bill—the one that we framed ourselves when we were acting as a unit; have a fair election, and you will have peace in the Democratic party, and peace throughout the country, in ninety days. The people want a fair vote. They will never be satisfied without it. They never should be satisfied without a fair vote on their constitution.

If the Toombs bill does not suit my friends, take the Minnesota bill of the last session—the one so much commended by the President in his message as a model. Let us pass that as an enabling act, and allow the people of all parties to come together and have a fair vote, and I will go for it. Frame any other bill that secures a fair, honest vote to men of all parties, and carries out the pledge that the people shall be left free to decide on their domestic institutions for themselves, and I will go with you with pleasure, and with all the energy I may possess. But if this constitution is to be forced down our throats, in violation of the fundamental principle of free government, under a mode of submission that is a mockery and insult, I will resist it to the last. I have no fear of any party associations being severed. I should regret any social or political estrangement, even temporarily, but if it must be, if I cannot act with you and preserve my faith and my honor, I will stand on the great principle of popular sovereignty, which declares the right of all people to be left perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way. I will follow that principle wherever its logical consequences may take me, and I will endeavor to defend it against assault from any and all quarters. No mortal man shall be responsible for my action but myself. By my action I will compromise no man.

At the conclusion of the honorable gentleman's speech loud applause and clapping of hands resounded through the crowded galleries.

MR. MASON. I ask that the galleries may be cleared. The offenders against the peace and decorum of the Senate should be expelled. I move that the galleries be cleared.

Mr. PUGH. I think the Senator spoke rather too fast. There were but few applauders in the galleries.

Mr. BIGLER. I hope the Senator from Virginia will withdraw his motion.

Mr. MASON. I cannot withdraw the motion. This is not the first instance of an offense of this kind. The peace and decorum of the Senate must be preserved. I move that the galleries be cleared.

Mr. PUGH. I shall ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope the Senate will not entertain the motion. While I have no commendation to bestow on the applause which has been witnessed here on this occasion, it is true, as the Senator from Virginia says, that we have witnessed it on other occasions, and on other occasions differing much from the present—much indeed. I have often heard southern Senators on this floor applauded—not that I approved it then, not that I approve it now; but this is only the outburst of that feeling which shows how deep it is in the human heart. Even if it be an indiscretion which has been before as well as now committed, I hardly think it appropriate for the Senators to exclude from the gallery this audience. I hope it will not be done.

Mr. CLAY. I trust the Senator from Virginia will withdraw the motion. I disapprove this violation of the decorum of the Senate, but I think the offense commenced on the floor of this Chamber; and on the other side of it; and I do not think we should punish persons in the gallery and rebuke them for the example which was set them from the floor.

Mr. BIGLER. I concur most heartily with what the Senator from Alabama has said on this occasion, and I unite with him in urging my friend from Virginia to withdraw the motion. But a very small proportion participated in this demonstration, and it would be exceedingly harsh to force from the gallery the large number who had no part in it. Besides, this is the first demonstration at the present session.

There are, doubtless, very many people in the gallery just now who have never been there before, who do not know that they have not this privilege. This is the first notice to them; and admitting the impropriety, it would be certainly very severe to expel them from the gallery. There are many considerations which might be urged. Our people are impulsive, and whether they agree or disagree with the sentiments which the orator presents, if he is earnest in manner and feels deeply what he says, they are very likely to break out in applause. Whether this demonstration was intended as an indorsement of the sentiments uttered or not, as it was the first demonstration in a new Congress, I think the rule ought not to be rigidly enforced. I most solemnly object to it, and I hope the Senator from Virginia will withdraw the motion.

Mr. SEWARD. I entirely agree with the Senator from Virginia in the principle upon which this motion proceeds. I concur also with all the Senators who have appealed to him to withdraw the motion on the present occasion. It is, of course, an unpremeditated offense, and I am sure that it requires only a manifestation of the determination of the Senate to protect itself against offenses of this kind, to prevent their occurrence hereafter. I rose, however, more particularly to correct a mistake into which the honorable Senator from Alabama fell, which might possibly mislead the public, when he intimates that the applauses which were heard came from this side of the Chamber, and emanated from the floor. I am sure the honorable Senator did not mean to imply that among the persons occupying seats as Senators here, there was any offense against the proprieties of the Senate.

Mr. CLAY. I did not mean to say so, because my ear could not distinguish whether the applause proceeded from the floor or the backers, but I presume it came from the backers on that side.

Mr. SEWARD. Nothing of that kind has occurred on the part of those who are here responsible for their conduct as Senators.

Mr. MASON. I did not make the motion because the applause was evidence of a manifestation of the approbation of those who applauded; nor should I have made it if there had been given on the other hand any evidence of disapproba-tion. I made the motion in order to preserve the decorum and the propriety of the Senate, and solely for that purpose. I am perfectly aware that you cannot get at the offenders unless you clear the Chamber of all who are present except Senators; but it is the misfortune of those who are here properly, who respect the decorum of the Senate, and who respect their country, that there may be occasions when they should be accommodated in order that offenders may be reached.

Now, sir, I should persist in the motion, but that I see evidence around me, from the requests of Senators that, in their judgment, it should be foreborne on the present occasion. I trust that hereafter, if a like manifestation should be exhibited at any sentiments of any kind which may be promulgated on this floor, the Senate will preserve its dignity and decorum by clearing the Chamber. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the vote will now be taken on printing the message.

Mr. HALE. Let the proposition be read as it now stands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on adopting the following order:

Ordered, That the usual number of the message and documents be printed, and that fifteen thousand copies of the message and accompanying documents; in addition to the usual number, be printed for the use of the Senate, by the Printer of the Senate for the last Congress, at rates not exceeding those established by existing laws, and that all other orders for printing made, until a Printer shall be chosen, be executed by the late Printer on the same terms.

Mr. GWIN. It is proposed to strike out the provision for extra numbers.

Mr. COLLAMER. That does not remove the difficulty. At the last session, when we revised the rules, an arrangement was made in order to provide for just such a contingency as this. The difficulty, as stated by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] is, that when the usual number of a document is ordered to be printed, the type having been set up, and the work commenced, the order for the extra numbers is considered as comparatively of little cost, because the great body of the expense has been already incurred. Before the last session, it was the practice to refer to the Committee on Printing the simple question of printing extra numbers. If, however, reference be had to the rule, as revised at the last session, it will be ascertained that in all cases, with certain enumerated exceptions—and this is not one of them—all questions of printing are to be referred to the committee in the first instance. I say, therefore, that this motion to print even the ordinary number of the President's message and accompanying documents, must, by the rule, go to the Committee on Printing. If the Chair will read the rule, he will find it entirely explicit on this subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The 34th rule provides for "A Committee on Printing, to consist of three members; to whom shall be referred every question on the printing of documents, reports, or other matter transmitted by either of the Executive Departments, and all memorials, petitions, accompanying documents, together with all other matter, the printing of which shall be moved, excepting bills originating in Congress, resolutions offered by any Senator, communications from the Legislatures, or conventions lawfully called, of the respective States, and motions to print by order of the standing committees of the Senate; and excepting, also, messages and other communications from the President of the United States, and such reports and communications from the heads of Departments, as may be made to Congress, or to the Senate, in obedience to law, or in answer to calls from the Senate; motions to print additional numbers shall likewise be referred to said committee; and when the report shall be in favor of printing additional numbers, it shall be accompanied by an estimate of the probable cost."

It is the opinion of the Chair that, as we have no committees at present, it is not in order to refer the question.

Mr. BIGLER. It is not my intention, Mr. President, to speak to the mere proposition to print the message and documents; nor do I intend to-day, to attempt to address the Senate at length on the grave and difficult subject which has been unhappily precipitated upon this body. I never felt so much responsibility in my life. I never felt a greater anxiety to do my duty. Never since I have been connected with public affairs have I desired in my whole soul so much to do what would just be best for this great country. I feel my weakness, and how much I regret the suggestion I made yesterday evening, that I concurred with the President of the United States in the views he had taken and should endeavor to defend those views, for I now feel how much I am unprepared. But while I shall not make a speech to-day, I desire very briefly to notice some of the propositions of my friend from Illinois, which have fallen on my ears as most extraordinary.

It would be necessary, Mr. President, to a fair understanding of this question, to trace its history; and nothing have I regretted so much as that the Senator from Illinois did not stop in the first instance to look at this question in its true character. Still more am I pained with the remembrance that his feelings were not such as I had hoped they would be on a question so delicate and so dangerous, which he has labored so long and so ardently to allay.

Sir, I do not think it is entirely the part of a statesman to handle this question as though each particular view which he may hold can be distinctly carried out. The question should occur to his mind, what is best for the country under all the circumstances? It will not do to show to me that the constitutional convention of Kansas has been guilty of sins of omission or commission on the one hand, or that the Topeka movement was without authority of law and in derogation of the authority of the United States Government on the other. I look at this question as it is before us, in a spirit of concession and compromise, and, I trust, that measure of patriotism which will embrace all the States of this Union and the interests and rights of all the people, and inquire what shall we do? Has my friend from Illinois persuaded himself that, with the present state of feeling in the Territory of Kansas it is possible to have any measure carried out with precision and order? Are there no reasons to apprehend strife, and confusion, and violation of principle there? Has he any guarantee that whatever action Congress may take will secure a peaceful exercise of the elective franchise there to the entire inhabitants of that Territory? What is there in the history of Kansas to bring him to the conclusion that either party in power there will wield that power with moderation? I have long since abandoned that idea, and I have persuaded myself that patriotism and duty would require that Kansas should be admitted into the Union on the first allowable opportunity, for the sake of Kansas and the Union. From the day that Senator offered his bill in this Hall in 1854, to this hour, he has never witnessed the same measure of complication in the affairs of that Territory, or the same menacing aspect to the country.

The extraordinary things in the Senator's remarks that occurred to my mind are these: the importance that he attached to so much of the Kansas-Nebraska bill as declares that the people shall be left perfectly free to select their own domestic institutions. Will the Senator from Illinois contend that the people of Kansas are to look to that act for their right to form their ordinary institutions? Will he tell me that the Missouri line interposed against any of those rights, or that the repeal of it enlarged them or affected them in any possible way? Certainly not. The Missouri line had reference to slavery alone. His act of 1854 had reference to the institution of slavery only. It is that, and that alone, which has agitated the country. It is that to which we have reference mainly when speaking of the rights of the people of that Territory. That dangerous and agitating question it was which constrained the wisest men who have ever assembled in this Chamber, in 1850, to agree that this dangerous issue should be taken from Congress and given to the people. However that great fact may be obscured by logic, however it may be beclouded by a mass of—I shall not say subterfuge or technicality, but I may say special pleading—the great truth is before the people of the United States that that is the only question to which we have had reference in all this long struggle. What I have desired, and what I have thought would be conclusive, was that we should have from the people of Kansas such an embodied expression as would give us their will on that subject.

I certainly concur with the President of the United States in that part of his message in which he says he would have preferred that the whole constitution should be submitted to the people; but the convention—exercising what he has conceded to be their right, to make a constitution and send it to Congress—submitted only the slavery question. I do not say that the whole of that constitution would have been adopted or rejected, but I can say to the Senator from Illinois that I was in the Territory before the delegates were elected, and for nearly a month afterwards, and I think I know some circumstances which influenced the action of the people. I know what was said on the one side and on the other from the rostrum, for I heard it. I heard the advocates of the Topeka movement say to the men who proposed to form a constitution under the laws of the Territory, "We will not judge of any instrument you may submit; we will not consider its merits at all." Why? "Because we are determined that the laws, which the President of the United States has said shall be carried out, shall be rendered null and void. Governor Walker has told us that these laws are binding, and that the convention has been legally convened; we do not subscribe to that doctrine; we will therefore accept no form of government from a bogus convention." I heard more than one of them say that even if the convention should give to them the Topeka constitution, word for word, and letter for letter, they would trample it in the dust, because they denied the authority of the law which the President of the United States was administering there. However unwisely members of the convention may have acted—and I do not intend to defend the details of their action by any means—it will not do to say that there were no surrounding circumstances to impel them to such action. Probably if the Republicans had the power at that hour, they would have wielded it quite as unwarrantably. The declarations to which I have referred naturally begot retaliation. The answer was, "If you will not judge of this instrument why should it be submitted to you?"

Now, sir, I will say to the Senator from Illinois, in defense of his friend, the president of the convention, whose idol he has almost been, that in all my intercourse with him I never heard from him an unreasonable or an unfair suggestion on the subject. He did say, and he did write, that he would agree to a submission of the constitution to the people; but when he was told, "we will not judge of this," his views were different. He told me to say to the President of the United States that if this spirit was persisted in, if they were to be broken down simply to give the power to their enemies and not because the constitution was a bad one, he would not be bound to submit it. He held that under the organic act and according to the common understanding of the country, they were under an obligation to submit the slavery clause. That they did not submit it in a proper form I agree. It ought to have been, one way or the other, distinctly. They might have withheld the constitution entirely, and avoided the difficulty which the Senator raises as to forcing a seeming assent to the constitution. That, however, is somewhat of a theoretical difficulty, for I never heard any issue in Kansas, nor will the Senator hear any serious issue there, as to the main features of the constitution. The virtue of the submission is that it withholds the constitution except that portion which relates to slavery.

The Senator is perfectly aware that as late as 1848, when a constitution was formed for Illinois, the same monstrous outrage upon popular sovereignty was practiced, for a portion of that constitution was put into operation without being submitted to the people.

He was the able advocate of Mr. Toombs's bill, which did not emanate from the people of Kansas. They did not delegate their sovereignty in the first instance; they were not consulted at all; they had not petitioned for it; and yet the Senator advocated and voted for that bill. It provided for an election of delegates, named the times and places, and called together a convention to whom the people of Kansas were to delegate their sovereignty. It did more, sir. It put that constitution into operation without ever consulting the people of Kansas. If the Senator's feelings had been awakened at that time as to the peculiar rights of the people of Kansas, he never could have voted for Mr. Toombs's bill. That was non-intervention—very peculiar, however. I was unwilling, as I remember, in the first instance, to go for a measure of that kind, because I thought it contravened the principle of non-intervention.

Now, if I understand rightly the position of the Senator from Illinois, it comes down to this: although the constitution of Kansas, when presented here, may be republican; though there may be in it no insurmountable objection; though it may be a reasonable instrument, made by competent authority, in accordance with law and in the proper form, Kansas shall not come into the Union because this right thing was not done through a particular process. Is that consistent with the doctrine of non-intervention? I deny the right of Congress to go behind the organic act, and inquire into all the details of how the people of Kansas have proceeded; but when Kansas presents herself for admission at the doors of Congress with a republican constitution, formed in order, according to law, the Senator from Illinois is about to say to those people, you shall not come into the Union because you did not do this right thing in the proper way. Sir, when the question involves the peace of the whole country, and, as I know, the prosperity of Kansas, I will not be pledged to say any such thing; but if the measure is right in itself, and if I can see that it imposes no great future wrong on the people of Kansas, in view of the peculiar circumstances which surround the case, the difficulty of getting any law properly administered there, the danger of leaving the question open, I will, so far as I have the power, assist to throw wide open the portals of the Union and welcome Kansas as a State, thus settling this bitter family feud forever.

Sir, I do not intend to follow the subject further to-day. I thought, however, that some of the positions of the Senator from Illinois were so peculiarly forced that, though entirely unprepared, I should not, after the intimation I had given, do justice to myself if I allowed those remarks to pass unnoticed.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I do not mean to go into this debate, because it is now entirely upon questions purely abstract; but I think it due to the honorable Senator from Illinois, to whose remarks I have listened with great attention, to point out to him one, at least, of the fallacies contained in his argument. I use that term with entire respect; and I should be unjust to myself if I did not use it with entire respect to him, because all will admit that his speech was one of great strength and great power, but, in my conception, with great diffidence I say it, was of little moment in its legal positions, and in its political conclusions, a series of monstrous fallacies. I only desire to point out one now.

The honorable Senator said that the effect produced of necessity from the mode of submitting this subject to the people of Kansas was to disfranchise all who did not come to the polls prepared to vote for the constitution; and thus, he said, all who did vote, whether for or against slavery, were compelled to vote for the constitution, and those of either class who were not prepared to vote for the constitution, must necessarily refrain from voting at all; and yet the honorable Senator complained—and it was the great staple of that part of his argument—that the constitution was not submitted to be voted on. At one time he declared that it was withheld from the people; and again he declared that all who came to vote were necessarily obliged to vote for it. Now, I submit to the honorable Senator, how could a man be compelled to vote for that which was not submitted to him to be voted on at all?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Did the Senator understand me to say that it was withheld?

Mr. MASON. So I understood.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I said just the reverse.

Mr. MASON. The Senator certainly said they withheld everything from the people except the question of slavery; and yet the Senator declared that whoever voted on the question of slavery, whether for or against it, was obliged to vote for the constitution; and the Senator drew the logical consequence that, of necessity, those who did not choose to vote for the constitution were obliged to stay away and refuse to vote at all. That was his argument. Now, the fallacy I meant to point out was this: look at that constitution and you will find that the convention withheld the constitution; it was not submitted to the people at all. Whether that was well done or ill done is another question; but the constitution was withheld from the people, and the only question submitted to them was, whether they would establish or interdict slavery? They might go there and vote upon that, and not vote or express any opinion whatever on anything else contained in the constitution.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am sorry I was misapprehended by the Senator from Virginia. I certainly took the ground, first, that the convention had no power to frame a government, and put it in operation without submitting it to the people; secondly, that the convention showed a consciousness of that fact, by providing that it should be submitted to the people, and should take effect from and after the date of ratification. Hence, from that action of the convention, whatever vitality the constitution was ever to have, resulted, not from the convention, but from a vote of the people. I then showed that while they acknowledged it would be void but for the ratification of the people, it provided that it should be submitted for free acceptance or rejection in the following form, and the form was such as to cut off all negative votes, and only count the affirmative. That was my position—a position sustained by the constitution itself. The Senator is entirely mistaken if he supposes that by the remotest inference he is authorized by that constitution and schedule in saying they withheld it from the people. The schedule says, in so many words, "this constitution shall be submitted to all the inhabitants in the Territory, on the day of election, for their acceptance or rejection, in the following form." This shows that they provide, not that it shall go into operation without submission, but that it shall be submitted, and they profess to submit it. They then cut off the negative votes, which, of course, makes a sure thing of it. That is my position. If the Senator from Virginia had understood it, I apprehend he would not have discovered any fallacy.

One word in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania—

Mr. BIGLER. If the Senator will allow me at this point, I wish to give some authority I have on the subject.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield the floor.

Mr. BIGLER. I desire simply to say that I was exceedingly anxious to understand the precise position of that question. It was difficult to tell, from the language of the schedule. Yesterday I asked Colonel Henderson, of Kansas, who was an active member of the convention, what it meant. "Why," said he, "it means this: that there are two entire constitutions, and the people vote separately for the constitution without slavery—the constitution the convention has formed—or the constitution with slavery." I understood him to say that there were two constitutions precisely similar.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If there are two constitutions, as we have but one, I should like to see the other; and I want to know which one of the two the Senator from Pennsylvania is for, when he says he agrees with the President in going for this.

Mr. BIGLER. I said they were precisely similar.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If there are two copies of the same constitution I can understand it, but that the convention made two constitutions precisely similar, I do not understand. But if they did, what difference does it make? You may vote for this constitution or the other one; but they are just alike, and you must take one or the other.

Mr. BIGLER. One will make Kansas a free State, and the other will make it a slave State. That is the difference.

Mr. DOUGLAS. You may vote for this or the other constitution; and if you vote for either, you may vote on the slavery question; but unless you do vote for one or the other of these constitutions, you cannot vote on that subject. It makes no difference how many copies they made; the simple question is, do they allow the people to vote on the slavery question without casting a vote on any other subject? By that constitution you cannot vote on the slavery question by itself. You are compelled to write on the ballot, "for the constitution," as preliminary to voting. Your right to vote is then conditional, not free.

But I did not rise for the purpose of controverting these questions. I was going to say a word or two to the Senator from Pennsylvania. He assumed an air in the opening of this discussion that I thought was entirely uncalled for, as if he wished rather to intimate to the Senator from Illinois that his bearing was not exactly right—an intimation of speaking by authority not authorized and not respected.

Mr. BIGLER. Mr. President, I beg to say to the Senator from Illinois that in not one word that I uttered did I intend the slightest disrespect of that sort, nor do I wish the Senator from Illinois to mark me as speaking here except for myself. I express on this subject the views which I have deliberately made up. They concur generally, if not entirely, with those expressed by the President of the United States.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have not another word to say on the point on which I was speaking. The explanation of the Senator from Pennsylvania is conclusive on that point. It may be that I misunderstood the manner in which he treated the subject; but, whether I did or not, his statement is conclusive with me. I was certain he did not speak for the President of the United States. I knew that; for the President had just spoken for himself, in language which condemned that convention for not submitting the constitution to the people, and he refuses to recommend that we should receive this constitution. The absence of a recommendation clearly shows that it is not an Administration measure. Certainly the President is not going to have, as an Administration measure here, one to which he has not committed himself and his Cabinet. The President of the United States is a bold, frank, man, and if he intends to give us an Administration measure, he will say so in so many words. He has not said so. It is not respectful to him to assume that he wants us to do that which he was not willing to recommend us to do in his annual message, when acting under the authority of the Constitution, which makes it his duty to recommend the measures which the public good requires. Hence, of course, I knew the Senator did not speak by authority, and I was going to deny his right to do so; but inasmuch as I misunderstood him, I have no comments to make.

Mr. BIGLER. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Certainly.

Mr. BIGLER. I think I am very safe in saying—and I believe that the Senator from Illinois will agree with me—that the President of the United States upholds the doctrine in his message that that convention had a right to form a constitution; it had a right to submit it to the people of the Territory for their approval or send it here for the approbation of Congress and the admission of the State into the Union. I think it is very clearly deducible from the message in addition, that the President of the United States does not think that the circumstance of not submitting the entire constitution to a vote of the people should keep Kansas out of the Union if her constitution is republican and right in all other respects. On that point we will agree. With that I understand the Senator from Illinois to take issue.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I infer from the message that the President of the United States does hold that that convention had a right to frame a constitution and send it up here; but that was under the right to petition for the redress of grievances under the Constitution of the United States, and not because the Legislature of the Territory had the power to constitute that a legal constitutional convention.

Mr. BIGLER. Where do you find that?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yesterday a speech was read to this body, showing that the President had held that doctrine twenty years ago, and he has never disavowed it since. In that speech the President declared that a Territorial Legislature had no power to create a convention to form a constitution; and that, if they attempted to exercise such a power, it would be an act of usurpation—a high crime—a crime subject to impeachment. The President has held these doctrines for twenty years. He held them at the same time that General Jackson's administration held them in regard to the Arkansas case. The Democratic party has held them ever since. I have proved to-day that the Democratic party, so far as it is bound by our action one year and a half ago, asserted the same doctrine in the Kansas report which I made from the Committee on the Territories. I firmly believed then, that that committee was a faithful exponent of the views of the Kansas-Nebraska party. In that report we set forth that doctrine, and, as the Senator well knows, we published and circulated during the campaign, in order to elect Mr. Buchanan, three hundred thousand copies of that report as a party document. I paid for one hundred thousand copies of it myself. I never heard it intimated that the doctrine then expounded, and on which the President was elected, was repudiated by any portion of the party, and therefore I said that the President of the United States was with me on this question, so far as his record shows.

Mr. BIGLER. I must enter my protest and claim the benefit of the statute of limitations, which is applicable to a shorter period than twenty years. I cannot consent that the Senator from Illinois shall hold the President to principles which he may have laid down twenty years ago, under entirely different circumstances from those which now exist. It is not half so long since the President of the United States declared that the Missouri line would be the best compromise of the slavery difficulty that could be made. In 1848, the Senator from Illinois advocated the extension of the Missouri line to the Pacific ocean, yet he was the man who proposed and insisted that it ought to be repealed. He was at one time in favor of extending it, and therefore made his principle acceptable to him under the circumstances then existing; he was willing then to take it. Now, would it not be very ungenerous in me to hold to-day that the Senator's argument was a fallacy, because he at one time advocated the extension of the Missouri line?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I deny the right of the Senator from Pennsylvania to interpose the statute of limitations upon this occasion, on the well-known principle that no one but the authorized attorney of the party can interpose that plea. [Laughter.] As the Senator has disavowed the authority to act and speak for the President, he has no right to file the plea. If the President of the United States himself will interpose the plea, I shall admit it. I believe in a statute of limitations in regard to political opinions. I need one very much myself, on many points. I am not one of those who boast that they have never changed an opinion. Sir, it is a matter of gratification to me that I feel each year that I am a little wiser than I was the year before; and I do not know that a month has ever passed over my head in which I have not modified some opinion in some degree, but I am always frank enough to avow it. Still, it is fair for any man to hold me to a former opinion until I have expressed a contrary one.

Has the President of the United States ever withdrawn the opinion of which I have spoken, expressed twenty years ago, in regard to the power of the Territorial Legislatures? I show that the Democratic party stood by it last year. Is not that rather a short period for the application of the statute of limitations? I hope you are not going to cut off the Cincinnati Convention by that statute. I deny your right to plead the statute against the Cincinnati Convention, until after the meeting of the Charleston Convention. The Cincinnati platform is the fundamental, unalterable law of the Democratic party until the meeting of the Charleston Convention. Congressmen have no right to change it. Senators have no right to change it. Cabinets cannot alter it; and the President, I know, will not attempt to do so. I deny the Senator's right to come in with this plea for the President, implying thereby that he has changed his opinion, when that same opinion was last year the doctrine of the Democratic party, and cannot be changed for four years to come by the party organization. I am perfectly at home when you come to the discussion of the question whether a man is inside the party or not. I have been in the habit of discussing these platforms and helping to make them. I stand now where I stood last year; not because I am unwilling to change, but because I believed I was right then, and I believe I am right now.

The Senator from Pennsylvania has told me that I actually voted for the Toombs bill last year. That is true; and, as I said to-day, I am ready to vote for it again. He voted for it last year, and so did the gentlemen around me. Let us vote for it again, and have no quarrels among ourselves. It will not do to taunt me with having voted for a measure last year which I am for now, but which you are not for.

Mr. BIGLER. I certainly did not present the case in that spirit at all; nor did I look at it in that point of view. I gave it no such aspect whatever. I presented it in this point of view: the Senator, in his speech to-day, had held that it was a great wrong upon the people of Kansas to put a government in operation through the agency of their territorial laws and a territorial convention, the whole of which had not been submitted for their approbation; and yet only a short year ago he voted for an enabling act which put a State government into operation without submitting any part of it to the people. That is what I said.

Mr. DOUGLAS. My explanation of that is to be given in the precise language of the explanation of the President of the United States in his message, in which he says that, in his instructions to Governor Walker, he took it for granted that the constitution was to be submitted to the people under a law that was silent on the subject. The Toombs bill being silent, I took it for granted too, and I supposed every other man did, that it was to be submitted. I merely adopted the same process of reasoning that the President himself says he adopted, and which he was amazed to find was not carried out. If the President was right in taking that for granted, I do not know why I was not right in taking the same thing for granted.

Again, I will ask the Senator to show me an intimation from any one member of the Senate, in the whole debate on the Toombs bill, and in the Union from any quarter, that the constitution was not to be submitted to the people. I will venture to say, that on all sides of the Chamber it was so understood at the time. If the opponents of the bill had understood it was not, they would have made the point on it; and if they had made it, we should certainly have yielded to it and put in the clause. That is a discovery made since the President found out that it was not safe to take it for granted that that would be done which ought in fairness to have been done.

Mr. BIGLER. I do not pretend to know anything on this subject which may not appear in the Journal of Debates. I shall not hold the Senator to anything that does not appear there; but this I will say, that I was present when that subject was discussed by Senators before the bill was introduced, and the question was raised and discussed whether the constitution, when formed, should be submitted to a vote of the people. It was held by those most intelligent on the subject, that in view of all the difficulties surrounding that Territory, the danger of any experiment at that time of a popular vote, it would be better that there should be no such provision in the Toombs bill; and it was my understanding, in all the intercourse I had, that that convention would make a constitution and send it here without submitting it to the popular vote.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator says he will not undertake to state anything that did not occur here in debate and appear in the published debates, intimating that he has no right, as an honorable man, to do it. I will not undertake to intimate and insinuate that which, as an honorable man, I am not at liberty to express in the body. If he means to insinuate that I was present at such a debate and sanctioned that doctrine, let him say so. If he is not willing to say it, let him not insinuate that I was present, privately sanctioning a measure that I now publicly am not willing to avow.

Mr. BIGLER. If I am constantly at fault in matters of courtesy, it is painful to me. I never have so failed to observe propriety before. Perhaps I have spoken wrongfully on this subject. I have told the Senator from Illinois before that I should not in any way attempt to reflect upon him.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will bring this to a close. I will release the Senator from all secrecy, if there is any, and ask if he knows that, directly or indirectly, publicly or privately, anywhere on the face of the earth, I was ever present at such a consultation, where it was called to my attention, and I agreed to pass it without submission to the people? I now ask him that question, with all secrecy removed.

Mr. BIGLER. I shall say distinctly what my recollection is clear about, regardless of any consequences. I remember very well that that question was discussed in the house of the Senator. I am not certain that he participated in that discussion; but I know that I did. It was urged—I think more especially by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Toombs,] not now in his seat—that, under all the circumstances, there ought not to be a provision inserted requiring that constitution to be submitted to the people. I do not say that the Senator from Illinois participated in the discussion. My recollection is not clear on that point; but it is clear that, in an interview with some three or four members, who were talking about the introduction of that bill, that subject was talked over. I have said that it was always my understanding that that convention would have a right to make a constitution, and send it here, without submitting it to the people.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I never have insisted that there was a clause in that bill expressly requiring the constitution to be submitted to the people. The point I have made was, that being silent, it was understood as a matter of course that it was to be submitted. Such a clause was unnecessary. That was the President's construction of the act of the Kansas Legislature. That was my construction of the Toombs bill. That I may have known there was no such clause, is unquestionably true; but that I was a party, either by private conferences at my own house, or otherwise, to a plan to force a constitution on the people of Kansas without submission, is not true. That the bill was silent on the subject is true, and my attention was called to that about the time it was passed; and I took the fair construction to be, that powers not delegated were reserved, and, that of course the constitution would be submitted to the people. The point I made on the Senator was that he insinuated that I was a party to such an arrangement privately, which he was not at liberty to tell, and yet he insinuated the very fact that he, as an honorable man, could not tell. If a point of honor has restrained him from telling it, a point of honor should restrain him from insinuating it.

Mr. BIGLER. In my anxiety to relieve the feelings of the Senator from Illinois, I fear I may have done injustice to myself. Now, sir, I wish to account for the impression which was on my mind, and to make no imputation on him. I had called his attention to the Toombs bill because it was in derogation of the doctrine he has laid down here to-day. When he says there was no sentiment of that kind declared in the Senate, I say I hold that Senator only to the record here—only to the Journal of Debates. What next, sir? I justified myself in what I had said by an allusion to a discussion of that precise question with members of this body. My purpose was to show the Senator that I should not have made this allegation without some clear impression on my mind. That impression, I tell the Senator from Illinois, was strengthened by other things. It was strengthened by the fact that when he made the preparatory bill for the admission of Minnesota, he provided, in express words, that the constitution should be submitted. If it is an inference irresistible, that a constitution must be submitted when the enabling act is silent, why insert it in the Minnesota bill? There it is inserted, and I thought it reasonable—I always believed it. I believed it was wise to put it in that shape, in view of the surroundings in the Territory of Kansas. I do not impugn the Senator's integrity, or his patriotism, or his high motive, or his courage, or anything that pertains to him personally. He has had no more constant admirer than myself—none who has defended him oftener. I thought I was doing justice to myself. On account of what I heard in regard to the Minnesota bill, I got the impression that unless Congress required the submission of the constitution to a vote of the people, that course need not be pursued.

Mr. HALE. I rise simply for the purpose of making an inquiry. This matter has been pretty tolerably well elucidated; but the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, if I did not misunderstand him, said that, at a private meeting at the house of the honorable Senator from Illinois, there was a talk that owing to some peculiar circumstances it was not prudent to submit the constitution to the people of Kansas. I desire him to state what some of those peculiar circumstances were which rendered it inexpedient and unpatriotic. I have not the slightest controversy with the Senator from Illinois on that subject.

Mr. BIGLER. The Senator from New Hampshire is much more familiar with the surroundings in Kansas than he affects to be to-day.

Mr. HALE. I did not know what you talked of over there.

Mr. BIGLER. I had reference (and I think I made that very clear) to the condition of the Territory, the bitter feud that divided the people there, the strifes and violence that were likely to interfere with a fair election. I said distinctly that the circumstances rendered a fair exercise of the elective franchise exceedingly difficult. Who has said more on that point than the Senator from New Hampshire? Who has talked more about usurpation and violence there, and keeping free-State people from the polls? I had the same impressions then that I have now. In all the votes I gave I was controlled and impelled by nearly the same motive as now, and that was to get Kansas into the Union, whenever she came up in an allowable shape, in order to settle the controversy.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I must ask the Senator from Pennsylvania whether he means to intimate that in my house, or any other, these considerations were urged why we should pass the bill without a provision to submit the constitution to the people? Does he mean to say that I ever was, privately or publicly, in my own house or any other, in favor of a constitution without its being submitted to the people?

Mr. BIGLER. I have made no such allegation.

Mr. DOUGLAS. You have allowed it to be inferred. I do not want a false impression to be inferred because the scene is located in my private parlor. Of what importance is it whether in my house or yours, unless I was a party to an agreement of that kind? If I was, let it be said; if I was not, acquit me of it.

Mr. BIGLER. I stated that I had no recollection of the Senator participating in that conversation.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Well, if I had nothing to do with it, and was not there, I do not know what my house had to do with it.

Mr. BIGLER. What I said was the truth, and that is the only defense I have to make before the Senate, and the country, and my God.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, I regard the questions raised in this discussion as of the very highest importance, looking to the structure of our Federal Government, the extent of the agency of Congress, and the extent of the agency of the people in the formation of States, and in the admission of States into the Confederacy. As such I am not willing to see the subject pass off without a more elaborate investigation. I do not feel prepared this evening, but I desire to be heard on it myself. With the consent of the Senate, therefore, I will move to postpone the further consideration of the subject until to-morrow.

Several SENATORS. Say Monday.

Mr. GREEN. If it be the wish of the Senate, I will move to postpone it until Monday.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Several messages, in writing, were received from the President of the United States, by J. B. HENRY, Esq., his Private Secretary.

On motion of Mr. BENJAMIN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 9, 1857.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

QUALIFICATION OF A MEMBER.

Hon. HENRY WINTER DAVIS, a member from the State of Maryland, appeared and took the oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

ELECTION OF PRINTER.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to know what the question is before the House this morning?

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the resolution and substitute offered by the gentlemen from Alabama and Virginia, [Messrs. Houstons and Smith.] The pending question is on seconding the demand for the previous question, which was called by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Grow.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is the question before the House connected with the organization of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I hope that by unanimous consent we shall proceed to the drawing of seats.

Several MEMBERS. Finish the election of Printer first.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce and put upon its passage a bill, the reading of which will satisfy every member of this House that it ought to pass without objection.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I notify the gentleman that I object to everything until the pending matter is disposed of.

Mr. FAULKNER. The bill is to supply an omission in the enrollment of the act for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1858.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object.

Mr. FAULKNER. The bill would have passed almost by this time, had there been no objection. It is a matter of public consequence.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolutions offered by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Houston,] and the substitute offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Smith.]

The original resolutions were read, and are as follows:

Resolved, That the House now proceed to the election of a Printer for the House of Representatives during the Thirty-Fifth Congress, with the proviso that the House retains the right in Congress to modify the existing law on the subject of public printing, as it may see proper, the Printer who may be elected under this resolution receiving said appointment or election with and upon the condition above set forth.

Resolved, That a committee of — be appointed by the Speaker to examine into the laws in relation to the printing for the House of Representatives, the prices paid therefor, and the duties of the Public Printer, whose duty it shall be to report thereon, with the least practicable delay, together with such change or improvement therein as they may deem advisable.

The substitute was read, and is as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of — be appointed by the Speaker to examine into the laws in relation to the printing for the House of Representatives, the prices paid therefor, and the duties of the Public Printer, whose duty it shall be to report thereon with the least practicable delay, together with such change or improvement therein as they may deem advisable.

And be it further resolved, That until such report and action thereon by this House, the election of Public Printer shall be postponed; and that, in the mean time, the Clerk of the House shall have such printing executed, on the best terms practicable, as may be required by the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. I suppose the blank ought to be filled with the number of the committee. I would propose "seven."

No objection being made, the blank was filled with "seven."

The SPEAKER. The question is upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BANKS. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BANKS and BARKSDALE were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 95, noes 95.

The SPEAKER voting in the affirmative, the previous question was seconded.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays on ordering the main question to be put.

Mr. HUGHES. Is it in order to move to lay the substitute upon the table?

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order, but its effect will be to carry the original proposition with it.

Mr. HUGHES. Is it in order, then, to demand a division of the question?

The SPEAKER. The question will be first put upon agreeing to the substitute. The question now is on ordering the main question to be put.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. As I understand the rules, if we refuse to order the main question to be put, the effect will be to bring up this question to-morrow as the unfinished business of the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will inquire whether it has not been the practice of the House, when the main question is not ordered to be put, to proceed with the disposal of that question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware of such a practice.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Under our practice, the refusal to order the main question brings up the matter before the House next morning, when the question again recurs, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. STANTON. If the main question be not ordered, will not the House be in a condition to proceed to discuss or vote upon the propositions before it?

The SPEAKER. In that case, the proposition, by the usages of parliamentary law, passes from the House to again come up to-morrow morning.

Mr. STANTON. Will it not be in order to discuss it?

The SPEAKER. It will not. The previous question has been seconded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 116, nays 94; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoek, Bonham, Bowie, Branch, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Chapman, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Cox, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Devart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Elliott, English, Eastis, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, McKibbin, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Miles, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ricard, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sikes, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—116.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Banks, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Damrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Fenton, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leech, Leiter, Lovejoy, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Potte, Purviance, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburne, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, Wood, and Zollicoffer—94.

So the main question was ordered to be put.

Pending the above call—

Mr. HICKMAN said, that if he had been within the bar when his name was called, he would have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. BANKS. What is the main question?

The SPEAKER. The resolution of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BANKS moved to lay that resolution on the table, and demanded tellers on his motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BANKS and LAMAR were appointed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 82, nays 126; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Banks, Bennett, Billingshurst, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Damrell, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Fenton, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leech, Leiter, Lovejoy, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Potte, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburne, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, Wood—82.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery,

Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoek, Bonham, Boyce, Branch, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Chapman, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Cox, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilmer, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, Maclay, McKibbin, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Millson, Montgomery, Moore, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ricard, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sikes, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollicoffer—126.

So the motion was disagreed to.

The substitute was read.

Mr. GOODE. Is it in order to amend by moving to strike out the second resolution?

The SPEAKER. The main question has been ordered, and amendments are not in order.

Mr. BURNETT. Is the question divisible?

The SPEAKER. It is an entire proposition, one part necessary to the understanding of the other, and is not divisible.

Mr. HOUSTON. My proposition, as modified, embraces all the good parts of the substitute, and I ask that it be read.

The original resolutions, as modified, were again read.

Mr. BOCOCK. I desire to inquire of the Chair, for the information of the new members of the House, whether, if the proposition of my colleague be voted down, the House will not be brought at once to a vote upon the resolutions offered by the gentleman from Alabama, which have just been read?

The SPEAKER. That will be the effect of voting down the substitute.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the substitute.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 91, nays 118; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson, Andrews, Banks, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Damrell, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Fenton, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leech, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Potte, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburne, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Zollicoffer—91.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bocoek, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Burnett, Burns, Campbell, Caskie, Chapman, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Cox, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, Maclay, McKibbin, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miles, Miller, Millson, Montgomery, Moore, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sikes, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—118.

So the substitute was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the resolutions offered by Mr. Houston.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative, yeas 121, nays 81; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoek, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Burnett, Burns, Campbell, Caskie, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Cox, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississiippi, Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, English, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilmer, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hawkins, Hickman, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Leidy, Letcher, Maclay, McKibbin, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miles, Miller, Millson, Montgomery, Moore, Isaac N. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollicoffer—121.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Banks, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Damrell, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Fenton, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leech, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Potte, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburne, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—81.

So the resolutions were agreed to.

Pending the call of the roll—

Mr. AVERY said: I was not within the bar when my name was called, and I am not certain whether I came in before the next name was called. I ask the privilege of recording my vote.

Mr. RITCHIE. I must object. I objected this morning to the same privilege being accorded to one of my colleagues.

Mr. CURTIS. I was not within the bar when my name was called, but I ask permission to vote.

Several MEMBERS objected.

Mr. CURTIS. I should have voted in the negative.

Mr. HATCH. I was not within the bar when my name was called, but I desire to say that if I had been, I should have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. HOUSTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOCOCK. I nominate for Printer of the House, James B. Steadman, of the State of Ohio.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I nominate George M. Weston, of the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER appointed Messrs. Bocoek, Washburn of Maine, Zollicoffer, and Huyler, tellers to count the votes.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I believe that in elections of this kind members can vote at any time before the result is announced. They differ from votes by yeas and nays in this respect.

The SPEAKER. That has been the practice of the House.

The House, in the execution of its order, then proceeded to vote for Printer, with the following result: Whole number of votes cast, 214; necessary to a choice, 108; of which—

James B. Steadman received.....	121
George M. Weston.....	93
Gales & Seaton.....	3
Robert Cawthon.....	1

The following is the vote in detail:

For James B. Steadman—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoek, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Chapman, Horace F. Clark, John B. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburne, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood.

For Gales & Seaton—Messrs. Gilmer, Maynard, and Edward Joy Morris.

For Robert Cawthon—Mr. Powell.

James B. Steadman having received a majority of all the votes cast, was declared duly elected as Printer of the House for the Thirty-Fifth Congress.

DRAWING FOR SEATS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I offer the following resolution in regard to the organization of the House; and upon it I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House, immediately after the passage of this resolution, place in a box the names of each member and delegate of the House of Representatives, written on a separate slip of paper; that he then proceed, in the presence of the House, to draw from said box, one at a time, the said slips of paper, and as each is drawn he shall announce the name of the member or Delegate upon it, who shall choose his seat for the present session: Provided, That before said drawing shall commence, the Speaker shall cause every seat to be vacated, and shall see that every seat continues vacant until it is selected under this order, and that each seat, after having been selected, shall be deemed vacant if left unoccupied before the calling of the roll is finished.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw his resolution for a moment, in order that I may offer one providing means to pay the clerks, pages, and other employes of the House, who have been dismissed. Many of them live in distant States, and of course it costs them more to remain here until next week than their pay amounts to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will hear the resolution read.

The resolution was read, and is as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to the officers, clerks, messengers, pages, and others, employes of the House of Representatives since the commencement of the present session, such sums as may be due to them for attendance and services under the existing laws, resolutions, and regulations of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If there is no objection to the resolution, and it can be adopted without debate, I will withdraw mine.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I should like to be informed as to the necessity of the resolution. If services have been rendered, of course the Clerk will pay for them. I object to the resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I adhere to my resolution, and call the previous question on it.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. PHELPS. Before the drawing commences, I desire to say that on Monday last I informed the House that my colleague [Mr. CARPENTERS] was unable to be present in consequence of severe illness. I now ask that some member of the Missouri delegation be permitted to draw for him.

Several MEMBERS objected.

Mr. HATCH. My colleague [Mr. CORNING] is unavoidably absent to-day. I hope one of the New York delegation will be allowed to select a seat for him. [Loud cries of "Object."]

The House then proceeded to execute its order. The seats were all vacated, the members crowding outside the bar, and occupying the reporters' desks, eagerly waiting the chances of the lottery. Each member, as his name was drawn from the box and announced by the Clerk, selected his seat for the session. The process occupied more than an hour, and was the occasion of much merriment.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

Mr. GROW, as soon as the members were all seated, gave notice that he would to-morrow, or on some subsequent day, introduce a bill to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public lands.

THE NEW HALL.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to move that a committee be appointed to ascertain and report when it will be prudent for the House to remove into the new Hall. [Cries of "No, no, you've got a bad seat!" and laughter.] I am serious. I believe that the new Hall is now ready for occupancy.

Mr. KEITT. Provide, then, that the present draw shall hold good in the new Hall. [Laughter.]

Mr. FLORENCE. Oh, no; I object to that.

Mr. BOCOCK. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I hope that the gentleman will waive that motion to enable me to move that, until otherwise ordered, the daily hour of meeting shall be twelve o'clock, m.

Mr. BOCOCK. I withdraw the motion for that purpose.

Mr. JONES's motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. BOCOCK, the House (at half past three o'clock, p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow.

IN SENATE.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. STUART. I desire to present to the Senate a memorial of the board of education of the State of Michigan and of the faculty of the Agricultural College of that State, praying for a donation of land for the Agricultural College. As it is upon an important subject, I ask the consent of the Senate to have it laid on the table, and printed. When the committees shall be formed, I shall ask its reference to a committee; but as it is very short, I desire to have it printed. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

RESOLUTIONS OF CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BRODERICK presented a resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of an additional allowance to the officers and men of the Army who served in the Pacific division, and also to the officers connected with the Light House Board of that coast; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of a uniform rate of postage, the payment by the Government for all free postage matter, and the abolition of the franking privilege; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of California, in behalf of William Grove Deal, for relief given by him to the indigent sick at Sacramento City, California, in 1849 and 1850; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. DOUGLAS gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to enable the people of the Territory of Kansas to hold a convention to form a constitution and State government preparatory to their admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. FOOT gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill making grants of public land to actual settlers.

Also, a bill for the relief of George P. Marsh.

Mr. GREEN gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States," approved March 3, 1849.

REPORTING OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. SEWARD submitted the following resolution for consideration; which lies over under the rule:

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on Printing inquire and report whether any new provisions of law are necessary to secure a faithful performance, on the part of Congress, of the existing contracts which provide for accurate reports of the debates of the two Houses.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. HALE, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. SLIDELL, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned to Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 10, 1857.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

QUALIFICATION OF A MEMBER.

Hon. GUY M. BRYAN, a Representative from the State of Texas, appeared, and was duly qualified by taking the usual oath to support the Constitution.

OMISSION IN ENROLLMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the War Department, to the effect that, in the Army appropriation act of the last Congress, approved 3d March, 1857, the usual appropriation of $360,000, for the manufacture of arms at the national armories, although regularly estimated for by his Department, and passed by both Houses, by a clerical error was omitted in enrolling the bill; that attention was called to this omission as soon as it was discovered, and that it was acknowledged by the Clerk of the House of Representatives to have occurred through mistake, as stated. The Secretary of War respectfully requests that it may be brought to the notice of the House of Representatives at the present session, and that a bill may be passed to correct the omission as early as practicable.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to permit me to introduce a bill for the correction of the error to which attention is called.

Mr. MORGAN. I object.

The communication was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

APPOINTMENT OF STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. BANKS. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker be authorized and requested to appoint the standing committees of this House.

The resolution was adopted.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. BANKS. In order that the Speaker may have time to discharge the duty imposed upon him, under the resolution just adopted, I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

THE NEW HALL.

The SPEAKER. The question in order is on the following resolution submitted yesterday by the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. WARREN:]

Resolved, That a committee of — be appointed to examine the new Hall, and report when it can be occupied with safety.

Mr. WARREN. I will perfect the resolution by filling the blank with the word "five." I will call attention to the object I had in view in submitting this resolution. I do not move that we adjourn immediately to the new Hall, but simply that we appoint a committee to inquire into the condition of that Hall, and report when, in their opinion, it will be prudent for us to adjourn into it. Almost every member feels the inconvenience of the Hall in which we are now sitting, and certainly it is desirable that we should remove from it into the new Hall as soon as practicable. I should be as far from insisting that we shall go into the new Hall when the health of myself or any other gentleman upon this floor would be endangered, as any other member; but it strikes me that no danger can result to any member by the passage of a resolution for an investigation into the condition of the new Hall, for the purpose of ascertaining when it is probable we can go there. This is all I ask, and I hope it will not be objected to.

Mr. STANTON. I move to amend by adding, "that the committee shall have power to report at any time."

Mr. WARREN. I accept the amendment as a modification of my resolution.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I object. The committee can report in a few days, and I do not wish it to be privileged to override all other business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to modify his resolution.

Mr. STANTON. I call for the previous question.

The call for the previous question was seconded; and the main question was ordered to be put.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. WARREN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that that motion be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAYMENT OF DISMISSED EMPLOYEES.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I again submit the resolution which I presented yesterday. It authorizes the Clerk of the House to pay the clerks and other employes, who have been employed during the present session, and are dismissed, the amount to which they are entitled.

Mr. LETCHER. Does the resolution, if adopted, provide also for the payment of the extra compensation voted at the last session by a resolution of the House?

Mr. CAMPBELL. It certainly does not.

Mr. LETCHER. I wish that distinctly understood.

Mr. HUGHES. I insist on the regular order of business, and object to the resolution.

INVITATION TO CLERGYMEN.

Mr. DOWDELL. I submit the following resolutions:

Whereas, the people of these United States, from their earliest history to the present time, have been led by the hand of a kind Providence, and are indebted for all the countless blessings of the past and the present, and dependent for continued prosperity in the future, upon Almighty God; and whereas, the great vital and conservative element in our system is the belief of our people in the pure doctrines and divine truths of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, it accordingly becomes the Representatives of a people so highly favored to acknowledge in the most public manner their reverence for God: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the daily sessions of this body be opened with prayer.

Resolved, That the ministers of the Gospel in this city are hereby requested to attend, and alternately perform this solemn duty.

I do not desire to make any remarks, Mr. Speaker, upon these resolutions. They speak for themselves. The plan was tried for two months during the last Congress, and operated well. It is no new plan. It avoids many objections to the old system. I call the previous question.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I would suggest to the gentleman that he amend his resolutions so as to provide that no compensation shall be paid to these gentlemen.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish the gentleman from Alabama would withdraw the demand for the previous question. I have had a good many remonstrances sent to me from different States against the old practice of electing Chaplains to the House. I wish to have one of them read.

Mr. DOWDELL. My resolutions do not propose to elect a Chaplain. They carry out the gentleman's plan.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to have one of the remonstrances read. That is all.

Mr. DOWDELL. Will the gentleman renew the demand for the previous question?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. DOWDELL. Then I withdraw it.

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to be understood as insisting upon the regular order of business. I do not know but that this question belongs to the organization of the House. I insist, however, upon the regular order of business, and if that would exclude these resolutions, I object to them.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It is too late to object now; the resolutions have been received.

Mr. HUGHES. The objection was made before the resolutions were received, but was not heard by the Chair.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The resolutions have been received. A call for the previous question was entertained, and has been withdrawn at my request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the resolutions are properly before the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not wish to detain the House for more than a few moments.

I have various remonstrances in my possession from different States—from the States of Indiana, Pennsylvania, Arkansas, Texas, Missouri, Maine, Ohio, Virginia, Iowa, Connecticut, and Illinois—remonstrating against the employment of Chaplains by the United States, either for Congress or for the Army and Navy. I believe they are all of the same purport, and I ask that one of them may be read, in order that the House may see what are the grounds of these people's objections.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the paper will be read.

Mr. SHORTER. I object.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then I will read it myself. I have a right to read it as a part of my remarks. It is as follows:

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The undersigned, citizens of the State of Arkansas, deeming the employment of a large number of chaplains or national clergy by Congress and through its authority, at the expense of the Government, a serious violation of our rights of conscience, and of those principles of religious and civil equality and freedom sought to be protected by the provisions of our national Constitution, respectfully call your attention to some of their reasons for asking the immediate abolition of the office of national Chaplain, in Congress, in the Army and Navy, and elsewhere.

First.—By article ten of amendments, the Constitution provides that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people;" and the right of employing clergymen to preach or pray for the people, or any portion of them, not being delegated to Congress, either directly or constructively, we claim as a reserved right, which we deem sacred, inalienable, and absolutely essential to our civil and religious freedom.

Second.—By article one of amendments, the Constitution provides that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion;" and we deem the employment of a clergyman of any sect an establishment, to a certain extent, of the religion of that sect. Inasmuch as he is thereby made an officer of Government, the doctrines preached by him in his official capacity must be considered those of the Government, whose acknowledged agent he is, and by whom he is paid for promulgating his sectarian views, with money drawn from the whole people, nine tenths of whom, perhaps, hold sentiments entirely at variance with those they are thus by law compelled to support.

Third.—By article six, section three, the Constitution declares that "No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States;" and from the very nature of the office of Chaplain a religious test is an indispensable prerequisite to determine the qualification of a candidate therefor, as the employment of a non-professor of religion, or an avowed infidel, to such office, would be an inevitable absurdity. Such an office or public trust is most clearly unconstitutional. It is an office to which all citizens are not equally eligible without a religious test, as contemplated by that instrument from which alone Congress derives all its rightful powers.

Fourth.—The immense increase of the number of chaplains employed by the Government within the past few years, has alarmed us to apprehend that an extension of the system may ultimately subject us to all the onerous and oppressive features of the unholy union of Church and State, with which the world has been so grievously burdened in all ages, and from which we had hoped we were forever delivered by the glorious epoch of the American Revolution. The report of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, to the Thirty-Third Congress, at its first session, on the subject of the numerous petitions for the abolition of the chaplaincy, shows that the number of national clergy which the citizens of our country are annually forced to support, by direct taxation, is as follows: Thirty in the Army, twenty-four in the Navy, and two in Congress! besides a large number at the various naval and military schools, stations, and outposts; and at various missionary stations, ostensibly as teachers of Indian schools. The aggregate amount which we are annually compelled to pay for the support of clergymen, as officers which the Constitution gives Congress no power to create or impose upon us, but on the contrary positively prohibits, cannot, therefore, vary far from a quarter of a million dollars annually! Should the number of national chaplains continue to increase in the ratio of the past few years, it will soon equal that of the national clergy in the despots of the Old World, where the Church and State are allies in corruption and oppression. Indeed, we know of no stopping place or limit that can be set to arrest its progress, when precedent has overthrown the protective barriers of the Constitution.

Fifth.—We cannot perceive why clergymen should be sustained by Government in either House of Congress, at our military and naval stations, on board our vessels of war, and in each regiment of our Army, any more than in each township, district, parish or village throughout the land; and to sanction the former, could not be regarded otherwise than as an assent to the extension of the same system, that would place us upon a level with the priest ridden despotisms of the Old World. Our members of Congress, military and naval officers, soldiery and seamen, are, or should be, paid a just compensation for their services, and be left, like all other citizens, to support any clergyman, or none, as their conscience may direct them, without legal agency or coercion. Neither Christianity nor the genius of our institutions contemplates any aristocracy predicated upon the clerical profession, and no special provision, therefore, is necessary by the Government to admit clergymen to our Army and Navy, as they may enlist like other men, and labor like Jesus himself and his Apostles among the poor fishermen, on the sea-side. If it be objected that few clergymen would serve among the troops and marines upon such terms, we can only say, that if actuated by correct religious motives, no minister would wait for Government gold to lead him to his labors of love among them, and that none but hypocrites would be debared by the want of it. We think the Government should not evince more religious zeal than professed ministers of the gospel themselves, by bribing them to perform religious service. If the clergy in the Army and Navy look for other compensation than the voluntary contributions of those among whom they labor, the various religious societies of the country might be more appropriately appealed to, as their funds are voluntarily contributed for such purposes, while those of the Government are taken for State purposes, by authority of law, equally from all classes of citizens, of whatever sects, and whether professors or non-professors of religion.

Sixth.—Believing that religion is a matter entirely between man and his Maker, with which no human government has a right to meddle, and that its true exercise must be voluntary, it is equally humiliating and painful to us, as Christians and as citizens, to find the barbarous system of persecution, which characterized the dark ages, employed at this day in our Army and Navy, to compel attendance upon the religious services of our national clergy. Among the many cases of the kind, may be instanced the recent one of the private Duggan, who was sentenced by court-martial, at Fort Columbus, New York harbor, for neglecting to attend the chaplain's religious services, after having been frequently punished for the same offense, to a FINE of five dollars per month for six months, the torture of the ball and chain for four months, and partial starvation upon bread and water during the remaining two months of solitary imprisonment. We rejoice that a portion of this sentence was remitted by the clemency of the Department, but deeply regret that any religious persecution whatever is authorized by the Government, or rendered necessary to military discipline, by the employment of clergymen as Government officers to perform religious services in the Army and Navy.

Seventh.—While we reverence religion as a Divine institution, only claiming the free exercise of our own consciences concerning it, we firmly believe that all attempts of human governments to foster it will result similarly to that of Constantine, in its corruption and great detriment, and in rearing an ecclesiastical aristocracy of hireling hypocrites who will assume the clerical character from unholy motives, and ultimately lead to all the oppressive propinquity, impositions, and persecutions which have resulted from the same policy in the Roman and all other European Governments.

We therefore earnestly pray your honorable bodies to carefully consider the unconstitutionality, injustice, and oppression of the national chaplaincy system, and to abolish the office of chaplain wherever it may exist by your authority, thereby restoring us the liberty of contributing our own money for such religious and charitable purposes only as our consciences may approve.

During the reading of the foregoing remonstrance—

Mr. ELLIOTT said: The reading of that paper is objected to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I have the floor, and have a right to speak for an hour. I am reading the paper as a part of my remarks.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I would like to know who is the author of it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must refer the gentleman to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I am making it my own; I am appropriating it.

Mr. JONES then resumed the reading of the paper, but was again interrupted by Mr. HUGHES, who said: I rise to a question of order. The resolutions offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DOWDELL] propose to invite the clergy of this city alternately to open the sessions of this House with prayer, without compensation.

Mr. KEITT. The resolutions do not say that. Mr. HUGHES. Yes; the gentleman agreed to modify his resolutions. Now, my point of order is this: that the gentleman from Tennessee is arguing—because he reads this remonstrance as a part of his argument—against the election of a Chaplain, and against the enormous expenses which are entailed upon the public Treasury by compensation to Chaplains regularly elected. I think the gentleman is out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must overrule the question of order raised by the gentleman from Indiana. The Chair does not perceive but what the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee are pertinent to the resolutions before the House.

At a subsequent point in the reading of the resolutions—

Mr. HALL, of Massachusetts, (interrupting,) said: It appears to me that the reading of this remonstrance in regard to the election of chaplains generally for the Government service, and the Chaplain of this House in particular, is not in order on these resolutions, inasmuch as they are resolutions proposing that the meetings of this House shall be opened by prayer by the various clergymen of the city. They do not propose the election of a Chaplain, properly so called.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions make provision for the selection of officers in lieu of a Chaplain.

Mr. HALL, of Massachusetts. But it is not in order to discuss the question of chaplaincy.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If that question of order is debatable, I would suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that it has been the practice heretofore to elect a Chaplain. This is a proposition to obtain the services in a different way. My argument may be in favor of these resolutions.

Mr. HALL, of Massachusetts. It appears to me that this is altogether a different question—that it is not a proposition to select certain persons in lieu of a Chaplain, but a distinctive proposition that the session shall be opened by prayer, and that certain persons should perform that service. I think there is not a word in reference to the chaplaincy in the resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions of the gentleman from Alabama were intended to provide for the opening of the daily sessions of the House with prayer by clergymen of the city, in lieu of a Chaplain, who has heretofore been elected. They are a substitute for the policy heretofore pursued by the House, and the Chair thinks that the remarks the gentleman is making are in order.

Mr. EDIE. I would inquire if the point raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts has not already been decided by the Chair?

Mr. HALL, of Massachusetts. Well, I object to the further reading of that memorial, because it relates to subjects other than the chaplaincy of this House. It discusses the chaplaincy of the Army and Navy and the constitutionality of all religious services in this House.

Mr. EDIE. I call the gentleman to order. He is not stating his question of order, but arguing it.

Mr. HALL, of Massachusetts. I am making a statement to show what my point of order is. The question before the House relates to opening our daily sessions with prayer, but the gentleman is reading a remonstrance which discusses the question of chaplaincy in the Army and Navy, and the propriety of any such officer under the General Government. Such discussion is not pertinent to this question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would sustain the gentleman from Massachusetts upon the latter question of order which he raises, but the Chair's attention was not called to any remark bearing upon the particular point to which the gentleman has referred. The Chair will observe the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee a little more attentively, and will enforce the rule when he perceives any remarks out of order.

Mr. HALL, of Massachusetts. The gentleman has already violated the rules.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, then concluded the reading of the remonstrance, and proceeded to remark: All I have to say is, that the memorial which I have read to the House is but a copy of remonstrances sent to me from the States of Illinois, Connecticut, Iowa, Virginia, Ohio, Maine, Missouri, Georgia, Texas, Arkansas, Pennsylvania, and Indiana, signed in all by upwards of three thousand five hundred citizens.

The remonstrances received from the several States, and the number of signatures to each respectively, are as follows:

Illinois—Abram Highland and 31 others, and William Hixon and 202 others.

Connecticut—D. P. Coon and 70 others. Iowa—Joseph Armstrong and 102 others; T. Miller and 32 others; and E. C. Boag and 23 others.

Virginia—James D. Craft and 263 others. Ohio—David Gander and 104 others; Samuel Cleavinger and 34 others; Jonathan G. Ford and 5 others; John Snoddy and 50 others; George W. Gander and 37 others; and John Gander, jr., and 50 others.

Maine—Joshua C. Hatch and 102 others. Missouri—Davis S. Woody and 247 others; and A. M. Keele and 170 others.

Georgia—John W. Bowdoin and 149 others. Texas—Charles H. Kinnard and 173 others.

Arkansas—J. M. Cartwright and 35 others; Thomas J. Bates and 49 others; and William H. Bates and 169 others.

Louisiana—Thomas Price and 50 others; and H. L. Martin and 114 others.

Pennsylvania—Reuben Card and 49 others; and Burnell Lyman and 47 others.

Indiana—A. M. Westfall and 292 others; Joseph Allen and 56 others; James T. Drake and 83 others; William Abner and 149 others; Abram Chambers and 201 others; J. E. M. Swan and 136 others; W. A. Long and 124 others; R. M. Beem and 55 others; and Charles Back and 24 others.

I believe that those who signed these memorials, in the main belong to that denomination of Christians who concur in my opinions, and come nearer to primitive Christianity than any other. I believe they are honest in their remonstrance against what they consider an abuse, and that they are entitled to be heard.

In accordance with my promise to the gentleman from Alabama, I renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee, with the consent of the gentleman from Alabama, will withdraw his demand for the previous question, and allow me to suggest an addition to the last resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Alabama consents, I have no objection.

Mr. DOWDELL. I will withdraw it for a moment.

Mr. LETCHER. I suggest that the gentleman add, at the end of the second resolution, the words "without compensation."

Mr. DOWDELL. I accept the modification. Mr. FLORENCE. Is it in order to move that the resolutions be laid upon the table?

The SPEAKER. It is. Mr. FLORENCE. Is that motion debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. FLORENCE. I am for the old-fashioned practice, and move that the resolutions be laid upon the table. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered. The motion to lay upon the table was disagreed to.

Mr. EDIE moved that the House adjourn; which motion was disagreed to.

The call for the previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I ask for a division of the question. I desire to vote for the resolutions, but not for the preamble.

The SPEAKER. The question will be first on the resolutions and then on the preamble.

Mr. STANTON. There are two resolutions, and I want a separate vote on the one which asks the clergy of this city to perform service here every day for nothing.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the proposition is not divisible.

Mr. AVERY. I suggest that the second resolution be modified, so as to read, "without compensation out of the national Treasury."

The SPEAKER. Amendment is not in order, the main question having been ordered to be put.

Mr. DEAN. I demand the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. LEITER. I move that the resolutions be laid upon the table.

The question was taken; and the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. KELSEY. Does the Chair decide that a separate vote cannot be taken on each resolution?

The SPEAKER. The call for the previous question being sustained, it would hardly be in order to take a separate vote on each. A division might operate as an amendment.

Mr. BOCKO. I have not heard any gentleman say that he was authorized to pledge the clergy of this city to open the proceedings of this House every day, without compensation; and I would inquire whether, if we pass these resolutions, and the clergy will not act under them, it will not, nevertheless, be in order to proceed to the election of a Chaplain for this House, for the Thirty-Fifth Congress? I think that it will, and shall therefore vote for the resolutions, and give the plan a trial.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I think that we ought to pay the ministers who officiate for us; and I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered. If that motion be agreed to, I shall then move to strike out the words suggested by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER.]

Mr. DOWDELL. I move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The question was taken, and the motion was disagreed to—sixty-eight members only voting in the affirmative.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the motion to reconsider be agreed to, in what condition will it place the resolutions?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that it would bring the main question before the House. That is according to the former practice of the House.

Mr. HUGHES. The object of the motion to reconsider, if I understand it, is to get at the original proposition, so as to strike out that portion which proposes to withhold compensation from the clergy who may officiate for us. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOCKO] has asked if there is any one here who is authorized to pledge the clergy of this city to render this service without compensation.

Mr. FLORENCE. I am compelled to rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable.

Mr. HUGHES. Is the motion to reconsider not debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not while the House is acting under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. HUGHES. I hope I shall be permitted to answer the interrogatory of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. FLORENCE. I must object to debate, unless it is to be general.

The question being on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered,

Mr. LETCHER demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The vote was reconsidered; and the question recurred on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move now that the words "without compensation" be stricken out. "The laborer is worthy of his hire."

The SPEAKER. The pending question, upon which the House must act before any amendment will be in order, is upon the demand for the previous question.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I hope the House will not second it.

The SPEAKER. If the House vote down the demand for the previous question, the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia will then be in order.

The previous question was not seconded.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I now move to strike out the words "without compensation;" and I ask the previous question.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I intend, before resuming my seat, to submit a motion to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia upon the table. But before doing so, I desire to reply to the interrogatory of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOCKO.] He asked whether the clergy of this city would be willing to officiate without compensation.

Mr. STANTON. I rise to a question of order. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. STANTON. Then I object to it.

Mr. HUGHES. I hope the gentleman will permit the proposition of the clergymen of this city to be read to the House. They propose themselves to perform this service without compensation.

The SPEAKER. The previous question having been demanded, it is not in order to debate the pending question.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I believe I had the floor before the previous question was demanded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not so understand it.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Georgia, then, to withdraw the demand for the previous question, that I may read a proposition which was made to the last Congress by the clergy of this city. I will renew the demand.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. On that condition I withdraw it.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. The proposition is as follows:

"GENTLEMEN: The undersigned, ministers of the different denominations of Christians in Washington, respectfully submit to you the following statements and consequent proposal:

"During the long delay in the organization of the present House of Representatives, several of our number were invited to officiate in prayer at the opening of the daily sessions. The suggestion was then made that the various clergymen of the city might discharge this duty permanently, in the place of a single Chaplain; but doubt was expressed as to the readiness of the ministers of Washington to render such service.

"An expression on our part seeming, therefore, to be called for, we beg leave to state to your conviction, that the established election of a Chaplain from abroad, by your honorable bodies, had its origin in a necessity now no longer existing; that the plan adopted by many of our State Legislatures, of inviting neighboring pastors to act as their chaplains, thus removing all objection to the associating religious devotion with their deliberations, would reflect more credit on Christian ministers, would conduce more to their individual acceptableness and general usefulness among members of Congress and their families, and would in every way promote the end had in view in the election of Chaplains.

"We therefore respectfully tender our services, offering to alternate in the weekly service of opening the two Houses with morning prayer, and in conducting Divine service on Sabbath morning, with the distinct understanding that we decline receiving any remuneration for these services.

GEORGE W. SAMSON,

Pastor of E street Baptist Church.

BYRON SUNDERLAND,

Pastor of First Presbyterian Church.

JAS. R. ECKARD,

Pastor of Second Presbyterian Church.

T. A. HASKELL,

Pastor of Western Presbyterian Church.

P. D. GURLEY,

Pastor of F street Presbyterian Church.

GEO. HILDT,

Pastor of McKendree Chapel, M. E. Church.

GEO. D. CUMMINS,

Rector Trinity Church.

J. GEORGE BUTLER,

St. Paul's Lutheran Church.

J. MORSELL,

Rector Christ Church.

SAMUEL D. FINKEL,

Pastor German E. Church.

P. LIGHT WILSON,

Pastor Methodist Protestant Church.

"The above names represent eight denominations of Christians."

As I remarked before, that proposition was made at the last Congress, and doubtless those clergymen would be equally willing to do the same for this Congress. Indeed, I am just now informed that such a proposition has been made to the present Congress. The manner in which Chaplains have heretofore been employed in this House has not only attracted the attention of its members, but that of the country at large. The office has been sought for, and, indeed, I may say it has been sought for for the money. It has assumed a semi-political cast. The services performed under such circumstances will lose their effect not only upon us, but upon the country generally. I am, therefore, in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama. I think his the best mode. Let us try the plan. If it fails to work well we can resort to the old plan again.

I will not now stop to discuss the question. I have merely said what I have to justify my position. Having done so, and having pledged myself to the honorable member from Georgia to renew the demand for the previous question upon his amendment, I will do so, avowing at the same time that I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. Fearing that, from the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana, the amendment may be defeated, I ask the gentleman from Georgia to give me an opportunity to express my views.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I do not wish to prolong the discussion. I trust the amendment will be adopted, and that if these gentlemen tender their services they will be received, and the question of compensation be determined afterwards. I adhere to the demand for the previous question.

Mr. LEITER. I have a substitute I desire to offer, and I ask the gentleman from Georgia to withdraw the demand for the previous question, that I may offer it, and then the call can be renewed.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I will hear the substitute read.

The substitute was read as follows:

Resolved, That this House proceed to the election of a Chaplain for the Thirty-Fifth Congress.

Mr. SEWARD. I object to this applying the gag law, and then withdrawing it in favor of particular members.

Mr. LEITER. I offer the substitute for the purpose of having the sense of the House upon the question. I do not propose to discuss it, but I deem it worthy the notice of the House.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Ohio cannot be entertained unless the previous question be withdrawn.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I do not withdraw it. I move to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia upon the table.

Mr. HUGHES. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I rise to a question of order. Will not the motion to lay upon the table the amendment, carry with it the original proposition?

The SPEAKER. That is the opinion of the Chair, unquestionably, if the motion prevails.

Mr. HUGHES. I will then withdraw the motion to lay upon the table, and allow a vote to be taken upon it directly.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move to lay the amendment upon the table.

Mr. HUGHES. Upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I desire to know, Mr. Speaker, what the particular question is?

The SPEAKER. It is the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to lay upon the table the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia to the original proposition of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Did the Chair entertain that proposition?

The SPEAKER. He did.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. My recollection is, that I have never heard that motion made and entertained by the House. I think it carries the whole question with it, and that it is impossible to lay the amendment upon the table without carrying the original proposition with it.

The SPEAKER. Of course.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then I think it is not competent for the Chair to entertain the motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that parliamentary law will justify it, and there is no special rule to prohibit the Chair from entertaining the motion. If it prevails, it carries the original proposition with it.

The motion to lay on the table was lost.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The question being first upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia—

Mr. LEITER demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 119, nays 94; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Andrews, Banks, Barksdale, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bockoc, Bonham, Bowie, Branch, Brayton, Bryan, Budington, Burlingame, Burns, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Horace F. So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move that the entire proposition be laid upon the table. The propriety of this motion will strike every gentleman. The striking out of the words "without compensation," will impose on this House an expense probably of $10,000 per annum. I am not, for one, disposed to encourage such extravagance.

The question was taken; and the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to submit one or two remarks.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. FLORENCE demanded the yeas and nays upon the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. DAVIS of Indiana, and COMINS were appointed.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, the tellers having reported only twenty-five in the affirmative.

The resolutions were adopted.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the preamble be laid upon the table. It is totally unnecessary.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was taken; and the motion was not agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I offer the following resolution in relation to the new members of the House:

Resolved, That all public documents, of which extra copies were ordered to be printed for distribution, and which have not been delivered to the members then representing the respective districts under resolution of the last House of Representatives, shall now be delivered, by the officer having possession of the same, to the Representatives of the respective districts in this House entitled to the same according to the rates of distribution established.

Mr. QUITMAN. I suggest to my friend from Georgia that that resolution needs amendment. In some cases public documents consist of various numbers or volumes, and it is possible they would in some instances be divided, and that new members would receive the latter volumes of a document of which the old members had distributed the earlier volumes. It seems to me that that ought, if possible, to be avoided.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The old members have no franking privilege, and an arrangement is generally made between them and the new members.

Mr. QUITMAN. Suppose a document consists of several volumes, some of which have been published and distributed: the resolution of the gentleman from Georgia, in its present shape, would provide that the volumes not yet delivered should go to the new members, thus separating the parts of the same document from each other.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi propose an amendment?

Mr. QUITMAN. No, sir; I merely throw out the suggestion. I do not care about the matter. I am not interested in it.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The franking privilege of the old member being exhausted, although he may have received, say the first and third volumes of Commodore Perry's report, of which extra numbers were ordered, still, the second volume being issued, it will lie over here; it will not be sent to him; and if he was to receive it, he could not frank it to those who have received the other volumes. This is the most convenient arrangement, and the new members of the House, I presume, will carry out the views of the old members in this respect, and distribute whatever odd volumes there may be here, to those to whom the other volumes have been distributed. But they will not be forwarded to the old members, and even if they were, the old members could not frank them. This is exactly what was done at the last Congress.

Mr. FLORENCE. This same difficulty occurred two years ago. There were instances—and there probably may be now—in which members of the last House had died; and what would have become of the documents that had been voted to them unless some such provision as this had been made? A resolution, I believe, precisely similar to this, was adopted at the commencement of the last Congress, and it seems to me to be due to the new members of the House that they should have the distribution of the documents that are now down in the document room.

As has been forcibly said, the old members have no franking privilege and they cannot distribute these documents. I regard myself, and I believe members generally so regard themselves, as a mere trustee for the proper distribution of these documents; and those of our constituents who have incomplete sets of any documents will in all probability write to their Representatives and get the odd volumes, and that difficulty will thus be avoided. It seems to me that, inasmuch as it has been the practice, this resolution ought in all fairness to be adopted.

Mr. LETCHER. I do not propose to make any opposition to the adoption of this resolution. I believe that it is necessary, under the circumstances, to have these books distributed. All that I propose to do is to call attention somewhat to the manner in which books are ordered to be printed, in order that some of the difficulties under which members now labor may be avoided in future. It is notorious that at this time books ordered four, five, and six years ago, and which it was supposed at the time would make one volume, or two at the outside, are being written at this very hour in the city of Washington, and are prepared year after year for publication. I understand, in regard to one work ordered two or three sessions ago, and of which three volumes have already been printed, that there are plates now preserved by the Secretary of the Interior upon which he is waiting the action of Congress, and that it is proposed to color or stain them, and adopt other measures in connection with the printing of an additional volume of the work, that will run up the cost of a single volume to $200,000!

That is the way in which this thing of book printing is going on. We order a book to be printed, without knowing what it is; and the employes of the Government go on writing it from year to year, making up a complete book according to their own fancy of what it ought to be. My idea is, that it is the duty of the House, before they order the printing of any work, to have the work presented here, that it may be examined by a committee and its value ascertained; that it may have the sanction of this body before it is allowed to go to the Printer; and that the country may be relieved from the immense expense, now the subject of complaint, imposed upon it by the enormous bills for printing.

We hear gentlemen talking all around about the immense amount of the printing for the last Congress—that the bill amounts to some two million dollars. Well, who is to blame for it? It has grown out of our action. It is not the fault of the Printer, who was merely employed to execute our orders.

I throw out these suggestions now, thus early in the session, in order that the question may receive consideration; and that we may, as it is proposed we should, and as we ought to do, reduce the expenditures of this branch of the public service.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. On comparing the resolution of the gentleman from Georgia with that adopted at the commencement of the last Congress, for the distribution of the documents then in the folding-room, and which had not been distributed to the members of the Thirty-Third Congress, I find that it is precisely the same. I am informed by gentlemen upon my right, that have they been directed by their predecessors to distribute the documents to which their districts are entitled; and yet, because a resolution like this has not been adopted, the superintendent who has charge of the documents declines to deliver them to the new members, although they have been requested to distribute them to their constituents by their predecessors. This resolution appears to me to be, therefore, necessary, and I hope it will be agreed to. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof, the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, moved that the vote by which the resolution was adopted be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THE NEW HALL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Secretary of War:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, December 9, 1857.

SIR: I have the honor to state that the engineer now in charge of the work, has reported to me that the Hall of the House of Representatives, and the rooms for the offices of the Clerk of the House, in the extension of the Capitol of the United States, are ready for occupation.

In communicating this information, I beg leave to say, that the rooms aforesaid are now at the disposal of the House.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,
JOHN B. FLOYD.

Hon. JAMES L. ORR, Speaker House of Representatives.

The communication was referred to the select committee raised this morning.

MISSION TO CHINA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the annual statement of fees for judicial services, receipts and expenditures for 1856, of the United States Commissioner to China; which was ordered to lie upon the table, and be printed.

And then, on motion of Mr. BISHOP, the House (at half past two o'clock, p. m.) adjourned until Monday next.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 14, 1857.

Hon. R. W. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, appeared in his seat to-day.

Prayer by Rev. STEPHEN P. HILL.

The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Several messages of an executive character were received from the President of the United States, by Mr. J. B. HENRY, his Private Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the fifth annual report of the Superintendent of the Public Printing; which was, on motion of Mr. JOHNSON, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. ALLEN. I submit the following resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the Senate will, on Wednesday next, at one o'clock, proceed to the appointment of the standing committees.

Mr. WILSON. As it is understood that Senators are making up the list of committees, I am requested by my colleague [Mr. SUMNER] to state that, owing to the condition of his health, he desires that he shall not be placed on any of the committees of the Senate.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

DEATH OF SENATOR BUTLER.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, when I entered this Hall, on the first day of this session, and looked around for the familiar faces of those from whom I had parted at the close of the last, I was painfully impressed with the uncertainty of human life, and the vanity of all human hopes and expectations.

Little did I imagine, when I parted from my friend and colleague, that in the short space of two months he would be numbered with the dead; or that I, who was ten years older than himself, should stand here to-day to announce the melancholy event.

My deceased friend and colleague, the late ANDREW P. BUTLER, was born in Edgefield district, in the State of South Carolina, on the 18th day of November, 1796, and was, at the time of his death, on the 25th of May last, in his sixty-first year.

The cheerfulness of his temper and the buoyancy of his spirits might have indicated a more youthful age; but the extreme and premature whiteness of his locks might well have passed him an older man.

His family came from Virginia, and settled in South Carolina before the Revolution. Few families have been more distinguished in the annals of the State, or suffered more in the service of the country. General William Butler, the father of Judge BUTLER, served with distinction, as a captain, in the troops of the State, and in that bloody conflict and war of extermination waged between Whig and Tory toward the close of the Revolution, the history of which, with all its bloody incidents, has never been written. He was subsequently a major general of militia, and a member of Congress from 1801 to 1814. He left a large family, of which my deceased colleague was the last survivor.

Judge BUTLER received the rudiments of his education in the best school in the upper part of his native State, and was graduated at the South Carolina College in 1817, with more than ordinary distinction. He devoted himself to the study of the law; and, in a very short time after he was called to the bar, his reputation for sound legal learning and forensic eloquence was such that his professional business was large and lucrative, not only in his circuit, but he was on several occasions called to distant districts to argue cases of great interest to the parties, and requiring the best legal talents of the State.

When a very young man, he was elected a member of the State Legislature, where his talents, his diligence, but, above all, the uprightness of his character, soon gave him a high position. Whilst a member of the State Senate he was, in 1833, elected a circuit judge; and two years afterwards, on a change of the system, he became a judge of the court of appeals, the highest court of judicature in the State. In this court I sat side by side with him for ten years, and until he was elected to this honorable body. It was as a judge I knew him best, and in that character I feel that I can speak with confidence of his merits. To say of a judge that he was incorruptible, is but common praise. The breath of suspicion has never breathed on the character of a judge in my own State, nor elsewhere in this broad land, so far as I know. It was in the administration of the law that he illustrated that love of justice, the highest attribute of a good man, which separates the case from the parties, and dispenses justice to all equally, to friend or to foe, without favor or partiality. Many of his legal opinions will be read with instruction in all time to come, and show very conclusively that his professional acquirements were of no ordinary character.

In 1846, he took his seat in the Senate of the United States, and has since been twice reelected without opposition. In politics he belonged to the old Republican or State-Rights party, and was what has been called a strict constructionist. He was loyal to the Constitution in all its express grants of power, and what was necessary to their execution; but he resisted that latitude of construction which he feared would, in the end, make this a Government of unlimited instead of limited powers. During all the time he was a member of the Senate, he acted a conspicuous part in all its deliberations. For a large part of it he was the head of the Judiciary Committee, in all respects, perhaps, the most important of your committees, except that of Finance. In the discharge of this important duty, he bore himself with great dignity and uprightness. In the decision of those exciting questions which grow out of contested elections, where party feelings are so apt to mislead honest minds, I think I may say that the love of right, because it was right, was the pillar of light by which he was guided. The triumph of party was of no consideration with him, where truth and the Constitution were on the other side.

Those with whom he lived in social intercourse best understood the excellence of his character. It was there that the kindness of his feelings, the benevolence of his heart, and the hilarity of his temper, shone out in all their beauty.

As a parliamentary speaker his style was plain, logical, and unadorned; his manner temperate but earnest, showing the deep convictions of his understanding, and occasionally, when excited, rose to a high order of eloquence.

As a scholar his attainments were respectable; as much so as was compatible with a life spent in the laborious duties of an attorney, a judge, and a statesman. Such, sir, was ANDREW P. BUTLER. Surely the death of such a man is a public loss. When the news of his death went abroad, there was one universal wail from the center to the utmost border of his State; and I have reason to believe that the feeling of regret was not less intense throughout the broad expanse of these United States.

I therefore beg leave, Mr. President, to submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the Hon. ANDREW P. BUTLER, deceased, late a Senator from the State of South Carolina, will go into mourning by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect for the memory of the Hon. ANDREW P. BUTLER, the Senate do now adjourn.

Ordered, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Mr. MASON. In rising to second the resolutions, I can add nothing, Mr. President, to the eloquent and able tribute just rendered by the venerable Senator from South Carolina to the memory of his late colleague. It is more to indulge my own feelings of deep and sincere sympathy with those who survive than from any hope that I may contribute even one poor leaf to the garlands around his tomb, that I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a brief moment in these sad ceremonials.

It was my good fortune to have known our deceased colleague, ANDREW PICKENS BUTLER, on terms of more intimate association than most Senators now around me. He took his seat in the Senate in December, 1846, and I followed him in January, 1847. Educated in the same political school, and thus drawn together in political circles here, habits of association were formed which, for the ten years that followed our entrance into the Senate, and until his death, found us under a common roof, at a common hearth, and sharing a common board. Our intercourse and association were in every sense fraternal. And you, Senators, who knew him best, will best appreciate the loss I am called to mourn in common with you.

Pickens and Butler united in him, mark the noble and gallant race from which he sprung; and he sealed in death a duty to his descendants, by transmitting both names to them without spot or blemish, as he had received them. Bayard like, he bore them through life "without fear, and without reproach." With that hardy morality which fears no contact, he mingled gracefully and graciously in the walks of life, alike with the most humble and the most exalted; honored and caressed by the one, loved and trusted by all. Thus, while the genial flow of a generous and sympathizing spirit attracted to him all classes in life, his lofty and unbending integrity, manly purpose, and unswerving honor, assured to him the respect and unstinted confidence of all coming within his sphere. Distrust and suspicion were at once disarmed at his presence. Wherever else they might be found, there was no such atmosphere around him.

In forensic warfare, whether as friend or foe, all will bear witness alike to the true nobility of his nature. Bold, ardent, daring, and at times almost merciless when he joined in battle, yet there was no venom in any shaft that sped from his bow; and when the fight was done, his ready hand was equally extended, on whichever side victory might declare itself.

He was an efficient debater; more prone to, and perhaps more skilled in, attack than defense.

The rich and fertile resources of a well-stored mind proved that he was habitually a student; and their skillful and sagacious use evinced that nothing rusted in his intellectual armory, but, by thought and meditation, was kept polished and on edge.

Indeed, with him, the faculties of observation and meditation seemed more happily combined than it has been my lot to witness with other men. And then, nature, in its bounties, had added that great CREATIVE POWER which is the unerring mark, as it is the first instinct, of genius. His mind, in debate, seemed almost to overflow in the rapidity of its suggestions; and yet there was realized in him that rare faculty of excellence which the ancients ascribed to the Grecian painter, Timanthes, of whom it was said: "Intelligitur plus semper, quam pingitur."

As a Senator, you will all bear witness that, whatever differences arose amongst us in the rivalries and contentions of political life, whatever part he bore in them, was always distinguished by candor, loyalty, and good faith.

In the organization of this body, he held for many years, and until death closed forever the scenes of this world, the chair of that committee which stands as the law adviser of the Senate, but the duties of which are frequently complicated with political questions, involving the success or defeat of political parties. Who can forget how confidently and freely a minority was ever ready to commit all such questions to that committee, and how well that confidence was justified by its able, upright, and impartial decisions? The scales were held even, by a firm and resolute hand, however bitterness, prejudice, or distrust, might seek to disturb the balance.

Born, nurtured, and reared, in one of the most gallant States of the "Old Thirteen," he loved and venerated her fame with instincts that were truly filial; and as a child would defend a parent from insult or wrong, you have marked his form dilate, and his eye kindle and flash defiance, whenever called to vindicate the fame or honor of his State. His devotion and his first duty were to South Carolina; yet, on the broader theater of a common country, embracing all the States, his views were liberal, catholic, and fair; giving to each section its just and full share in whatever benefits or advantages flowed from a common Government. There his public service was directed with a single eye to the public good.

I have thus attempted, Mr. President, feebly to portray the Senator and the statesman as he stood confessed before the country. But it was in the social and domestic circle—in paths not opened to the common view, that the richest gifts of nature to man, the latent virtues of the heart, shone with a luster all their own. There was not an impulse there that was not generous, genial, and confiding. He sympathized with his race, and his whole race. If it was his fortune at some time "debellare superbos," that more grateful emotion was ever his, "parcere victis."

But I should not detain you longer with this poor memorial of the gallant dead. He sleeps beneath the soil of his own loved Carolina, amidst those who loved and honored him in life, and who received his last sigh in death.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President and Senators, in the utterance of a few and simple words, appropriate on this occasion, I shall not admonish you with reference to the public services, or the public character of our departed and illustrious associate. He was, in truth,

—"a man from whose example,
As from a compass, we may steer our fortunes,
Our action, and our age, and safe arrive at A memory that shall become our ashes."

But this all know: this would seem to be the share which all have, alike, in the memorial of his life and achievements. I shall speak of him as he was known to us, and to those whom he honored with his acquaintance.

When the Senate assembled one week ago, pursuant to the requirements of the Constitution, three vacant places were found in our midst. The experienced and venerable Senator [Mr. RUSK] whom we selected to fill the chair at the last hour of the preceding session, and whose many accents pronounced our separation; the modest, amiable, and accomplished Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. BELL] with whom several of us had just concluded the first stage of our allotted service here—the virtues of these, many as their virtues were, will be celebrated by other and more eloquent voices than mine. But the third place—oh, sir, that hardly seems vacant. He has not come as yet to our session; but so vivid are his countenance and his image in our recollection—so familiar the tones of his voice to the ear—so close in our hearts the pressure of his genial, bright, noble affection—that we rather expect him, upon the instant, again to enter those portals, once more to be with us and of us, than assure ourselves that he has gone, forever, to the portals of death.

Whatever the vacancy here, Mr. President and Senators, there is none in our memories, or in our love. Where only pure remembrance dwells; where the holiest of our affections, our sympathies, our hopes, are gathered; where the controversies and mean ambitions of the hour cannot intrude;—in that sacred chamber, with all the freshness of his life, an expressive figure still abides, the benignant eyes are beaming on us, and the tender voice is almost heard. He has gone from the bitterness which often, too often, distracts our counsels, which causes us to forget the kind words of another time, the constant and indispensable acts of courtesy, forbearance, and personal regard, even the tried friendships and the experience of troubles and danger in common. He is beyond all that could alienate him from us. The past will never be obliterated. He is our friend, and we are his friends, until together (as I hope) in happier circumstances, in a blessed sphere, spirit with spirit unobstructed can everlasting communion hold.

Let us not mourn for him. The measure of daily cares and toils, of continual annoyance, of perplexity, misfortune, and sorrow—he has filled that, and with that, has filled the measure of his fame. He has obtained at length, as well as earned, a discharge from the service of his grateful country; and now retires, silently, in the ripeness of age, to its enjoyment. In the fragrance of that grove of laurels through which, from on high, the ancient Eridanus rolls its copious flood—in the company of those who, in all past time, by wounds sustained in the public defense, by lives of purity and just example, by genius devoted to pious ends, by the invention of useful arts and other deeds worthy to be remembered, have won the snow-white fillet—his temples are crowned with eternal felicity and honor.

*"Conspicit, ecce, alios dextra, livaque per herban, Vescentes, latumque choro Pæan canentes,
Inter odoratum lauri nemus: unde superne
Plurimus Eridani per sylvam volvitur amnis.
Hic manus, ob patriam pugnando vulnera passi,
Quique sacerdotes casti, dum vita manebat,
Quique pii vates, et Phœbo digna locuti:
Inventas aut qui vitam excoluere per artes,
Quique sui memores alios fecere merendo,
Omnibus his nivea cinguntur tempora vitta."*

For ourselves, Mr. President and Senators, to have been his associates, to have learned the beauty of his character and his disposition—such an advantage does not happen to all, nor oftentimes to any man. It is for us to make the most of this; and, by this, to improve the tenor of our conduct and conversation—exalting to more lofty purpose the actions, the endeavors, the hopes of a lifetime. We shall thus derive from the inspiration of our departed associate that lesson he would most have desired to teach; and thus, like him, finish our days on earth with the glory of a complete example to our children and our countrymen.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, four years ago this day, immediately after taking the official oath and my seat on this floor, I was approached by a man whose silvery locks contrasted strangely with his youthful gait and manner, who, introducing himself, saluted me with cordiality and kindness, as prepossessing as it was generous. That man was ANDREW PICKENS BUTLER, then a Senator from South Carolina. The pleasant impressions of his first salutation were deepened by intimate intercourse during the two last Congresses, and can never be effaced from my memory. He was my pleasant companion, my cherished friend, my respected counselor! I feel it due to our relations while he lived, to publicly tender to his memory the homage of my esteem and affection now that he is dead! His surviving colleague, who knew him longer and better, has rehearsed the story of his life, and portrayed him in public and private relations, in which I knew him only by reputation. I shall endeavor to sketch a few salient points of his character, as they appeared to me in this Chamber and in private circles.

Judge BUTLER was gifted with a rare genius. He exhibited, in debate, the independence and freedom, the originality and eccentricity of a mind not fettered by rules, or addicted to following straight or beaten paths, but indulging in modes of thought and expression both peculiar and extraordinary. He seemed to labor less in conceiving than in expressing his ideas. His thoughts outran his words, causing him sometimes to halt and stammer in his articulation, notwithstanding his copiousness of imagery and vivacity of diction. His occasional and extemporaneous efforts were more felicitous and pleasing than those which were carefully prepared—if, indeed, he ever made careful preparation.

His style of oratory was rarely logical or argumentative, but often brilliant and eloquent. Although his mind was disciplined by a collegiate education and the severe studies of the legal profession—which he is reputed to have adorned both as a lawyer and a judge—yet I do not think he excelled in parliamentary dialectics. He was not a methodical thinker or syllogistic reasoner. He did not develop his conclusions by systematic gradations of analysis or synthesis. He did not elaborate them by regular concatenations of facts or of arguments. He did not persuade or convince the judgment by the judicious marshaling of his facts, or by the concerted and concentrated progression of his argument; but he enchained the attention and captivated the judgment by sudden sallies of wit, by humorous railery, by striking metaphors, by apposite aphorisms, by bold denunciations, and by soul-stirring eloquence. "He spoke what he thought, and as he thought it," in a rambling manner; now pausing in parenthesis; now abruptly rising from the level of narration to the higher flights of oratory, and again suddenly descending; now dashing off into a brilliant episode, and then hastily returning to his subject. Though swift in pursuit of his object, he was quick in turning from it. Like those animals that seize their prey by a single leap, instead of after a long chase, he often achieved his triumphs by one stroke of trenchant satire or a single volley of ridicule; by one arrow from his exhaustless armory, barbed with an epigram or an aphorism, or a single burst of burning words or vehement indignation. His manner, on such occasions, sharpened the point and added to the force of his projectiles. It was peculiar, inimitable, and indescribable.

Good sense, sincerity, and wit, were the prominent traits of his addresses. He seized on leading facts or great truths and urged them with energy and brevity. He quickly detected the fallacies of his adversary, and exposed them by concise criticism instead of elaborate argument. His efforts, generally, evinced but little labor and less art. They were the spontaneous effusions of his ardent nature. They came native from his heart and impelled the hearts of others with communicated power. His hearers were impressed with his thorough conviction, his intense interest, and his strong passion of his subject.

His wit was ready and versatile, playful and pungent, happy and harmless, and never produced a painful or rankling wound. It generally delighted even its victims, and was often most salutary when most sharp. Who does not remember more than one occasion when it burst like grateful sunshine through the angry clouds of sectional or party strife that enshrouded this Chamber, irradiating it with the genial light of joyousness and peace!

But it was in the private circles of society that the qualities of the man were most attractive and fascinating. It was in the midst of his friends, around the festive board, or the family hearthstone, that the wealth of his thoughts and his affections was freely lavished. There he best displayed his genial humor, his sparkling wit, his luxuriant imagination, his strong common sense, his exquisite sensibilities, his tender pathos, his generous and benevolent spirit. He there exhibited, in striking antithesis, the cool wisdom of age with the fresh and fervid feelings of youth, so singularly typified in his hoary head and impassioned manner—like Hecla, crowned with snow, while undying fires burn within its bosom.

"When I was a boy" was the poetry of his life. He loved to repeat the reminiscences of "the morn and liquid dew of life," especially of the period of our last war with Great Britain, of which (though too young to participate) he had a lively recollection, particularly of the scenes in South Carolina, and of the valorous and patriotic deeds of her sons and daughters. He spoke of them with a just pride of family and of State, dwelling with enthusiastic admiration upon what he termed "the hardy virtues of our ancestors."

He often rehearsed with tearful eyes and mournful words the admonitions of his noble and gentle mother, who had impressed his mind with religious truths which neither time nor secular pursuits had effaced. He had gathered up and treasured the golden sentiments of that pious woman with a sort of idolatry like that with which certain religionists regard their holy relics. Indeed, he revered her as something more than mortal—as "the connecting link between woman and angel."

His manhood was marked by many and unusual domestic afflictions—in the loss of all his near lineal and collateral relations save an only daughter—which cast a shadow on his pathway and tinged with sadness the usual current of his reflections. In familiar conversations he often alluded to these bereavements with the touching tenderness of an elegiac poet, or with the impressive seriousness of a philosopher, who had experienced the sad vicissitudes of human life and the utter emptiness of human enjoyments. The struggle between the native buoyancy and supervenient heaviness of his heart was like that between the sunshine and the cloud. His mind seemed perpetually oscillating between joy and sadness—from "grave to gay, from lively to severe."

Judge BUTLER was a man of "high thoughts seated in a heart of courtesy," although he sometimes had an odd, blunt way that might have been mistaken for ill-nature or rudeness by strangers. He scorned everything mean, or unworthy the true nobility of manhood. He was incapable of the selfish intrigues of the mere politician, or the vile traffic of the placeman. His mind revolved upon the axis of Truth, and he was what he seemed to be. His manners were marked by simplicity; his language, in his serious moods, by directness; his intercourse with the world by frankness and sincerity.

He was, I believe, universally esteemed a true friend and magnanimous foe, a zealous patriot and sagacious statesman. He loved the gallant State which he represented with the devotion of filial piety, and was ever ready to advocate her rights or defend her honor, and to pledge his fortune or peril his life in their support. He loved the union of the Constitution only less than South Carolina, notwithstanding he often dwelt with bitterness upon the wrongs which he believed had been done his own section, in violation of rights reserved or guaranteed by that sacred instrument.

That he had faults and committed errors, none will deny; but they were such as commonly belong to men of warm imaginations or strong social sympathies, and were like mists exhaling from summer streams, which obscure their beauties without defiling their waters. In contemplating such a character, every generous mind is inclined to excuse some defects, in consideration of the general symmetry of its imposing proportions.

It is no exaggeration of his merits, or disparagement of his successors, to say that his vacant chair can never be filled. No learning, however extensive; no talents, however superior; no genius, however great; no social virtues, however amiable, will ever be found in combination so strange and striking, so felicitous and fascinating, as in our late beloved and gifted friend—rare Judge BUTLER!

Mr. CAMERON. I cannot permit the present melancholy occasion to pass without adding my earnest tribute to the memory of the deceased, and attempting to express the profound sorrow I feel, in common with all who knew him, at the providential dispensation by which he has been removed from our midst, never to return.

During my former senatorial term, circumstances brought me into intimate relations with Judge BUTLER, which continued down to the close of his earthly career. I admired him for the high qualities of his mind, and loved him for the simple, childlike purity of his heart.

His fearless sincerity, his noble bearing, his purity of character, his surpassing eloquence, and his exalted patriotism, were the theme of admiring friends; while his rich store of humor, his fine imagination, and his wide range of legal and constitutional knowledge, made him both a commanding Senator and a universal favorite in the social circle.

His mind was lifted far above the level of sectional prejudice or local sentiment. Deeply imbued with the spirit of law and justice, his impartial judgment was swayed only by the dictates of honor and duty.

Whilst his great mental powers were naturally devoted to his own native State, he loved the whole Union, and was emphatically a Senator belonging and endeared to the whole country, anxiously watching every opportunity to promote its welfare and to exalt its position among the nations of the world.

He has left us in the strength of his manhood, and in the midst of his usefulness; but—

"Is it not better to die willingly
Than linger till the glass be all outrun?"

The resolutions were unanimously adopted; and the Senate adjourned.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States through Mr. JAMES B. HENRY, his Private Secretary.

THE NEW HALL.

Mr. WARREN. The committee appointed on Thursday last to examine the new Hall for the House of Representatives, have directed me to render the report which I hold in my hand. I ask that the report may be read; after which I propose to submit some additional reasons why the report should be adopted.

The report was read, as follows:

The special committee to examine into and report on the condition of the new Hall of Representatives in the south wing of the Capitol, and when it will be safe to occupy it, respectfully report:

That they visited and inspected the Hall on the morning of the 12th instant. Some of the members of the committee had supposed that, the room having been lately finished, the walls must necessarily be damp. But on consulting with the Superintendent, Captain M. C. Meigs, of the corps of engineers, they were informed that the walls of the chamber had been built for two or three years, and the interior walls supporting the galleries, and the walls under the floor for several months; that they were all laid in brick and cement, which dries much more rapidly than common lime mortar. There was no appearance of dampness about the room or walls, excepting where the first plastering, having been injured in putting up the door-frames, had been removed and replaced, to a small extent, by fresh plaster, which, of itself, had been upon the walls for some two weeks.

A hygrometer above the Speaker's desk indicated a dry atmosphere; and, so far as the committee could judge from their own sensations, the air in the room was as dry as that of any ordinary apartment. They found the room warm, well lighted, and ventilated by a supply of air, which, they are assured by Captain Meigs, the superintendent, was flowing through the room at the rate of not less than eleven thousand five hundred feet per minute, as determined by observations at the inlet passages by a delicate anemometer. The temperature had been designedly raised rather higher than was agreeable, in order, by driving through the room a large quantity of air at a high temperature, to raise that of the large body of masonry in the flues under the floor, which had been chilled by the cold weather immediately preceding the meeting of Congress and the completion of the heating apparatus.

The two fans—one of which is intended to drive air through the large coil of steam pipes provided for heating the House of Representatives, and the other through the numerous coils arranged in different parts of the cellars to supply heat to the committee rooms, lobbies, and corridors of the building—are not yet completed. But as the air, warmed by the steam coils, rises into the rooms in sufficient quantity, in consequence of the difference in specific gravity of heated and cold air, the heating and ventilation of these rooms were found to be in a very satisfactory state, the only fault to be found with them being that they were, perhaps, too warm. This heat, however, is under perfect control, and can be increased or diminished at pleasure.

The supply of air to the Representatives' chamber, at the time of the committee's visit, has already been stated at eleven thousand five hundred feet per minute, by actual measurement. They were informed that the fan which is being built for the supply of the Hall, will be capable of supplying one hundred thousand cubic feet per minute—a quantity sufficient to change entirely the air contained in the Hall every five minutes, the cubic contents of the Hall and galleries being four hundred and sixty-five thousand cubic feet.

The members' retiring room, the Speaker's room, the Clerk's rooms, the room for the Sergeant-at-Arms, the current document rooms, the cloak and hat, and wash rooms, are conveniently arranged near the Hall, and are ready to be furnished and occupied.

The south lobby and the private stairs are so arranged as to admit of cutting off all the above rooms from the admission of strangers, and reserving them for the sole use of the House; and this the committee recommend to be done by order of the House.

For the official reporters of the House, a convenient desk, immediately under the clerk's desk, is provided; and for the accommodation of the reporters of the public press, there is ample room in the gallery, immediately over the Speaker's chair, and east of the railing. The committee recommend that this part of the gallery, and the room immediately behind it, in the third story, be set apart for their use, and provided with desks and conveniences for taking and writing out their notes. The telegraphic wires should also be introduced into this room, so as to permit the transmission of intelligence direct from the reporters to the distant press. By this means, the report of an hour's speech might be completely set up in New York within fifteen minutes after its delivery.

The corridors leading to the Hall are dry and comfortable. In some of them the tile floors are not yet laid; but there is no reason for waiting until this is done. The floors are of brick, and can remain in their present condition until the termination of the session, the tiles in the mean time being stored in the cellar.

For the present, the committees and the officers of Congress whom it may not be convenient to accommodate, can remain in the old building, to which there will be convenient access through a covered passage leading from the new directly to the old Hall, which it will enter by the window-door behind the Speaker's chair.

The committee made some trial of the acoustic qualities of the room. They found very little reverberation; so little as not to interfere with distinctness of hearing; and ascertained by trial that not only could all that was said at the Speaker's desk be heard on all parts of the floor and galleries, but that the voice from each member's desk or from any part of the galleries could be easily made audible in all parts of the room, without raising it above the tone required in speaking across a table.

There may be some little inconvenience and interruption of work upon unfinished parts of the building outside of the Hall; but the Hall itself is completely ready for the use of the House; and, in view of the great advantages in the comfort, convenience, and health of the members—the great improvement in the transaction of the legislative business, from the perfect acoustic qualities of the room, insuring to every member, wherever his seat may be, the ability to be heard and understood when he may address the House—and, in view of the fact that the immense expenditure of the Capitol extension has been incurred solely for the purpose of providing such rooms for the deliberations of Congress—they cannot hesitate to recommend that the House avail themselves of the use of this room as soon as possible.

Some furniture and books for current use it will be necessary to remove; and some lumber and rubbish yet incumbent the approaches. These can all, in their opinion, be removed by Wednesday morning; and they therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That, when this House adjourns to-morrow, it will adjourn to meet in the new Hall of Representatives, in the south wing of the extension of the Capitol, on Wednesday at noon.

Mr. DAVIDSON. If the gentleman from Arkansas intends to make a speech in favor of adopting this resolution, I desire to make a statement to the House, so that we may understand the question to be discussed. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills, I have, in some measure, the responsibility of the Clerk's office; and I have to say to the gentleman from Arkansas and this House, that, since the proposition for removal has been mooted, being aware of the responsibility which would be incurred if the Clerk's office could not be prepared for the papers which must be removed there, I have investigated the facts, and I will say to the House that the papers in the Clerk's offices could not be removed there in three weeks, if they were to commence to-day. And even then, when they were removed, it would be only temporary; for the designs of the iron castings, which are permanently to hold the papers, have not yet been made.

I have no objection to the House removing there whenever it shall see fit, if the public interest is not jeopardized thereby. But, if the House intends removing there, the day ought to be put far enough in the prospective to enable the clerks to remove their papers.

Mr. WARREN. I strikes me with considerable force that it is time that the members of this House should have some regard to their own convenience and comfort, and not look so much to that of those outside the House. I would be as anxious as any other gentleman to accommodate the clerks, but I am perfectly certain that the longer this is deferred the longer they will defer removing their papers.

I desire to state, in addition to the facts contained in the report, that this committee have taken no little trouble in investigating the condition of the new Hall. We were there for four hours on Saturday, and examined the capacities of the Hall, not only in respect to acoustics, but in reference to the matter of temperature, and the convenience and comfort of members. They had it lighted on Saturday night. It was again tested yesterday, when there was a large concourse—not less than fifteen hundred people assembled. The Hall was full, and the galleries were filled to overflowing; but no gentleman experienced any inconvenience in consequence of the temperature of the Hall, or difficulty in hearing.

Now, I say again, that the longer we defer our removal, the longer the officers of the House will delay the removal of their papers. They have no wish to remove. They are comfortably located where they are; they have all the conveniences to make them comfortable. But we are not comfortably situated. Every gentleman knows the difficulty of hearing in this Hall. No gentleman can either understand himself or make others understand him. The most remote seat in that Hall is far preferable to the choicest one in this.

Other gentlemen are unwilling to remove because they do not wish to be annoyed by the workmen outside of the Hall; but the Superintendent informed the committee that the House should not hear the sound of a hammer while they were in session. The workmen could be employed there during the forenoon, and employed on the other wing of the Capitol the remaining portion of the day.

I believe the resolution should be adopted, and I demand the previous question.

The call for the previous question was seconded; there being, on a division—ayes one hundred and forty-one, noes not counted.

Mr. MORGAN demanded tellers on ordering the main question to be put.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KEITT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to vote understandingly on this matter, and I should therefore like to ask the gentleman from Arkansas a question.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. KEITT. I am not going to debate the question. I presume the House desires the information I seek as much as I do. I would inquire of the chairman of the committee whether the approaches to the new Hall are in a condition to fit it for occupation by the members?

Mr. WARREN. They will be in such condition at the time fixed in the resolution.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 149, nays 61; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Ahl, Anderson, Andrews, Atkins, Avery, Banks, Barksdale, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bratton, Bryan, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Comins, Cox, Crawford, Curtis, Darnell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Iowa, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dimmick, Dowdell, Durfee, Elliott, English, Fenton, Foster, Giddings, Gillis, Gilmer, Granger, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Howard, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelly, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Peyton, Phelps, Potter, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Reilly, Ricand, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Sandidge, Scales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Singleton, Robert Smith, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Stevenson, William Stewart, Talbot, Tappan, George Taylor, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Ward, Warren, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—149.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Billingshurst, Boeck, Bonham, Burns, Chapman, Colfax, Covode, Cragin, James Craig, Burton, Craig, Curry, Davidson, Dewar, Dodd, Edmundson, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Goode, Godwin, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hickman, Hill, Houston, Hughes, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, Landy, Leech, Leidy, Leitcher, Miller, Millson, Montgomery, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Pettit, Phillips, Pike, Pottle, Ruffin, Savage, John Sherman, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, James A. Stewart, Miles Taylor, Waldron, Wilson, and Zollcofer—61.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. WARREN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. LANE, by unanimous consent, previous notice having been given, introduced a bill making an appropriation for the payment of the expenditures incurred by the Territories of Oregon and Washington for the suppression of Indian hostilities therein; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LANE. I ask leave to introduce another bill—a bill making an appropriation for the completion of the military road from Astoria to Salem, in Oregon Territory.

Mr. BLISS. What is the regular order of business?

The SPEAKER. A call of the States for resolutions.

Mr. BLISS. I insist on the regular order.

The SPEAKER proceeded with the call of the States for resolutions, beginning with Maine.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask leave to introduce a bill donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts, of which previous notice has been given; and shall ask that it be referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COBB. It is unusual to order the printing of a bill on its introduction and reference. It is as well, probably, that the practice should be adhered to at the beginning of the session as at any other time. I have no particular objection to this bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I withdraw that portion of my motion for the printing of the bill.

There were, on a division of the House, eighty votes in favor of the reference of the bill as indicated, and sixty-six opposed to it.

Mr. LETCHER. I demand the yeas and nays. Let us start right, Mr. Speaker, and we will continue in the right. I understand that the proposition before us is to refer this bill to the Committee on Agriculture instead of the Committee on Public Lands. A bill relating to an appropriation of the public lands ought unquestionably to go to the Committee on Public Lands, if it go anywhere. What has the Committee on Agriculture to do with it? What does it know about the disposition of the public lands? Nothing; and it seems to me we had better start right than to get right afterwards; and that each proposition, as it is introduced, should be referred to its appropriate committee. The probability is, that if this bill goes to the Committee on Agriculture, it will be reported back with leave to have it referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MORRILL. I call for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read in extenso. It provides that there shall be granted to the several States and Territories, for the purposes specified in the title, six million three hundred and forty thousand acres of the public land, to be apportioned according to representation in Congress, and with other conditions which are named in detail.

DEATH OF SENATOR BUTLER.

Before the reading was concluded, a message was received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKENS, its Secretary, communicating to the House of Representatives the proceedings of the Senate of respect to the memory of the Hon. Andrew P. BUTLER, deceased, late a Senator from the State of South Carolina.

The message having been read,

Mr. BOYCE said: Mr. Speaker, the resolutions before the House announce the death of ANDREW PICKENS BUTLER, late Senator from the State of South Carolina. It is my melancholy privilege to add my feeble tribute of respect to the more imposing proceedings of the Senate.

Judge BUTLER departed this life on the 25th day of May, A. D. 1857, at Stonelands, his residence, in Edgefield district, South Carolina. He died in the midst of his friends and kindred, receiving from them every kindness the most devoted affection could suggest, and his last visions of earth were of those scenes most endeared to him by the memories of his past life.

Judge BUTLER's health was somewhat impaired at the close of the last Congress, but no serious consequences were apprehended, so that the rapid and fatal termination of his disease was in a great degree unexpected.

Judge BUTLER was born on the 18th day of November, 1796, in Edgefield district, South Carolina. His father rendered distinguished services to the Whig cause in the great war of our Revolution, and his mother was a woman of great strength of mind and unusual force of character.

The subject of my remarks, after receiving a course of intellectual training under the best instructors, was entered as a student of the South Carolina College, where he soon gave evidence of great promise, and where he subsequently graduated with distinction. Upon completing his collegiate course, he devoted himself with ardor to the study of the law, choosing the same path so many great minds have taken to distinction. Upon his admission to the bar, his success was rapid and brilliant; his vigorous mind and impulsive energy soon placing him in the front rank of the profession.

In 1833 he was called by the Legislature of South Carolina to a seat on the bench of the supreme court, which position he held until his election to the United States Senate in 1846, as the colleague of Mr. Calhoun. It was from this period he became known to the people of the United States, his reputation previously having been confined to his own State. His services in the Senate were active and important. His position as chairman of the Judiciary Committee required him to take cognizance of a class of cases of great delicacy and interest—contested elections—for the proper consideration of which he was peculiarly fitted, by his freedom from party bias. During his senatorial career some of the most agitating questions arose which have ever convulsed the public mind, in the consideration of which he bore his full share of responsibility. Indeed, during his long term of service in the Senate, there was hardly an important debate in which he did not take a prominent part.

Upon all questions in our foreign relations he was firm, yet discreet; and upon sectional questions, while steadfastly insisting upon the constitutional rights of the South, he was eminently conservative. It is not my purpose, however, to refer with minuteness to his senatorial history. He has made his own record upon the pages of our congressional annals, to which the student of political philosophy may turn with interest and advantage.

Judge BUTLER's intellectual gifts were remarkable. His mind was strong, fertile, acute, quick, and suggestive. He did not arrive at his conclusions by slow gradations of reasoning, but he bounded to them with impetuosity. His discourses were not regular chains of ratiocination; his mind was too ardent for this slow process. He came at once to his strong points, and stated them in graphic language. He did not pursue his subject by the dim twilight of a cold logic; he seized it promptly and bore it with him, illuminating the flight of his genius with perpetual flashes.

In him mind and body were in more remarkable accord than any orator to whom I have ever listened. You could almost hear the beatings of his heart in the tones of his voice. He had all the attributes of the orator—mind, body, soul, all gave their assurance and their aid. His eloquence was not the cloquence of art; it was the eloquence of nature. Nothing could be more simple than his style of speaking. It was nature—pure nature—sublimated, indeed, by a poetic temperament, and chastened by the study of the great masters. A strong mind, imagination all compact, words that burn, a noble heart, a commanding person, a bold and fiery spirit, all wreaking themselves upon expression, were the secrets of his power. Besides this occult spell and mystery of eloquence, Judge BUTLER also had, in a remarkable degree, what Cicero so much commends: boni senatoris prudentia—the prudence of a good Senator; and herein consisted a striking and distinctive trait in his intellectual organization—in his emotions all impulse; in his actions he was all prudence.

But in his moral attributes he towered still more proudly eminent. He was a man of an exquisite sense of honor. His soul was full of authentic fire. He was just, generous, kind, and forgiving. He contemplated human life from the stand-point of an elevated moral grandeur. He was the material out of which heroes are made; and if fate had so willed it, like Bayard or Russell, or his heroic brother, Pierce Butler, who fell at the head of the Palmetto regiment, he would have sublimely died under the most malignant star.

Such was ANDREW PICKENS BUTLER, no common-place man, dwarfed by materialism, but a real man. His majestic form, his noble head silvered o'er with the frosts of age, rise even now before me, and I think of a Roman Senator in the best days of the great Republic, when Pyrrhus and the unwonted elephant were despised. I never went into the Senate Chamber, and looked upon that august body, in the midst of which, near his approved friends, the Senators from Virginia, sat this venerable man, but that I felt proud to see my State so worthily represented. But he is no more; he sleeps in the bosom of his native State, which he loved so well; the somber pine forests of the land of the sun, unheeded, sigh their unceasing requiem over his grave.

Peace and honor to his memory. He is one of the last of a constellation of great men, which South Carolina, with a singular prodigality, gave to the service of the Federal Government. His name will shortly be but a memory. We, too, will soon tread the dark passage of the tomb, through which he has passed, and other representatives, strangers to him and to us, will walk these Halls.

The paths of glory have no exit but the grave. Life is but a brief episode in the great drama of immortality, and death but an event in that episode. Let us, then, so act our parts as to meet that inevitable event with fortitude, and justify, if not a place in the pantheon of history, at least a place for some short space in the recollections of good men.

I offer the following:

Resolved, That this House has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of ANDREW PICKENS BUTLER, late a Senator in Congress from the State of South Carolina.

Resolved, That as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, the members and officers of this House wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That the proceedings of this House in relation to the death of ANDREW PICKENS BUTLER be communicated to the family of the deceased by the Clerk.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect for the memory of the deceased this House do now adjourn.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I rise, sir, to second the motion for the adoption of those resolutions. But before the question is put, I wish to add a few words to what has been said by the gentleman from South Carolina, in honor of the memory of the distinguished Senator whose death has been announced. Judge BUTLER was known to me personally. His immediate constituents and mine are neighbors. Nothing but the broad and beautiful Savannah separates them. Identified in interests, identified in habits, in sentiments, and in feelings, their sympathies naturally commingle on a common loss and bereavement, and such this is considered.

Judge BUTLER possessed, in an eminent degree, those qualities that not only secure the esteem and the admiration always due to genius and learning and talent of a high order, but those other qualities that win the love and the affection of all who come within their range. He was emphatically a man cast in an original mold, of most marked characteristics, physical as well as intellectual. As the honorable gentleman spoke of his silvery locks and majestic form and stately person and Roman countenance, I could almost imagine him again standing in our midst. Those of us who knew that form and knew that gallant bearing, with the sense of age and the fire of youth, can never forget him. He was mercurial in his temperament, more pointed in conversation, as well as in argument, than he was logical. But he was, nevertheless, firm and stable.

In the social circle he shone to great advantage. Wit and humor, drawn from classical sources, were his delight. He was chaste in thought and classical in expression. In the busy pursuits of life, the abstruse studies of the law, or the labors that devolved on him in public life, he did not forget the cultivation of letters. He scorned to wrangle, yet he had a zeal for truth. In manner he was easy and agreeable—in intercourse with mankind, warm-hearted, brave, chivalrous. None was more liberal; none more unoffending; none more generous, noble, or magnanimous.

He was firm, though versatile. Decision was one of his marked characteristics. As a judge and as a legislator, he came up to the ideal of one of his favorite poets:

*"Justum et tenacem propositi virum
Non civium ardor prava jubentium;
Non vultus instantis Tyranni Mente quatit solida."*

Few men were more amiable and mild in disposition, none more resolute in purpose.

Sir, eulogy is not my object; that may be left for his biographer or historian. He that was a few months ago with us, is gone. Those places that knew him so well, will know him no more. We, too, are passing away. How brief the time since the voices of Lowndes, of McDuffie, of Calhoun, and of Hamilton, were heard within these walls! The cold sod covers them to-day. The voice of BUTLER is silent in the grave with theirs. These were men that stirred, in their day, empires—a proud galaxy, of which the gallant Palmetto State, which they almost adored, may well be proud. As a mother, she may well boast of such jewels.

But, the thought, how suggestive, when we see men of such character in their day and generation, passing away, receding from the existing generation—how suggestive the thought—the truth that—

"When fame's loud trumpet hath blown its noblest blast, Though loud the sound, the echo sleeps at last;
And glory, like the phoenix 'midst the fires,
Exhales her odors, blazes and expires."

"What shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue!" How transitory pleasures! How unsubstantial honors! The only hope to the wise and the good—the virtuous good—on this earth, with all their aspirations for honorable place—and such aspirations are to be great only so far as they are good—is the hope, the day-star of promise, that hereafter the dust of these bodies, like the ashes of that same fabled phoenix, is to be quickened into newness of life in a future existence, where to each shall be measured out according to the deeds done here in the body; where there shall be no more strife, no more pain, no more death, but never-ending immortality. I second the resolutions.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my cordial concurrence in the resolutions which have been reported from your table. They announce to us the sad intelligence of the decease of the venerable and distinguished Senator from South Carolina, whom to know was to admire—whom to hear was to learn wisdom.

It is no part of my purpose to refer to those minute characteristics of the deceased, or those amiable and affectionate traits in domestic life which give such completeness to human character. I speak only of what I know. My acquaintance with the deceased Senator commenced some eight years ago, when upon entering this body I found him in the other branch of the Legislature, associated with his preëminently distinguished colleague, Mr. Calhoun. The mournful obsequies attending the death of that illustrious man are still deeply impressed upon my recollection, and hardly less so the fact that in the short space of two months the successor of Mr. Calhoun, the lamented Elmore, followed him to the world of spirits. And now another Senator from the same State has responded to the all-compelling summons, and has joined those his illustrious compeers, in the chambers of the dead. Yet not among the Senators only of South Carolina has the hand of death been at work—it has stricken down also numbers of her sons in this House. Fortunate, indeed, though bereaved, are that people who have such wealth of eminent citizens to lose!

In the death of Judge BUTLER, not his constituents alone, but the whole country has sustained a heavy loss. He was, in the best and fullest sense of the word, a patriot. No man possessed of so many generous and noble qualities could be other than a patriot. To a nice and intuitive sense of justice, he added upon all occasions a matured judgment, formed upon careful examination and reflection. Unaffected and unostentatious as he entirely was, he possessed an originating mind, cultivated and adorned by the most extensive reading and classical study. His amiability of temper and large conversational powers made him a most agreeable companion and favorite in every circle in which he moved. To the artless simplicity of a child, was joined in him a firmness of purpose far above the reach of flattery or intimidation. His motives were always right, his actions magnanimous, and his heart beat full with manly emotions and sensibilities. He attained great influence, not by lengthy and elaborate speeches, but by addressing himself with clearness, force, and earnestness directly to the point. He never sought advantages by indirection, but relied upon the justness of his opinions and the force of legitimate argument for success. In all the qualities and qualifications which constitute a pure and able statesman, and an honorable and virtuous citizen, the deceased Senator might be safely taken as a model; and with such a model, how few, how very few, will equal—how many, how very many, will fall below it.

The great American statesmen who, for a generation, have, like faithful sentinels, been guarding the lines of the Republic, and protecting it from dangers without and within, are fast passing away. While each successive year adds to the moral and material wealth, and to the power and renown of our extended and happy country, those great lights, who have watched over, guided and advanced these developments through the dark and trying hours of our political night, disappear like the twinkling jewels from God's firmament, before the coming brightness of day.

"Oh! 'tis sad, in that moment of glory and song,
To see, while the hill-tops are waiting the sun,
The glittering band that kept watch all night long
O'er love and o'er slumber, go out one by one.

Thus, oblivion, from midst of whose shadow we came,
Steals o'er us again when life's twilight is gone,
And the crowd of bright names, in the heaven of fame, Grow pale and are quenched as the years hasten on."

But, sir, while we thus bear tribute to the virtues of the illustrious dead we are admonished, by these constantly recurring events, that we too are mortal. But a few months or years, at most, and we shall leave these stirring scenes of life, to be seen no more on earth forever. How vain, how foolish, then, are all our strifes and struggles here if prompted by love of power, or low, personal ambition. Let us learn wisdom from the contemplation of these things, and, following the example of him whose death we now deplore, look only to the welfare of our common country and our race. Let us be true to ourselves, and we cannot be unjust to any man. Let us seek only for that honorable and honest fame which results from a faithful discharge of all our duties, both public and private. We shall thus leave a record and a character of which our children will never be ashamed, and of which our country may well be proud:

"So live, that when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan which moves
To that mysterious realm where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not, like the quarry slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon, but, sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams."

Mr. GOODE. Mr. Speaker, in coming forward to mingle in these solemn ceremonies—these funeral rites—it is not my purpose to sketch the history of the distinguished man whose virtues we commemorate, whose death we mourn. I shall not direct attention even to the prominent incidents in his useful life—this has been done by one from whom it appropriately came. I shall not attempt to pronounce his eulogy; that eulogy is indelibly inscribed on the heart of every man who knew him. I come to perform the last sad, solemn offices of friendship; I come to express my sorrow for the dead, my admiration of his virtues, my affection for his person while yet he lived—my reverence for his memory now that he is gone.

Four years have passed since I assumed towards Judge BUTLER the relation of an intimate friend. Before that time I knew him only as he was known to the world. We then became inmates of the same household, members of the same domestic circle. We lived together to the close of the last Congress, when we parted to meet on earth no more; and throughout that long term, and in that most intimate relation, I saw everything to admire and to love.

His social and convivial qualities, his powers of conversation, his cheerful disposition, his humor, wit, learning, taste, and inexhaustible fund of anecdote, charmed and fascinated in all his public intercourse with men; but it was in the privacy of domestic life—it was in the sanctity of his home, that he revealed the noble nature and those high, endearing qualities which seized upon the heart and captivated the affections.

I speak not of the powers of his mind; the brilliancy of his intellect; his successes in the political arena; nor his aptitude for the great theater of life. On these the world will pass its judgment. I speak not of the extent of his learning; the character of his attainments; his elegant accomplishments; nor the delicacy and refinement of his tastes. These, too, were open to public criticism. I follow him to the seclusion of domestic life. I follow him to his inmost home, where the real nature stood revealed, to offer my homage to his heart; that ever kind and generous heart; that ever pure and noble nature; ever kind to friends, ever generous to foes.

The point of honor and the standard of benevolence never ranged higher in the human soul. In private intercourse, he was painfully sensitive to the sufferings of others, regardful of their feelings, and cautiously avoided every topic which by possibility could pain. And if, perchance, he ever wounded, he felt what he inflicted, and was prompt to extract the barb.

He was ever true and truthful—trustworthy and faithful; kind to the dependent, liberal to the poor, condescending to the humble; frank, manly, respectful, and courteous to equals; sincere and cordial with his friends—kind, generous, and magnanimous to all; his life was a beautiful illustration of the aphorism, that pleasure consists in giving pleasure.

In the stern contests and sharp conflicts of life, the instinct of mind and the incentive of patriotism called out the inherent energies of his being. In defense of his beloved State, in defense of his native South, in defense of his country and the Constitution, he struck boldly and with all his might. But victory achieved, his sympathies responded to the groan of the vanquished; he was eager to bind up the wounds of the fallen, and minister relief to the distressed.

Sir, I have seen him in the relations of civil and social life, in prosperity and adversity, in the fulness of joy, and the bitterness of grief. I have seen him in the Senate Chamber pouring out the volume of native eloquence, with listening throngs hanging on the accents of his manly voice. I have seen him in the brilliant social circle "the observed of all observers"—charming all with the beauties and graces of conversation. I have gone with him to his home, to witness there his expansive benevolence—softening the cares, soothing the sorrows, cheering the gloom, or lighting up the joys of those whom he loved. I have seen him bending over the bed of sickness, tenderly ministering to its painful wants, and whispering consolation to the sufferer. And, sir, I have seen him in the gloomy chamber of death, gazing on the cold corpse of the friend who was dearest to his heart, writhing in his own agony, till, clasping to his bosom the lifeless form, he sobbed forth the wail of unutterable woe. In every varying circumstance of life I saw him a noble specimen of his race.

Sir, I forbear—I have gone too far. You will pardon the enthusiasm of friendship. I but feebly express what I forcibly feel. Knowing the goodness of his heart, and the nobleness of his nature—loving the man and revering his memory, I stand a sincere and sorrowing mourner at the grave of ANDREW PICKENS BUTLER.

The resolutions were then unanimously agreed to; and the House accordingly adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 15, 1857.

Prayer by Rev. D. P. GURLEY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter dated May 30, 1857, from Peter Parker, United States Commissioner to China, transmitting regulations for the consular courts of the United States in China, in pursuance of the act of Congress of August 11, 1848, for such revision as Congress may deem expedient; which was, on motion of Mr. Mason, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Also, a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the annual statement required by the act of May 1, 1820, showing balances of appropriations standing upon the books of the Second Comptroller's office, to the credit of the Interior Department, on July 1, 1856; the amounts appropriated by Congress for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857; and the aggregate amounts applicable to the service of that fiscal year; also, the amounts drawn from these appropriations or carried to the surplus fund July 1, 1856, to June 30, 1857, and the balances remaining in the Treasury at the last named date; which, on motion of Mr. Mason, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Also, the laws passed at the third session of the Legislative Assembly of Nebraska Territory, which was held at Omaha City, January 5, 1857; together with the Journals of the Legislative Assembly; which, on motion of Mr. Mason, were ordered to lie on the table.

DEATH OF MR. BELL, OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, it is my duty, in obedience to a long-established, and, in my judgment, peculiarly appropriate custom of the Senate, to announce to the body the decease of my late colleague, Hon. JAMES BELL, which occurred at his residence in Gilford, New Hampshire, on the 26th of May last.

Mr. BELL was the son of the late Samuel Bell, of our State, who, for a time, was one of the justices of our highest judicial court; subsequently, for several years, Governor of the State, and for twelve years a member of this body. My late colleague was born in Francestown, in the county of Hillsborough, on the 13th of November, 1804; finished his studies, preparatory to entering college, at Phillips's Academy, in Andover, Massachusetts; and in September, 1819, before he had completed his fifteenth year, he entered the sophomore class in Bowdoin College. He was graduated in 1822, and immediately commenced the study of the law with his brother, Hon. Samuel D. Bell, who is at this time a justice of our supreme court. He finished his course of study to qualify him for admission to the bar, at the celebrated law school at Litchfield, Connecticut, and, in the fall of 1825, before he was quite twenty-one years of age, he was admitted to the bar, and immediately commenced the practice in Gilmanton, then in the county of Strafford, in his native State. He remained at Gilmanton about six years, when he married a daughter of the late Hon. Nathaniel Upham, of New Hampshire, and removed to Exeter, in the county of Rockingham, where he remained, constantly and sedulously engaged in the practice of his profession, till the year 1846, when he removed to Gilford, and continued to reside there till his death.

In the year 1846, he was elected a member of the Legislature of New Hampshire, by the town of Exeter, and in 1850, by the town of Gilford, a member of the convention to revise the constitution of the State. These two offices are believed to be the only political stations occupied by him till 1855; when he was elected by the Legislature to the Senate for six years from the preceding 4th of March. He served during the whole of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, and during the executive session of the Senate commencing the 4th of March last.

Of Mr. BELL's success at the bar, it may be sufficient for those conversant with the character of the men practicing in the counties of Rockingham and Strafford, at the time he came to the bar—viz., Jeremiah Mason, of whom Judge Story said, in the dedication of one of his volumes to him, that he "long held the first rank in the profession, supported by an ability and depth and variety of learning which have had few equals;" George Sullivan, whose mellifluous eloquence and captivating tones carried the hearts, while his logical argumentation convinced the understanding of his audience; Ichabod Bartlett, second to no man who ever addressed a New Hampshire jury, and second to no man to whom I have ever listened; and Levi Woodbury, too well known to the Senate and to the country to need any eulogium from me; that, with such men for competitors, he very soon, by the common consent of the bar and the community, was ranked among the leading advocates of those two counties.

In private life, in the community in which he lived, he was respected, confided in, and beloved to a very remarkable degree; and I have never witnessed a community apparently more deeply impressed by the death of one of their members, than was that of which our deceased associate was one.

The integrity of his character, the soundness of his judgment, and the kindness of his heart, were well attested by the confidence and affection bestowed upon him in his life, and the intense sorrow with which his untimely death was deplored.

While Mr. BELL was with us, he was but the wreck of what he had been: months before he took his seat here the hand of an incurable and inexorable disease had fastened itself upon him. Beneath its grasp his strength decayed, his vigor wasted, and he gradually sank till he went home to die in his rural and romantic retreat on the banks of the Winnipiseogee, which his own taste had selected and his own hand decorated. He leaves a widow and five children, all of whom were with him in his last sickness—whose privilege it was to minister to his wants, alleviate his sufferings, and, by their affectionate assiduity, smooth his pathway to the grave.

No man more clearly understood, or more faithfully and affectionately discharged, all the duties of a husband and a father than my deceased colleague, and to his family, his loss is indeed irreparable; but I shall not invoke the public gaze upon the grief of that stricken circle, but leave them to the tender mercies of Him who has smitten them, but not in anger, and who alone can heal the wound His hand has made.

The propriety of such a simple recognition by the American Senate, of the death of one of their members, has often been questioned by that calculating spirit which recognizes the utility and propriety of no observance, the value of which cannot be immediately estimated in dollars and cents; but, it seems to me meet that we should occasionally pause and turn aside from the contention of parties and the pursuits of ambition, to listen to that voice of God which comes to us in the death of a brother, to remind us how vain are the honors, how transient the pleasures, and how fleeting the years of human life.

I desire to offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the Hon. JAMES BELL, deceased, late a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, will go into mourning by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That, as an additional mark of respect for the memory of the Hon. JAMES BELL, the Senate do now adjourn.

Ordered, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I have listened, with emotion, to the eloquent remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire, in announcing the death of his late colleague. That colleague was one of my early associates and friends; I hope to be excused, therefore, for rendering, in a few words, my public tribute to his many virtues.

It was my good fortune, Mr. President, to spend some years with him at the same collegiate institution, and to be associated with him in one of those literary fraternities which often add much to the interest and value of college life. There I learned to respect and love him, as did all equally fortunate in his companionship. There, too, were developed the many rare traits of character which distinguished him through life, giving unmistakable promise of that worldly eminence which he soon attained. His was a youth of promise well performed in after years, securing for him in life hosts of admiring friends, and a memory among men, which, like "The actions of the just,

Smell sweet, and blossom in the dust."

Our late associate was gifted with a high order of intellect, which was carefully and assiduously cultivated. But excellent as were his intellectual powers, he was equally distinguished by great firmness of purpose, united with singular modesty, and remarkable moral purity. It was these last characteristics which invested his youth with a peculiar charm, and won for him universal admiration and regard; for while, as a scholar, he might have been surpassed by some, as a conscientious and high-bred gentleman he was a model for all his fellows, and was so regarded by all. Of a sensitive and refined nature, he shrank, instinctively, from the slightest approach to vulgarity, either of language or demeanor. Adding to all these a loving heart, with manners frank and cordial, it is not remarkable that associates became friends.

I have said, Mr. President, that Mr. BELL was a man of singular modesty. Indeed, he exhibited this trait of his character in excess; and in such excess as to excite apprehension that it would seriously impair his prospects of future usefulness, by obstructing the avenues to distinction, broadly open, in our country, to abilities and acquirements like his. But those who thus reasoned did not sufficiently appreciate his great firmness of character. With him, duty was paramount; and while this controlled his actions, it impelled him onwards with equal force. This was, in fact, his great motive power—ministering to, and aiding, that personal ambition which is inseparable from a noble nature, and sweeping away all those difficulties arising from mere temperament which would have daunted and discouraged one cast in a weaker mold.

Though, not an eye-witness of his eminent career in after life, yet, knowing him as I did, it occasioned me no surprise. Such men seldom fail. With qualities like his, eminent usefulness is almost a certainty. It came early, and remained with him to the last. When such a man places his foot upon the ladder, he is sure to ascend. Fate only can cast him down. With him life is success. Our lamented associate verified this truth. And I am well assured that the high moral qualities which distinguished his boyhood illustrated and adorned his riper years. As was the youth, so was the man—a lover of virtue, a friend and champion of truth.

Mr. BELL's career in the Senate was checked and oppressed, from the beginning, by the malady which terminated his life. But he was with us long enough to secure the respect and regard of all his associates. His efforts in the Senate, though few, evinced an accuracy of judgment, a power of analysis, and a clearness of statement, which marked him for an accomplished debater. Those who best knew him were confident that, if he lived, the whole country would become familiar with his name. His qualities were such as could not but have placed him high in the rank of American statesmen. Bold, independent in thought and action, scorning the arts of the demagogue, he would have striven to deserve popular favor by a fearless and assiduous discharge of duty in his high station. Men like him, pure in heart, single in purpose, seeking honor only by honorable means, devoting all their energies to the public good, and forgetting themselves in the pursuit, are none too numerous. And the early death of one such man is always a public calamity.

It is a trite remark, Mr. President, that there may be a wide distance between what men seem to be and what they are. Of no class is this more true than of those engaged in public life. The popular idol of to-day is cast from his false eminence to-morrow, and forgotten. Death, the great leveler of human distinctions, makes sad havoc with reputations not founded upon public usefulness and private worth. It was not such a reputation that my lamented friend would have sought to win. His aspirations were those of a gentleman and a Christian. Dignified, yet courteous; firm, but quiet; brave, but unpretending; respecting himself, but deferential to others; able to instruct, but ever seeking instruction; never loud, never dogmatical, his was an example which could not but be felt in the daily intercourse of the Senate; while his thorough comprehension of, and devotion to, his duties as a Senator, marked him for a future, alike honorable to himself and the State of which he was a champion and a child. Many sons have been born to her whose names are high upon the rolls of fame; and if among them are found some written in more brilliant characters, there are none, I am well assured, which fall more pleasantly on her ear, or which she better loves to remember and repeat.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, the time which JAMES BELL was permitted to remain among us was so short, and his ability for active duty during even that small period was so much impaired by ill-health, that the materials of which elaborate panegyrics are usually woven to grace the obsequies of those who have attained, through protracted years of honorable service, the position of fathers of the Senate, are not found on this occasion in our records, or in our more faithful memories. Still, it is due to his fame, and to the generous sympathies of those who, from their nearer relation to him, especially cherish it, that the measure of his actual success here be made known, and that it be understood that the life of eminent usefulness which he had led in his own State was crowned by the achievement of real distinction in this more conspicuous theater. His bearing, his address, his speech, his social intercourse, were uniformly marked with the decision and vigor, the dignity and serenity, the gravity and courtesy, which, when blended together, impart irresistible weight to the opinions of a Senator, while they never fail to secure universal respect and affection toward his person. Few of us, I fear, will be able, at the close of our own periods of service, however long they may be drawn out, to lay claim to higher praise than this; and I am sure that to no one, living or dead, whom I have met here, can it be accorded with more unanimity than it is now awarded to him.

Mr. President, a stranger at this capital naturally seeks, in his earlier walks, a view of the congressional burying-ground. He finds there rectangular streets, bordered by monuments erected under our authority in honor of those who have passed away from life while engaged in this department of administration. All these structures stand in parallel lines, at uniform distances, and are built on one model, of one material, and of exactly equal dimensions. They differ only in the names and ages inscribed on them. While the design of these monuments is to manifest profound sensibility, the manner in which it is executed awakens a painful suspicion of insincerity, and even of indifference, to the so frequent visitations of the angel of Death. So a careless observer might imagine that the renewal, to-day, in honor of the departed Senator from New Hampshire, of ceremonies performed only yesterday in commemoration of the late eminent Senator from South Carolina, and to be followed soon, perhaps to-morrow, by the renewal of the same tribute to the just fame of a Senator from Texas, who was so dearly beloved by us all, is merely an affectation of sorrow. Let it not be so regarded. The discrimination of the eulogists draws out vividly the traits which individualize the characters of their subjects, and present jointly their several claims to the homage of a grateful country. It must be remembered, moreover, that although these official expressions of grief are periodical, yet they are so only because they are necessarily distinct responses of dependent men to reiterated utterances of the voice of the Supreme God. They are due acknowledgments of submission to the Divine will, and acceptances of Divine reproofs and admonitions. Alas! that there is need of such frequent reiteration of the reproof, in this fearful manner, of our mutual alienations and aversions. Alas! that there is always need of the monition, so impressively conveyed by every death that occurs among us, "Be ye also ready."

The resolutions were unanimously adopted; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 15, 1857.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated that the business first in order was the motion of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL], to refer the bill introduced by him yesterday to the Committee on Agriculture.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. LETCHER. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to have the Journal corrected. I submitted a motion yesterday to refer the bill introduced by the gentleman from Vermont to the Committee on Public Lands. That motion has not been entered on the Journal.

The SPEAKER. It was inadvertently omitted. The motion will be considered as entertained, and the Journal will be corrected accordingly.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a copy of a letter of 30th May last, from the Commissioner of the United States in China, and of the decree and regulations which accompanied it, for such revision thereof as Congress might deem expedient.

The message and accompanying documents were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the annual statement showing the balances standing to the credit of the Interior Department; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

SUPERINTENDENT OF PUBLIC PRINTING.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the annual report of the Superintendent of Public Printing; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS FROM COURT OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER likewise laid before the House reports, bills, and adverse reports, from the Court of Claims numbered from 82 to 148.

The bills were referred, en masse, to the Committee of Claims, and the adverse reports were ordered to be placed upon the Calendar.

TERRITORIAL LAWS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the laws of the Territories of Washington and Kansas, and stated that, if no objection was made, they would be referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to ask the Chair whether it has been usual for the territorial laws to be referred to the Committee on Territories? I do not remember what the practice has been. It seems to me they should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GROW. I believe that, with few exceptions, it has been the usual course to refer the laws of the Territories to the Committee on Territories. At the opening of the last Congress, the laws of two Territories were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, but the laws of the other Territories were referred to the Committee on Territories.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama submit any motion?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not, sir. All I desire is that they shall take the usual course.

The laws were then referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire if the Clerk of the last House has made his report of the contingent expenses of the House?

The SPEAKER. It is not in the possession of the Chair.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It is time it was.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House certain depositions in the contested elections from Ohio and Nebraska; which were referred to the Committee of Elections, and ordered to be printed.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The House then proceeded to the regular order of business, the pending question being upon Mr. LETCHER's motion to refer to the Committee on Public Lands the bill introduced yesterday by Mr. MORRILL, donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts.

Mr. MORRILL. It will be recollected by the House that the condition of this motion is this: tellers had been ordered on my motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Agriculture, the vote had been announced, and then the gentleman from Virginia called for the yeas and nays. I submit that, in that stage of the business, the motion of the gentleman could not be entertained. But if it were in order, I submit that the proper course will be for the House to take the vote first on a reference to the Committee on Agriculture; and if that be voted down, it will then be time enough to give it some other reference.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Before the gentleman proceeds, I ask that the bill may be read.

Mr. MORRILL. I will yield the floor for that purpose.

The bill was then read.

Mr. MORRILL. It will be seen, by reference to the rules, that the duties of the Committee on Agriculture are not defined. It is therefore left to the discretion of the House as to which of the committees this bill should be referred; and if a subject like this, relating as it does particularly to agriculture, is not a fit subject for that committee to consider, I am very much at a loss to know what subject would be fit. It will be seen by the provisions of the bill that it is for the purpose of granting lands to those States and Territories which shall provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts, where a liberal education for those engaged in the industrial pursuits and professions of life may be obtained.

Well, now, I have no jealousy of the Committee on Public Lands; but it seems to me that that committee has been, and will be, burdened with a sufficient amount of business, and its duties are thus defined in the rules of the House:

"It shall be the duty of the Committee on Public Lands to take into consideration all such petitions and matters or things respecting the lands of the United States as shall be presented, or shall or may come in question, and be referred to by the House; and to report their opinion thereon, together with such propositions for relief therein as to them shall seem expedient."

The bill is not to take charge of the public lands. It is not to reduce their price. It is not for the purpose of surveying them in any manner. It is not to grant preemptions. It only appropriates a small pittance of the millions of our public lands; and the only reason that I can conceive why it would be proper to refer this bill to the Committee on Public Lands is to ascertain whether or not we have the lands on hand. But in regard to that, we have the assurance of the President in his message that we have millions of acres.

I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that it would be any more appropriate to send to the Committee on Public Lands an invalid pension petition for bounty lands, than it would be to send this bill to it. I appeal to the common fairness of the House, to allow this subject to go to a committee where it shall not be strangled—to a committee that will be likely to mature and perfect the bill—a committee of its friends. Then, if it should not find favor with the House, it will, of course, be voted down.

We have such a committee, and that committee has, I am told, a very beautiful room. I hope that the House will allow that committee and that room to be devoted to some useful purpose.

Mr. LETCHER. The only interest I feel in the matter is, that these petitions and bills shall take the proper course at the start. By what authority the gentleman over the way [Mr. MORRILL] announces his desire that this bill shall go to a committee that will not strangle it, I know not. I do not know what the purposes of the Committee on Public Lands are. I do not know whether that committee is in favor of strangling the bill, or whether it is in favor of reporting it. I know nothing about that, and I imagine that it is utterly impossible, as yet, to ascertain what the views of that committee may be, until its members shall have had a meeting, and exchanged sentiments with one another.

The gentleman says that this bill ought not to go to the Committee on Public Lands, because he conceives that propositions relating to the reduction of price and other matters of that sort alone legitimately belong to it, and he says that this proposes nothing of that kind. But what does it propose? It proposes to take away a portion of the public lands, and apply them to a particular purpose. It seems to me that if any committee ought to have charge of that subject, and of all questions connected with the public lands, it is the committee that is organized and specially charged with action on that business.

Now, sir, I do think that this bill comes precisely within the terms of the 84th rule of the House, which prescribes the duties of the Committee on Public Lands. So it strikes me. There is no duty prescribed as to the Committee on Agriculture. But it does not seem to me that because the duties of the Committee on Agriculture are not prescribed, therefore, they have charge of lands relating to schools and colleges, and every other purpose of education to which they may be applied.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order. The previous question has been called on the resolution, and debate is out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware that the previous question has been called.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. It has been.

Mr. LETCHER. I am not aware of it.

The SPEAKER. It is not in possession of the Chair, or of the Clerk.

Mr. MORRILL. I called it at the time I introduced the motion.

The SPEAKER. This morning, or yesterday? Mr. MORRILL. Yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in possession of the Chair, or of the Clerk; and the Chair would suppose that the previous question is not called, inasmuch as the gentleman from Vermont has discussed the question himself this morning.

Mr. LETCHER. I do not desire to occupy the time of the House about it. I have no particular interest in the matter, one way or the other. The only interest I feel in it, as I said before, is, that these bills take the proper reference at the start, so that the House shall not be embarrassed by a return and re-reference of them to some other committee.

The question being on the motion of Mr. LETCHER to refer to the Committee on Public Lands, the yeas and nays were demanded, and ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 105, nays 89; as follows:

DEATH OF SENATOR BELL.

A message was received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, announcing the proceedings of the Senate in respect to the death of the late Hon. JAMES BELL, a Senator from the State of New Hampshire.

The message was read, as follows:

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

December 15, 1857.

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the Hon. JAMES BELL, deceased, late a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, will go into mourning by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, unanimously, That, as an additional mark of respect for the memory of the Hon. JAMES BELL, the Senate will now adjourn.

Mr. TAPPAN. Mr. Speaker, it was only yesterday that we were called upon to pass the usual resolutions of respect on the announcement of the decease of the Senator from South Carolina, Judge Butler; and to-day we are again reminded, by the message which has just been received from the Senate, of the death of another member of that body—the Hon. JAMES BELL, of New Hampshire.

And, with the indulgence of the House, I avail myself of the melancholy occasion to pay a passing tribute of respect to the memory and the virtues of the deceased.

Although Mr. BELL had been in feeble health from about the time of taking his seat in the Senate—suffering, as it proved, from a lingering and incurable disease—he yet seemed so far convalescent, that, when I took my leave of him in this city near the close of the last Congress, I little thought that the next time I should behold his manly form, it would be cold and still in the embrace of death; or that it would so soon devolve upon his colleagues in Congress to refer to his decease in these Halls. But so it is. Mr. BELL died at his residence in Gilford, New Hampshire, on the morning of the 26th day of May last; and notwithstanding the failing state of his health was generally known, the announcement of his decease fell with startling suddenness upon the people of his native State.

It seemed that a few days only had elapsed since, in the full enjoyment of his health and mental vigor, they had witnessed his triumphant election to the Senate of the United States, before the lightning flashed the sad intelligence that he was dead!

The death of such a man as Mr. BELL is not the loss merely of the State of which he was the immediate representative. It is a national loss, when, from its councils, a good and true man, in the height of his usefulness and in the vigor of manhood, is suddenly cut off.

And such was JAMES BELL. Kind, affable, and unobtrusive in his intercourse with his fellow Senators, and with all who enjoyed his acquaintance, he was admirably fitted to assist in allaying the asperities of political and partisan warfare, and to do something, through the amenities of social life, towards drawing closer the bonds of national brotherhood between the different portions of our extended Confederacy. And, from his known integrity and ability, his sound common sense and discriminating judgment, had his life and health been spared, he would, undoubtedly, have taken a high position in the deliberations of the Senate, and exerted a favorable influence upon the legislation of the country.

The family from whence Mr. BELL had his origin is among the most distinguished in the history of New Hampshire. He was one of the sons of the late Hon. Samuel Bell, who long sustained a prominent position in our State at the bar, upon the bench, and as Governor; and who was, during a period of twelve years—from 1823 to 1835—also a Senator in the Congress of the United States. The deceased was a native of New Hampshire, and was born at Francestown, on the 13th of November, 1804. He graduated at Bowdoin College, in the class of 1822. In college with him, though not in the same class, were ex-President Pierce, the late Hon. Jonathan Cilley, Hon. William Pitt Fessenden, Nathaniel Hawthorn, and Henry W. Longfellow. Mr. BELL studied law with his brother, Hon. Samuel Dana Bell, for many years and at present one of the judges of the supreme court of New Hampshire, and at the celebrated law school of Judge Gould, in Litchfield, Connecticut.

He commenced practice in Gilmanston, New Hampshire, in 1825, where he remained until 1831, when he removed to Exeter, and continued the practice of the law there—most of the time in partnership with Hon. Amos Tuck—until 1846. At Exeter his practice became extensive, and he at once took prominent rank with the best lawyers in the State. In 1846 he received the appointment of agent of the Winnipisaukee Lake Company, and removed to his late residence in Gilford. Besides performing the duties of this office, which were arduous and responsible, he still continued practice as a lawyer, maintaining a position at the head of his profession. In 1850 he was chosen a member of the convention to revise the constitution of his State, in the deliberations of which he bore a conspicuous part. In 1853 and 1854 he was the Whig candidate for Governor, and in June, 1855, he was chosen to the position of United States Senator, so long and so honorably filled by his father, and from which he has been so suddenly removed.

I am aware that sometimes on occasions like this, terms of extravagant and indiscriminate eulogy are indulged in, which the characters of the deceased, while living, would hardly warrant; and that often, in speaking of the most gifted, it is necessary to draw the veil of charity over prominent faults, and to regard the maxim that nothing but good should be spoken of the dead. But there is no necessity for this in speaking of JAMES BELL. He was as exemplary in private life as he was honest, conscientious, and high-minded in his public relations. As a lawyer, as a citizen, and as a man, among those who knew him longest and best, he was universally esteemed; and it is not too much to say that, in the wide range of his acquaintance, and among all those with whom his varied business relations brought him in contact, I do not believe he has left a single enemy.

As a lawyer, I think no man in New Hampshire stood higher in the confidence of the people than Mr. BELL. Never descending to any of those low acts which too often bring reproach upon an honorable profession, he was earnest and zealous in whatever business was committed to his charge, and exhibited a devotion to his profession, and an unwearied industry in the cause of his clients, such as is rarely equaled. If he was not what may be termed a popular orator, yet, as an advocate at the bar, he was strong, clear, and convincing, never failing to impress upon those who heard him the conviction of his own sincerity in the cause he advocated. He was not a mere politician in the narrow sense of that term; and it has fallen to the lot of but few men, so prominent as Mr. BELL in his own State, to share so largely in the confidence and respect of those who differed widely from him in their political views. In matters of principle, though always courteous, he was firm and unyielding; and while faithfully representing the wishes and reflecting the sentiments of his own people, his patriotism was yet broad enough to embrace the entire country, with all its varied interests and conflicting opinions.

It is not, however, as a lawyer or a politician that the loss of Mr. BELL will be most keenly felt or most deeply deplored. In private life an obliging neighbor, a warm and sincere friend, an agreeable companion, and an honest, upright man, his death, in the community where he dwelt, has created a void which cannot soon be filled.

But it is upon the sanctuary of his own home that this blow has fallen with most crushing weight. On the banks of the charming Winnepisaukee—not inaptly named the "Smile of the Great Spirit"—the cultivated taste of Mr. BELL had reared and adorned his beautiful New England home. And it was here, in the midst of warm and devoted friends, and surrounded by his intelligent and interesting family, that he was best known, best appreciated, and most fondly loved. No words of mine can carry consolation to the hearth made desolate, or help to alleviate the sorrow of hearts stricken with anguish. I can only mingle a tear of sympathy with theirs, and assure them how deeply, in common with his numerous friends, I condole with them in their great bereavement.

This afflictive event is brought home with peculiar significance and impressiveness to the people of New Hampshire and her delegation in Congress. Within the short space of four years, three Senators of the United States from that State—ATHERTON, NORRIS, BELL—have, while yet in office, passed to "that undiscovered country from whose bourn no traveler returns." The death of Mr. BELL, at a moment when "his desires were as warm, and his hopes as eager as ours, has feelingly told us what shadows we are and what shadows we pursue." It should remind us how little there is which men toil and struggle for here, that can afford any lasting enjoyment. The wealth, the honors, the hopes, and ambitions of this life, are all hastening to one common goal, and will soon be buried in a common receptacle.

"Our lives are rivers, gliding free,
To that unfathomed, boundless sea,
The silent grave.
Thither all earthly pomp and boast
Roll, to be swallowed up and lost
In one dark wave."

I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, unanimously, That, as a testimonial of respect to the memory of JAMES BELL, late a member of the United States Senate, now deceased, the members and officers of this House will go into mourning and wear crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to communicate a copy of these resolutions to the widow of the deceased.

Resolved, As a further mark of respect, that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. COLFAX. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to second the resolutions offered by my friend from New Hampshire, and to entwine my humble offering with the funeral wreath which he has placed upon the grave of the deceased.

It was my fortune, during the long session of the last Congress, to reside in the same house with him; to see him daily; to enjoy his counsel; to learn his worth; and to prize his friendship. He was a gentleman so unassuming in his demeanor, and so unobtrusive in his intimacies, that but few who did not belong to the same household fully appreciated his sterling merits. But, though naturally of a reserved manner, neither the snow of autumn nor the ice of winter had frozen up the well-spring of his affections. Always kind and considerate in the expression of his opinions, always charitable in his judgments, always tolerant in his discussions, he participated in the stormy scenes of an exciting session without sharing in its acerbities; he moved in a heated atmosphere without inflaming his own judgment; he adhered faithfully to his own convictions without denunciation of his opponents; and while others, on all sides, warmed as the sharp rivalry of contending sentiments progressed, he remained calm and serene. He was, indeed, one amongst a thousand.

"His daily prayer, far better understood
In acts than words, was simply doing good.
So calm, so constant, was his rectitude,
That by his loss alone we know its worth,
And feel how true a man has walked with us on earth."

My acquaintance with Senator BELL was limited to the two years he spent in the public service here; but, besides what I learned of his character from that association, I have heard much of him from citizens of his native State. Without exception, all have spoken of him in terms of admiration and esteem. His popularity was of that kind which Mansfield declared was alone valuable—which ran after instead of being run after by its recipient. He was always a friend to the poor—their frequent counselor, their voluntary and unpaid attorney, their generous contributor. He had no enemies, for he trespassed on no man's rights, and warred with no man's preferences; but performing his own duties in private life, and bearing his own testimony in public life, as he felt that his conscience and his judgment required him to do, he left all others equally free to be guided by the same monitors. Indeed, his character seemed to have been formed in exquisite unison with that model laid down by the Apostle James: "First pure, then peaceable; gentle and easy to be entreated; full of mercy and good fruits; without partiality and without hypocrisy."

I will not enter with any poor words of formal sympathy into that bereaved circle,

"Where, in the shadow of this great affliction,
The soul sits dumb."

But I know, by the patient care and never-ceasing attention which I saw his daughter give to her invalid father, whose incurable disease was slowly but steadily undermining all the bulwarks of life, that the blow which has fallen has been one of no ordinary sadness, and that human sympathy would be unavailing to alleviate its rigor, or to lighten its weight.

But, sir, these occasions are utterly profitless unless we use them for our own improvement. The dead are beyond our eulogy or our censure. But the frequency with which, as Senators and Representatives, as well as citizens and friends, we crowd around the open grave or the gloomy coffin, admonishes the living that even now the last sands of our own hour-glass may be falling, and the veil between us and the happy future we are looking to on earth, already descending. Yesterday the Palmetto State mourned, in these Halls, the loss of her venerable Senator. To-day the Granite State follows her example. And, with these notes of sorrow from the South and the North, how fitly can the West sympathize, where, in a single State, three members of the last and present Congress have been called to the last home appointed for all the living. Soon all of us shall be with them.

Let it be our earnest endeavor so to act that, when the gates of life, after creaking awhile on their hinges, have closed behind us forever, we shall not be gladly forgotten by our friends and associates before this frail tenement has mouldered into its kindred dust, or the funeral flowers of the churchyard have blossomed over our graves; but rather leave behind us histories embalmed in their memories, and worthy of their approval and imitation. Then, when we join, as each one of us in turn must join, "that innumerable caravan which moves on to the pale realms of shade," we may, as did the Senator from New Hampshire, when he turned his face to the wall, and his back on the world, go down to the valley of the shadow of Death with that calm and unshaken confidence and faith which robs its untried pathways of their terror, while it consoles so inexpressibly the sorrowing kindred whom we leave behind.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Seldom has a more pervading sense of sorrow and loss been apparent in our New England towns and villages than was manifested when the telegraph bore to them the intelligence of the death of JAMES BELL of New Hampshire. Although Mr. BELL had been in public life but for a brief period, he had come to be regarded, particularly in the section of country where he resided, as one of the truest and ablest men in the public service. A genuine patriot and truly good man, however quiet he may be in his tastes and retiring in his manners, is sure to be recognized and appreciated. He does not live to himself alone; and, while assuming nothing, exerts a known and lasting influence upon his time, and wins for himself the respect and homage of his fellow-men. And so it was that the streets of the sequestered village which had been honored as the residence of the departed statesman, on that placid summer day, set apart for his funeral, were filled with stricken and mourning friends—the great and the distinguished joining hand in hand with the poor and lowly—from near and far, who had come, self-summoned, to lay a garland on the bier of one who had been respected, honored, trusted, and loved as none but the noble and generous ever can be. And so it was, too, that those who had never seen him, but who had moved within the range of his influence—as who in our northern country had not?—were affected when they learnt that God's finger had touched him, as if a long-tried and valued friend had passed from their midst.

Senator BELL ranked among the leading minds of his native State. His perceptions were clear and exact, and his reflective faculties, vigorous and reliable; and, if life and health had been continued to him, it cannot be doubted that he would have well maintained the position in the Senate of the United States which his associates had assigned him, among the ablest and most useful members of that body. With the high order of intellect which he unquestionably possessed, and his large and varied acquirements; with his firmness and his gentleness; his candor and his prudence; his perfect honesty, so unassailable and so unpretending; his all-embracing charity; his courtesy and geniality, he was at once the statesman, the patriot, and the gentleman. To no man whom it has been my good fortune to know could be more fittingly applied the words of the author of "In Memoriam;" he

"Best seemed the thing he was, and joined
Each office of the social hour
To noble manners, as the flower
And native growth of noble mind.

"Nor ever narrowness or spite,
Or villain fancy fleeing by,
Drew in the expression of an eye,
Where God and Nature met in light.

"And thus he bore, without abuse,
The grand old name of gentleman,
Defamed by every charlatan,
And soiled with all ignoble use."

The resolutions were then adopted; and the House accordingly adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 16, 1857.

Prayer by Rev. D. P. GURLEY.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Treasurer of the United States, communicating copies of his accounts for the third and fourth quarters of the year 1856, and the first and second quarters of the year 1857; which was, on motion of Mr. HUNTER, ordered to lie on the table.

ELECTION OF PUBLIC PRINTER.

Mr. ALLEN submitted the following; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Ordered, That the Senate will, to-morrow, at one o'clock, proceed to the election of a Public Printer, to do the public printing for the Thirty-Fifth Congress, in accordance with the eighth section of the "Act to provide for executing the public printing, and establishing the prices thereof, and for other purposes," approved the 26th of August, 1852.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer a resolution which I desire to have considered at once:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate all correspondence between the Executive department and the present Governor of Kansas, together with such orders and instructions as have been issued to said Governor, in relation to the affairs of said Territory.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I wish to suggest an amendment, which I presume the Senator from Mississippi will accept. It is to add the words "together with the constitution and schedule referred to in the annual message."

Mr. DAVIS. I accept the amendment.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

RECESS FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

Mr. BIGGS submitted the following resolution; and asked for its immediate consideration:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That when the two Houses adjourn on the 23d instant, they adjourn to meet on Monday, the 4th of January next.

Objection being made, the resolution lies over for future consideration.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. ALLEN. I suppose that to-day, at one o'clock, we proceed to the election of the standing committees, in pursuance of the resolution adopted on Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order has already been made.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir. I wish Senators to understand it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. We had better elect them now.

Mr. HUNTER. Had we not better proceed to select the standing committees now, as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. GREEN] wishes to be heard at one o'clock, for which hour he has the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of one o'clock having been fixed as the time for choosing the committees, it can be done now only by unanimous consent.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I suppose there will be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, the Senate will proceed now to the election of the standing committees of the body.

Mr. ALLEN. I offer this resolution:

Resolved, That the members of the standing committees be arranged as follows:

On Foreign Relations—Messrs. Mason, (chairman,) Douglas, Sidel, Polk, Crittenden, Seward, and Foot.

On Finance—Messrs. Hunter, (chairman,) Pearce, Gwin, Bright, Biggs, Fessenden, and Cameron.

On Commerce—Messrs. Clay, (chairman,) Benjamin, Bigler, Toombs, Reid, Allen, and Hamlin.

On Military Affairs and Militia—Messrs. Davis, (chairman,) Fitzpatrick, Johnson of Arkansas, Iverson, Broderick, Wilson, and King.

On the Judiciary—Messrs. Bayard, (chairman,) Toombs, Fugh, Benjamin, Green, Collamer, and Trumbull.

On the Post Office and Post Roads—Messrs. Yulee, (chairman,) Bigler, Gwin, Fitch, Thompson of New Jersey, Hale, and Dixon.

On Public Lands—Messrs. Stuart, (chairman,) Johnson of Arkansas, Fugh, Broderick, Johnson of Tennessee, Foster, and Hamlin.

On Private Land Claims—Messrs. Benjamin, (chairman,) Biggs, Thompson of Kentucky, Kennedy, and Durkee.

On Indian Affairs—Messrs. Sebastian, (chairman,) Brown, Reid, Fitch, Bell, Houston, and Doolittle.

On Pensions—Messrs. Jones, (chairman,) Thompson of New Jersey, Clay, Bates, Thompson of Kentucky, Foster, and King.

On Revolutionary Claims—Messrs. Evans, (chairman,) Bates, Crittenden, Wilson, and Durkee.

On Claims—Messrs. Iverson, (chairman,) Mallory, Polk, Simmons, and Clark.

On the District of Columbia—Messrs. Brown, (chairman,) Mason, Johnson of Tennessee, Bigler, Kennedy, Hamlin, and Chandler.

On Patents and the Patent Office—Messrs. Reid, (chairman,) Evans, Yulee, Simmons, and Trumbull.

On Public Buildings and Grounds—Messrs. Bright, (chairman,) Davis, Douglas, Bayard, and Clark.

On Territories—Messrs. Douglas, (chairman,) Jones, Sebastian, Fitzpatrick, Green, Collamer, and Wade.

To Audit and Control Contingent Expenses—Messrs. Evans, (chairman,) Wright, and Dixon.

On Printing—Messrs. Johnson of Arkansas, (chairman,) Fitzpatrick, and Cameron.

On Engrossed Bills—Messrs. Wright, (chairman,) Bigler, and Hamlin.

On Enrolled Bills—Messrs. Jones, (chairman,) Brown, and Doolittle.

On the Library—Messrs. Pearce, (chairman,) Bayard, and Hunter.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I propose to state briefly, the reasons which will control the vote I shall give, and why I shall not vote for the resolution which has been submitted by the Senator from Rhode Island. I object to the cast of the committees because they are unjust, disproportionate, and sectional; and I intend to show, as briefly as I can, the truth of each of these propositions.

In a time like the present, when the slave power has seized upon the judicial department of the Government, and when that branch has already undertaken to decide political questions upon a record which shows that a decision was attempted on an issue not before them, and at a period of time when the Executive of the country is tied up and bound down by that power, and a great party, called Democratic, has no other standard by which to measure its men—no other alembic through which all its principles are distilled—it is a time when every good man should carefully examine the mode and manner in which each branch of the Government is administered, and, in so far as he may be able, aid in bringing it back to what our fathers made it and intended it should be.

On the organization of the committees of the Senate every Senator knows the form and direction of the business of the Senate is mainly dependent. It is through these committees, to a very great extent—to much the greatest extent—that the business of the Senate is prepared and presented to the Senate for its action. Now, sir, as one of a minority in this body, personally I can say—and I think I may truly say that I believe I represent the whole minority personally—we might have no objection to any cast that the majority of the Senate might see fit to impose upon us. We do not seek responsibility personally. We do not ask for position for the purpose of position. But as the representatives of equal States, we have obligations imposed upon us from which we cannot and ought not to shrink. As the representatives of equal States, we are entitled to an equal representation in the organization of this body, and are under obligations to our constituencies to discharge, so far as we may be able, the duties that are incumbent upon us here.

I have affirmed that these committees, as cast under this resolution, are unequal, unjust, and sectional. What are the facts? We have sixty-two members of the Senate—thirty-two are from the non-slaveholding States, thirty are from the slaveholding States. The whole number of places upon committees is one hundred and twenty-six. Numerically, upon an equal representation, there should be assigned to Senators from the slave States sixty-one places, and to Senators from the free States sixty-five. The cast, although it has been slightly modified this morning, I think is not substantially changed. As it was made and presented to the minority, I suppose the changes will not exceed one. By that cast there were assigned to the slave States sixty-seven, and to the free States fifty-nine, showing a disproportion of ten. The whole number of committees of the Senate is twenty-two. Of these committees there are from the slave States to be found majorities on thirteen, and majorities of but nine from the free States; and of these nine where majorities are composed of Senators from the free States, three are wholly unimportant—the Committees on Enrolled Bills, Engrossed Bills, and to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate—leaving, therefore, in fact, the proportion of thirteen to six.

Tracing the matter along still further, I find that the party with whom I act on this floor consists of twenty, being within a fraction of one third of the Senate. They are entitled, upon terms of equality, to thirty-nine places upon the committees; they have thirty-three assigned to them. Seven of those thirty-three are on the unimportant committees to which I have alluded, leaving them actually but twenty-six on committees of any considerable importance. I find that on sixteen committees of the Senate the chairmen are selected from the slave States, and on six from the free States. I find, to guard the succession, (for I can come to no other conclusion,) precisely an equal number of men from the slave States stand second upon the committees to insure the succession, when, by declination, resignation, or the expiration of their term, they shall withdraw from the Senate.

But numerically, although important, it is a matter of much less importance than the particular manner in which the individual committees are cast. With only two exceptions, (and compared with the others they are somewhat unimportant,) the great, the principal committees, that reflect the Government, that establish its policy abroad and at home, are all cast with majorities of southern men. It is a significant fact; it is a fact pregnant with mischief; it is a fact of which the country will not fail to take notice. I say, sir, that the executive and judicial departments of the Government are now at the foot of the slave power. Here we have the Committee on Foreign Relations, that shapes and directs the foreign policy of the Government; we have the Committee on Military Affairs, that looks to its Army; we have the Committee on Naval Affairs, that has charge of its Navy; we have a Committee on the Judiciary, which gives constructions to laws and shapes the policy (so far as the Legislature may) of the Government; we find them all constituted of a majority of men who represent the slaveholding States. I make no objection personally. I want these facts to go to the country, that they may know the mode and manner in which the legislative business is prepared and shaped, and how it is that it is perverted to the behests, and to subserve the purpose of the slave interest in the country. Who cannot see the objects to be accomplished plainly foreshadowed? The majority of the Senate, it is frankly conceded, are entitled to a control in the organization of the committees. But it is this sectional manner of which we have right to complain, and to which we enter a protest; and from such an organization we have a right to infer the object to be effected.

Another fact: I find that the Committee on Commerce, with a majority of southern men, is entirely without a representative in all the far Northwest, including the great lakes and rivers. With four of its members from the South, there is not one man to represent the internal commerce of the lakes, that is counted by its hundred millions. More, sir, I would like very well; indeed, to know why the usual rule was departed from in this case, and why the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] who so ably and faithfully has represented the commercial interests of the Northwest, was made to give place, if it be not for the purpose of shaping the legislation of the country to prostrate the commerce of that section of the Union? I think we have a right—all Senators have a right to their opinions—to come to the conclusion that the committee was formed and instituted for that purpose, from the known public opinions that a majority of that committee, I think, have uniformly expressed against internal improvements of all kinds. But a single position on that committee has been assigned to this side of the Chamber, and none for the large section embraced in the northwestern lakes, and the commerce of the lakes and rivers.

Again, sir, I look at the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, and I find a majority of that committee constituted of southern Senators. They are worthy men—I make no complaint of the Senators who occupy the positions on these committees; but it is to their sectional cast that I object, and the purposes which we have a right to believe are designed to flow from that organization. That committee is composed of three gentlemen from the southern States and two from the North, giving to that section the control of all its action. While I know that, if there is an honest man in this body who will devote his energies honestly to its purpose, I say cheerfully it is the worthy Senator from South Carolina [Mr. EVANS,] still, when we look at the fact, that of the inventive genius and enterprise of the country, more than four fifths, if not nine tenths, comes from another section of the Union, I ask if it were not right that they might reasonably have expected men who feel a local and personal as well as a national interest in that department of our Government in what relates to arts and inventive genius?

Again, sir, I look to the Committee on the Library, and I find there no representative whatever from the North. Is it because the North are not qualified for the position? Is it because they have not as deep, as broad an interest in whatever may relate to the affairs of our library, to the literature and learning of our country, as southern Senators? Why is it, unless it be for the purpose of taking care of your library so that it be not tainted with those doctrines of the fathers who formed the Constitution of our country?

I say that the whole form and shape of these committees mark and stamp them with a sectionalism which I had hoped never to have witnessed in this body. They come to me in that way and in such circumstances that cannot command my approbation or my vote. But I do not propose to take up the time of the Senate in discussing them in detail. I have only risen for the purpose of stating these objections to the committees, and presenting these facts as the reason why I shall withhold my vote from the resolution, and shall vote against it on the question of its adoption.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a question preliminary to that. Under the rules, this resolution can only be received by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection. The resolution is before the Senate for action.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not rise, sir, to object to any of the individuals who have been named as the persons to fill the various committees of this body; nor do I rise to question in the slightest degree the right, as it is undoubtedly the power, of the majority to appoint committees for whose action they are to be held responsible to the Senate and to the country. I confess, sir, that I am embarrassed in rising to make any suggestion whatever. The deference which I owe to this body, and the apprehension lest I might go beyond the proprieties which are due to my position, press hard upon me to remain silent altogether; but there is one of the committees about to be constructed, in which the State that I have the honor in part to represent is most deeply interested; and I should be false to my position here, if I did not rise, if but to say a single word, and address myself to the majority of this body in relation to the construction of that committee. I refer to the Committee on Commerce.

In looking over the honorable names which have been suggested to fill that committee, I find that all those persons reside in States where it is to be supposed their interests and their sympathies would be confined almost entirely to the commerce of the Atlantic and the Gulf. I speak not of the formation of this committee, either in its sectional aspect as between the North and the South, or between the Democratic and the Republican parties in this body. I look upon the construction of this committee in a very different light. With the exception of the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] who is named, and who of course must feel an interest in the commerce of the great rivers to a certain extent, and the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIGLER,] who may be said in a certain degree to represent the interests of river commerce, and in a very slight degree the interests of the lakes—with these exceptions, the whole commerce of the lakes and the rivers, as well as the commerce of the Pacific coast, is utterly ignored.

Sir, I have been looking into this subject. A book is before me which refers to the amount of the commerce of the lakes in 1851. I beg leave to state the amount of that commerce, as estimated in that year. The number of tons by measurement was two hundred and fifteen thousand nine hundred and seventy-five, and the value of the commerce transported in those vessels was $314,472,458. The value of the river commerce was estimated at $339,502,724. By looking into the book on Commerce and Navigation, which has been laid before us, I find that the amount of tonnage upon the lakes is now four hundred and fourteen thousand tons, and the tonnage upon the rivers is two hundred and fifty-five thousand tons.

If the estimate which was made in 1851 of the value of the commerce be correct, and if it may be assumed as a basis upon which to estimate the value of the present commerce of the lakes passing in those vessels, it exceeds $600,000,000—an amount almost equal to the entire imports and exports of the United States to-day. Add to this the commerce upon the rivers, and all this vast commerce upon these inland seas and rivers, as well as the commerce of the Pacific coast, is ignored almost altogether in the construction of this committee.

I beg to appeal to the majority of this body, to ask if it is right, if it be just, to ignore this vast commercial interest? I appeal to them, before it be too late, to reconstruct this committee in such a form that the commerce of the Pacific, as well as that of the lakes and rivers, may be represented upon this committee, as well as the commerce of the Atlantic and the Gulf.

Let me remind you, Mr. President, that our relative positions may change on this subject. When Oregon, and Kansas, and Nebraska, and Minnesota, as well as California, Wisconsin, Iowa, Illinois, and all the other States which are interested in the commerce of the lakes and rivers, shall be represented on this floor, they may be prepared to speak in a voice too potential here to use the language of appeal. Yes, sir, as certain as the revolutions of the earth, the scepter of dominion, even here, will pass into the hands of Young America. When that day comes, I hope and trust that it will be in the hands of those who will know no North, no South, no East, no West, but the country and the whole country, the commerce of the Atlantic and of the Gulf, of the Pacific, of the rivers, and of the great lakes of the continent. I trust that when the power passes into their hands, if an appeal should be made to their magnanimity, that appeal will not be made in vain.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I find in the Globe of yesterday, the following announcement:

"The caucus of all parties in the Senate has agreed to constitute the committees as follows:"

And then follows a list in detail. This announcement, as I understand it, is incorrect. I believe that no such caucus has been held. I am informed that a Democratic caucus was held, and the committees made up, leaving certain blanks to be submitted to the Republicans for them to fill. They saw fit to fill those blanks, under protest. No such caucus as is announced in the statement which I have read, was ever held. No assent has ever been given by the Republicans of this Senate to any such formation of committees as is there announced.

I rise, sir, to protest against this list of committees as presented here. Never before, in the whole course of my observation, have I seen a large minority virtually ignored in a legislative body upon important committees. This is the first time that I have ever witnessed such a total, or almost total, ignoring of a large and influential minority. But, sir, whom and what does this minority represent? It represents—I believe I am correct in saying more than half—certainly nearly one half—of all the free white inhabitants of these United States; it represents two thirds of all the commerce of the United States; and more than two thirds of the revenues of the United States; and yet this minority, representing the commerce and revenues of the nation, is expected to be satisfied with one place upon the tail end of a committee of seven on commerce. I may almost say that that committee is of more importance to the Northwest than all the other committees of this body; but the great Northwest is totally ignored upon a committee in which they take so deep an interest. Not a solitary member of this body from that portion of the country is honored with a position on that committee, and yet you have been told of the hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of commerce which is there looking for protection to this body.

Sir, we are not satisfied, and we desire to enter our protest against any such formation of committees as is here presented. But we would say to the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, you have the power to-day; you can elect your committees as you see fit; you can give us one representative on a committee of five, or one on a committee of seven, or none on any of the committees, if you think proper. Exercise that power in your own discretion; but, gentlemen, beware! for the day is not far distant when the measure you mete to us to-day shall be meted to you again.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PUGH. As the yeas and nays are to be taken on this motion, I wish to say a single word. I shall vote for these committees, because they have been framed in the caucus of Democratic Senators; but I concur—not in any of the threats which have been uttered—but in the opinion that the committees are not fairly constituted. I have said so in the proper place, and at the proper time; and I feel bound to say so again, if my vote is to be put upon the record, to be the subject of misconception by my constituents, and others who may choose to look at it. During the last Congress, I concurred in the suggestions that were made in this body, that it was not usual to alter the committees at that stage; but I did understand, and I have stated it in other places, that there was a promise of reconstructing the committees at a new Congress. I may have erred in that belief, but that was my understanding; and I expected a change in the committees at this session. For myself, individually, I do not care a shilling about it. My own place on the committees is the same as it was when I came here; it has never been changed. If there is any change to be made, I hope it will be to relieve me from all the committees, for I do not wish to do the work.

Mr. STUART. I do not propose to discuss this question at all; but as allusion has been made to me by name by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] I deem it due to myself to say that I declined, unqualifiedly, having a place upon the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I presume that there is no member of the Senate who cares less for, or interferes less with, the organization of committees, than I do; but I cannot sit still and hear the remarks of the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] imputing to the Democratic party that in the organization of these committees their disposition has been to wield the powers of this Government for the benefit of what he chooses to call "the slave power." That is the only proposition of his which I propose to notice.

It is a very easy matter to find fault with the organization of committees; but what is the first principle that enters into the organization of committees, and always must, in every political body? The political party having the majority will necessarily control all the committees of the body, because they are responsible, as a party, for the business of the body. I presume that principle has always been acted upon. They will always give to themselves the control of the body. Now, sir, if it has so happened that a great sectional party has sprung up in this country, and the result of the action of that sectional party has been that two thirds of the Democratic party in the Senate is composed of members from the slave holding States, does it follow that their object is sectional because they will not give the majority on the committees to those who are opposed to them.

Sir, I know no way in which they could act with reference to the organization of the committees other than that in which they have acted. I do not mean that, in every individual instance, the selection made has been exactly the best, or that it can meet the approbation of every Senator on this floor, either in the ranks of the Democratic party or of the Opposition. There are too many considerations which must necessarily enter into the organization of committees, even in one's own party, to make it possible to reduce them to strict and tangible rules. Personal considerations enter into it; the duration of service enters into it. Since the Senate have been organized, they have always looked to the importance of securing that degree of knowledge which is possessed by those who have remained permanently in the body, and occupied positions in it; and they have never displaced members from important positions as long as they remained in the Senate, unless there was some reason for doing so. That consideration must control the organization of committees, and it has necessarily had its bearing in the construction of the committees as now presented to the Senate.

Independent of these personal and political considerations, which must be the great controlling influences in the formation of committees, it is always the desire of the predominant party, of course, as far as is in their power, to distribute among the different quarters of the Union—I will not say sections—and the members from all parties, positions on the committees. But I know of no principle of parliamentary law, of no principle of fairness or justice, that entitles a minority to ask more than that they shall be heard and represented. The question of numbers does not enter into it. The majority always must, as a party, protect themselves against the chance of the control of the business of the body going into the hands of their opponents. If it so happens that in the divisions of the country, as I stated before, a great sectional party has arisen, and that the effect of the existence of that party has been, that from certain portions of the country hardly any Democratic Senators are to be found, is it to be wondered at that, in order to control such sectional results, and maintain their own ascendancy in the business of the Senate, the majority are driven from the course they might otherwise have taken in the organization of the committees?

It is on these grounds that I think (without meaning to say for one moment that there may not have been individual mistakes, and that there may not have been individual errors) there are so many combined causes which enter into the organization of committees, that no man can possibly construct them so that there may not be something pointed out by those who only stand up to object, which perhaps might have been arranged otherwise, so as to suit their views, or otherwise apparently for the purposes of justice.

In the main, the construction of these committees has been governed by the two considerations I have mentioned. It has been intended, in the formation of the committees, to preserve the control of the Democratic party over the business of the Senate. That I hold to be fair and right. They have necessarily looked to the personal considerations connected with the duration of the service of each Senator, and the fact that he was known to those who were obliged to select members to be qualified for certain duties. The principle of displacing experience to take the chance of inexperience, never ought to obtain in a deliberative body; and that consideration also has been involved. Apart from this, I am perfectly satisfied that no desire existed on the part of the Democratic caucus, and that no desire existed on the part of any portion of its members, to arrange the committees with reference to upholding or sustaining any sectional interest in this country whatever. But, sir, I admit at the same time, that the desire did exist to have the control, through Democrats, of the organization of the committees of the Senate, so that we might here, as we have done in the country, beat down a party, the object of which I do not profess to say, but whose success, if it ever comes, can only come with destruction to the Federal Union.

Mr. GWIN. I shall detain the Senate but a few moments. I will state that, on the organization of the Committee on Commerce, originally, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STUART] was placed on it, and he voluntarily declined to serve on that Committee. Having by his own voluntary act declined to serve on it, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BENJAMIN] was placed in his stead. It was the wish of the Democratic members of this body that the Senator from Michigan should remain on that committee.

There is another fact in connection with this question. As the Senator from Delaware has stated, and for the reasons which he has given, a large majority of the members of the dominant party in this body are composed of Senators from the southern States; and the members of the American party are also representatives of southern States. We may say that there are thirty of the Senators provided for by the majority from the southern States, and but twelve from the free States; and, therefore, to give the majority the control of the committees, being responsible to the country for the action of this body, it was absolutely necessary to give the Senators from the southern States a preponderance, and to place more of them on the committees than otherwise would have been placed there if there was an equality in the Democratic party; that is to say, if there were a similar number of Democratic Senators from the free and the slave States.

But, sir, I am very much astonished at the complaint from the other side of the Chamber, because it is but recently in the history of the country that the party to which those gentlemen belong obtained control of the other House of Congress, though in a minority there; and how did they arrange its committees? There never was a more flagrant partisan character given to the committees of a legislative body, and they were never more sectional. There never was a time in the history of the country when a minority, coming by chance into the control of one of the legislative bodies of the Government, exercised with more severity the iron hand of power in their possession.

We have received threats from the other side. Let them throw down the gauntlet; we are ready to take it up. If they ever get control of this body, we know how they will rule not only us, but the country. We have had a specimen of it in the lower House already. When they were in a minority in that body, and obtained their Speaker by chance, never, in any legislative body in this country, were committees formed with more utter determination even to block the wheels of the Government—as they did for the first time in the history of the Government, by refusing to pass an appropriation bill because that minority, thus organized and controlling the committees of that House, had their way in framing that appropriation bill.

In regard to one of the committees that has been specifically referred to—the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office—what is more just than that it should be composed of men of legal attainments, who, in examining important questions connected with patents, will be disinterested, so far as their constituents are concerned, in passing impartially on those great questions? We had reference to that in putting gentlemen on that committee from whose States inventions rarely come up, that they may be impartial judges of the questions under consideration. So it is in regard to a number of the other committees.

I take it for granted that all that has been said to-day has been intended for its effect on the country; not that these gentlemen really object to their localities on the committees. In the other House, we know, that when there was but one or two majority, when parties were so close that it was almost impossible to say which could command a majority, in the organization of the committees they always gave six of the same side with the Speaker to three Opposition, the majority taking two thirds of each committee. Of the members of this body, there are forty-two opposed to the Republican party, and twenty of that party. When there was but one or two majority, that majority always took two thirds of the committees in the lower House of Congress. That has been the plan of organizing the committees there for many years.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the remark of the Senator from California, that when the Republicans obtained the organization of the other House last year, the committees were so constructed as to do injustice to the minority; that they were constructed of six Republicans to three of the Opposition, is a remark that cannot be sustained by an examination of the record.

Mr. GWIN. The Senator is mistaken. I did not say that was done in the last Congress. I say that has been the practice of the Government. I was not here during the last Congress until the close of the last session, and I cannot say how the committees were constructed in that House then, because there were three parties there. I say the practice of the Government for many years has been, (the last Congress may have been an exception,) to give the majority six members to three of the minority, on each committee of the House of Representatives.

Mr. WILSON. I believe the honorable Senator from California said the committees were never more unfairly constituted, than at the last Congress, when the Republicans obtained possession of the House by an accident. Now, sir, I hold in my hand an analysis of the committees of the House of last year. There were upon those thirty-seven committees one hundred and thirty-one Republicans and one hundred and thirty-three of the Opposition. The committees were constituted almost invariably of five Republicans to four Opposition. The chairmanship of several of these committees was given to the supporters of the Administration. The chairmanship of the Committee on Military Affairs, certainly one of the most important committees in either House, was given to General QUITMAN, of Mississippi. No man has a right to complain of the organization of the committees of the House of Representatives by the Speaker, last year. He was not only just but liberal towards the Opposition. He gave four Opposition members to five Republicans on the Committee of Ways and Means. The Committee on Commerce was constituted of a majority of the Opposition, the numbers being four Republicans to five Opposition. The Committee on Public Lands had five Republicans to four Opposition; and the Committees on the Post Office, the District of Columbia, the Judiciary, Indian Affairs, the Military, and Foreign Affairs, were constituted, in the same proportions. The Committee on Territories was the only one constituted, as the Senator from California says is the usual Democratic practice, six to three. The Committee on Patents stood three to two; while the Committee on the Library had a majority of the Opposition, having consisted of one Republican to two Opposition. The record will bear, to all time, the evidence of the fairness and liberality of Speaker BANKS and of the Republican party.

My friend from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] has said that the time may come when the Republicans may have a majority on this floor, and what you mete out to us shall be meted out to you. I cannot concur with my friend in that remark. I trust, sir, that we shall have a majority on the floor of this Senate. I have no doubt the time is to come when the men who oppose slavery and its power will have it, but when that time comes I trust the committees of this body will be liberal, just, and national in every respect, and that we shall not only be just, but liberal towards those who are now unjust and illiberal towards us.

I do not complain that the Democratic party has organized this Chamber so as to procure working majorities on the important committees. We complain of the sectional character of these committees. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] tells us that a sectional party has sprung up in the country. Sir, a sectional party has long existed, and now exists in the country, and controls every department of the Federal Government—executive, legislative, and judicial. This sectional party has seized the organization of every department of this Government, and it holds to that organization with relentless tenacity. A party has sprung up in the country that protests against this sectional organization and policy of our Government. A party has sprung up that insists on restoring the Government to the ancient policy, and to have a national Government that comprehends the whole country, including the seventeen millions of northern freemen.

The Senator says that they have organized the committees here so as to secure the ascendancy of the Democratic party. But they have so organized the committees as to secure, on nearly every one of the important committees, the complete ascendancy of the southern portion of that party which now leads, directs, and controls the party and its policy. We want the country to understand this, and we mean that the country shall understand this sectional policy.

An analysis of these committees has been made by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.] Reference has been made to the Committee on Commerce by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE.] Sir, it is well known that the protest was made last March, in this Chamber, against the organization of the Committee on Commerce. It was believed, and declared on this floor, that the Committee on Commerce was organized so as to prevent river and harbor improvement bills from being reported. I have no objection to the Senators who compose that committee. The Senator from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY,] the chairman of it, comes from a State largely, almost wholly, engaged in agricultural pursuits, having but thirty-six thousand tons of the five million tons of shipping of the United States. The Senator from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS,] coming from a State that has twenty-nine thousand tons of shipping out of the five millions, is on that committee. The Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. REID,] coming from a State that has sixty thousand tons of shipping out of five million tons, is also a member of the committee. These three agricultural States, having only one hundred and twenty-five thousand tons of shipping, have three members of this committee, while the great State of New York, with one million five hundred thousand tons of shipping, and the northwestern States bordering on the great lakes, are not represented on it at all. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BENJAMIN] is upon the committee, and I think fitly there, representing, as he does, a State located at the mouth of the Mississippi river, and largely interested in commerce. We were given to understand last year that these errors should be corrected, and yet the correction has not been made. Four of the members of the Naval Committee are from the southern States—States which have neither commerce, ships, nor seamen.

We are told that it is not customary to change men when they are on a committee. It so happens that upon this Committee on the Library there were, at the last session, three southern men and no northern man upon it. Judge Butler has passed away. There was a vacancy on that committee. It was well known that there was objection on our part to the organization of that committee at the last session, and yet, although there was an opportunity to place one of the Opposition or some northern man on that committee, it is this year again made up wholly of southern men. Everybody knows that nine tenths of the authors of this country are in the free States; that nine tenths of all the books that have been produced in this country have been produced in the free States, that nineteen twentieths of the publications of the country are in that section; that there are in that section of the Union fifteen thousand public libraries, against less than seven hundred public libraries in the slave States, and the private libraries, I venture to say, are in about the same proportion; and yet that great section of the country, containing almost three fourths of the white population of the country, is not represented at all in the Committee on the Library. Sir, I believe there is a purpose in all this; that there is an intention in it. The object is to preserve a control, a censorship over the library, so that the works thrown off by the authors of modern Europe and the northern States which breathe the spirit of liberty, are to pass under rigid scrutiny before they are allowed a place in the national library.

For one, I do not complain of our positions on these committees. I take it we are all satisfied—that we care very little about these positions. We complain of the sectional character of the committees. That they are sectional, everybody must admit. Why is not some chairmanship assigned the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PUGH,] certainly one of the ablest supporters here of the Administration—of the majority of this Chamber? Take the twelve or thirteen important committees of this body, the only committees that are of any importance in the body, and but two are presided over by northern men. The organization of this Chamber, the organization of the Government in each and every department, is pro-slavery. But I do not know that we should complain, for the fact now stands clearly revealed to the gaze of mankind, that the present Democratic party, and the pro-slavery party of this country are the same. The history of the one, during the past twenty years, must ever be the history of the other. When the Democratic party ceases to be the instrument of the slave propaganda, or when the Democratic party shall go down under the odium of its present affiliation with the slave power, then the country may cease to see what we now see, the Committees on Foreign Relations, Finance, Commerce, Military Affairs, Naval Affairs, Judiciary, Post Office, District of Columbia, Indian Affairs, Printing, and Library all presided over by slave State Senators.

Mr. BROWN. I do not propose, Mr. President, to take any part in this discussion. If the Republican members of the Senate can make sectional or party capital out of a little matter of this sort, they are perfectly welcome to it so far as I am concerned. It will be recollected that last week the subject then under consideration, the President's message, was postponed until last Monday. It was understood that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. GREEN] would then occupy the floor. He has been postponed from day to day until now. This morning it was proposed that this question should be taken up an hour in advance of the period fixed by the resolution, that after that he might go on with his speech. It is perfectly apparent, I think, that we are to have no vote on this question to-day. Already the Senate has fixed an order for to-morrow, which is to postpone the Senator again. I protest against this sort of injustice to a Senator, for we all know how disagreeable it is to be postponed from day to day, and from day to day after a Senator is prepared to deliver his opinions. With a view of giving the Senator from Missouri an opportunity to make his speech, I move the postponement of this question until to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senator will say to-morrow, at half past twelve o'clock. I think we can dispose of this subject very soon.

Mr. BROWN. If my motion prevails I understand that, after we shall have elected a Printer to-morrow, this will be the next question in order, we having already made a special order for tomorrow. I move to postpone the further consideration of this question until to-morrow at one o'clock, with a view of allowing the Senator from Missouri to go on with his speech.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope we may take the vote on the committees at once.

Mr. BROWN. If there is to be no further debate, I shall not object to it.

Mr. HALE. I want to speak, but I shall not occupy more than five minutes; and then I think we can take the vote.

Mr. BROWN. Then somebody else will want to speak.

Mr. HALE. No, I think I shall be so satisfactory that nobody will wish to follow me. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWN. I think the Senator from New Hampshire never made a speech that did not elicit one in reply, [laughter;] but I will hear him for five minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HALE. No, sir. I do not wish to speak to so unwilling an audience. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution offered by the Senator from Rhode Island, in regard to the formation of the committees of the Senate.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 30, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Clay, Davis, Douglas, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Reid, Sebastian, Sidel, Thomson of New Jersey, and Wright—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—19.

So the resolution was adopted.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

On motion of Mr. Brown, the Senate resumed the consideration of the motion to print the President's message and accompanying documents.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, when, on Wednesday last, the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. Douglas] addressed the Senate, I was taken completely by surprise. I was surprised not only that he should have made his remarks at that time, but I was still more surprised at the manner and the matter of the speech. He himself stated, if I recollect correctly, that the President had made no recommendation on the subject of Kansas. It is a fact known by us all that no application on the part of Kansas was before Congress in any shape. If, therefore, there was neither an executive recommendation nor an application upon the part of Kansas, wherefore should the subject have been thrust on the attention of the country? When practical action is required on the part of Senators, the views of Senators are expected to be elicited; but when neither an executive recommendation required any practical action, nor any application on the part of Kansas had been made, it seemed to me most extraordinary that we should be compelled to engage in an abstract discussion with no reference to practical results. It is not my purpose to inquire into the motive of the honorable Senator. I am willing to concede, as I do, that it was patriotic; but I must think it very improper. It was well calculated to prejudice the question now pending before the people of Kansas. An election is to be held on the 21st of this month, and the public mind was prepared to see the people go forward and express their preferences for and against, as the question may be presented to them; but his speech, going as a counter manifesto to the just and fair message of the Executive of this Government, is well calculated, though no doubt not designed, to prejudice that question before the people of Kansas, as well as before the people of the country.

But, sir, whether the question has been rightfully or wrongfully brought up for consideration, it is now before us; and justice to the Executive, justice to the question itself, justice to the people of Kansas, and justice to my own State, which cannot fail to feel a deep interest in the proper adjustment and final settlement of the question, require that I should meet, and, as far as I may be able, counteract the positions assumed by the honorable Senator from Illinois.

The honorable Senator from Illinois sets out with imputing to the President a "fundamental error." Before we can discuss we must have the issue presented. Before our arguments can have a practical bearing on the question before the Senate, it is necessary that we should understand what that question is. In what, according to the positions assumed by the Senator from Illinois, does this "fundamental error" consist? I understand him to say that the "fundamental error" into which he charged the President with having fallen, is that the President says there was no law either in the Kansas-Nebraska act, in the Constitution of the country, or in the common usages of the Government, that made it obligatory on the convention of Kansas to submit their constitution to a subsequent vote of the people. This is the imputed "fundamental error." To that point I shall direct the attention of the Senate.

It is not for me to say whether the propriety of the submission of the slave branch of that constitution to a separate vote, ought to have been considered by the Executive or not. I choose not to trace him in the course of his reasoning on the subject. I choose rather to notice the conclusion at which he has arrived—a conclusion that promises a full adjustment of this whole question; that promises peace to the country; that promises satisfaction to the North and to the South; and that promises to remove a bone of contention over which the public mind has been too much harassed for the last several years.

The real practical question, then, which we have to consider is this: ought Kansas, when her constitution shall be presented, be admitted into the Union? or ought the consideration of what the honorable Senator from Illinois calls a "fundamental error" of the President, to be deemed a sufficient reason to keep Kansas out of the Union, and to keep this most unfortunate subject still agitating the public attention? This is the real issue. It is not whether we approve of parts of the constitution of Kansas; it is not whether we think the qualification required by the convention in framing the constitution of Kansas, of twenty years' citizenship of the United States in order to be Governor, is right. That is a subject upon which the people of Kansas alone have the right to decide.

It is true the honorable Senator does not say that we have a right to supervise the action of the convention of Kansas in that regard. But he seems to bring up what he regards as objectionable parts of their constitution, and traces them in such a manner that the public might be prejudiced against the result of the labors of the convention. In his great anxiety to so present that feature in regard to the qualification which the Governor of Kansas is required to possess, he even misstates and misconstrues the constitution of Kansas as presented before us. He says "twenty years' citizenship is required." That is true; but is that a cause of objection? The Senator's own State of Illinois, when she was admitted into the Union, required as a qualification of the Governor that he should have been THIRTY YEARS a citizen of the United States; and surely he will not invoke the application of a rule to Kansas which, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, requires rather a relaxation for the sake of peace and quietude. Surely he will not object to the application of the same liberality to Kansas, so as to leave that question unprejudiced; for if Illinois could come into the Union with a constitution requiring the Governor to be a citizen for the space of thirty years, surely it is no insuperable objection to Kansas that she requires only a twenty years' citizenship. So with the State of Missouri—my own State. Her constitution requires the Governor to be a native-born citizen of the United States; and so it is with various other States. The constitution of the State of Mississippi requires twenty years' citizenship of the United States on the part of the Governor; and a large number of the constitutions of the States require them to be native born. The Constitution of the United States requires the President to be a native-born citizen of the United States.

I refer to these facts for the purpose of showing that, in all times past, such a matter has never been urged on the Senate as any reason why the application of a State for admission into the Union ought to be rejected. Perhaps the Senator will say, however, that he did not urge it in that view, and that he only stated that the people should have a right to pass on that question. I shall advert to that point after a while. In the same connection, however, he uses this language, which an examination of the constitution does not warrant:

"If men think no person should vote or hold office until he has been here twenty years, he has a right to think so."

The employment of this language on the part of the Senator induces those who have not examined the constitution of Kansas, to believe that it requires twenty years' citizenship before the right of voting can attach. The Senator has fallen into an error. The constitution simply requires for the exercise of the right of suffrage in Kansas, that a person shall be a citizen of the United States, and a free white male inhabitant of the State. If this were to go broadcast through the land, those who object to the stringent rules which the party to which he referred sometimes have been held to advocate, would feel greatly prejudiced against the Kansas constitution; while, if they examine it, and see what its provisions are, they will find that the Senator has misstated its provisions.

So on other questions—the subject of banks, and the mode of taxation. He animadverted on all these points with pleasure, and with a view, as it would seem, (though doubtless for no such purpose,) at least to point out objections in the Kansas constitution, on the subject of banks, as well as on the subject of taxation. Now if he concedes, as I know he will concede, that Congress has no right to consider any of the features of the constitution of a State save whether it be republican, why need he dwell on anything else? It would, if he regarded it as obnoxious, connected with the powerful influence of that distinguished character which he possesses, spread a prejudicial influence abroad on a subject which he admits he has no right to consider in the Senate of the United States.

So with regard to one other branch of his argument. The ordinance that accompanies the constitution is held by some to be extravagant in its demands on the Federal Government. It may or may not be so. Whether it be right to accede to the proposition submitted in the shape of an ordinance or not, I shall not now stop to discuss; for I hold that it is no part of the constitution of Kansas. It is a separate proposition presented by the convention of Kansas, and it is matter of contract with the Federal Government whether we accede to it or not. We may disaffirm that contract. In other words, it is a proposition, and we may make a counter-proposition. It is a matter for consideration, for adjustment; and it is no branch or part of the constitution of the State. The question which we have to consider is, not the qualification required in the Kansas constitution for Governor; not the mode in which the elective franchise is to be exercised; not the provisions in regard to banks; not the provisions with regard to the mode of taxation. These are all subjects with which we have nothing to do. They exclusively pertain to the people of Kansas. This they have, through their convention, decided for themselves.

There is but one single legal question to which our attention can be directed; is it a "republican" form of government? As it respects the numbers requisite to entitle the people of Kansas to admission into the Union, I believe it has never been called in question. Certainly the Senator from Illinois has not called it in question, and I have not heard it called in question by any other Senator. I do not understand the Senator from Illinois to say that the constitution of Kansas is not "republican." On the contrary, I have no doubt of the fact that all will admit it to be as republican as the constitution of any State in the United States; as consonant with the principles of republicanism as any constitution that has ever been presented to the American people. If it comes before us in that shape—admitted to be republican—admitted to have a sufficient population to entitle them to admission—admitted that the peculiar features of the constitution are questions with which we have no concern, wherefore is it that the admission of the State into the Union is to be resisted and opposed? For what purpose? What reason is to be assigned?

The first reason that is assigned is, that there is no "enabling act." Mr. President, there seems to be a want of clear understanding of the relation which the Federal Government sustains to the Territories. What is an "enabling act?" Is it to impart power to the people of a Territory? for we must remember that a Territory, organized, constitutes a people. Individuals may live on the lands belonging to the United States, and yet not be a people. They are individuals scattered over the land; but in a technical and appropriate and governmental sense, whenever they are organized into a political community, they constitute a people. Kansas is a political community and a people. What "enabling act" was required to impart to them the power to propose a change in their form of government? What enabling act can give them more political and inalienable rights than they already possess? It would be a solecism, a contradiction. Among the inalienable rights are "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, to secure which governments are instituted, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." Who are the "governed?" The people of Kansas. From whom, then, will the government of the State of Kansas derive its just powers? From the "governed," and not from your "enabling act." Their power was inherent, and all the action of the Federal Government can give them no additional political power. That inherent power is incapable of transfer; it is unchangeable; it is indefeasible; it is original. What then? Does it follow that the people in an organized or unorganized shape, living in a Territory, can set up an independent government when they please? No; I answer most emphatically, no. They may propose their form of government; they may shape its features; they may parcel out its powers; they may guard the rights and interests of the people under the newly proposed government; but they cannot become an absolute sovereignty; they cannot become an absolute independent State. Why? Because the Territory belongs to the Federal Government for the use of all the States. Nothing but the assent of the Federal Government in some manner, shape, or form, will ever impart to them independence and sovereignty. The only purpose of an "enabling act" to an organized Territory ought simply to be a law of assent. If it is but an unorganized Territory, and not a "people," Congress then ought to throw them into an organic shape, as well as give its assent. This will be found to be the true principle, and ought to be the rule to regulate the steps of this Government in its dealings with the Territories. States come into the Union by their own will, and with the assent of the United States.

All the power of the Federal Government cannot create an independent sovereign State. The power of this Federal Government is not to create, but to admit. To "admit" a State, implies its existence prior to admission. Thus, what is now ordinarily called an "enabling act," is, to all intents and purposes, nothing but a law of assent. The great Federal Government, in which is vested the sovereignty of the Territory, may give that assent before or after the organization of the proposed new government; it is perfectly optional with the Federal Government to give it before or after such organization, with this single difference: when that assent is in the shape of what is now called an "enabling act," and when the people of the Territory have proceeded according to the principles of that enabling act, and created a government, the assent being given, the whole sovereignty becomes vested, the independent State exists, and then if Congress do not admit it, it is a foreign State in spite of all our powers. The danger, therefore, is in passing an enabling act, not in withholding one.

Who is it that does not remember the unfortunate Missouri controversy of 1820? An "enabling act," as latterly called, had been passed for the State of Missouri, in pursuance of which Missouri formed its constitution and asked for admission. Some quibbles were raised and some non-essential points were alleged against its admission, and Missouri was well-nigh rejected. All the Republican Senators and members of the House of Representatives at that day—I use the term in its old signification, not the new—said, "the assent of the Federal Government has been given to the act of Missouri. Missouri had created its government in pursuance of an enabling act, and was, therefore, sovereign and independent; and if Congress had not admitted Missouri, that State would have been a legally recognized foreign government on the west bank of the Mississippi river."

It is true that the physical power of the Federal Government might have sent armies and coerced Missouri into submission, but that would have converted it into a subjugated State; Missouri would not have been, in that case, a free and independent State; it would have made it an inferior, dependent vassal, subservient, and a subordinate member of the Confederacy. According to the true principles of the theory of our Government, whenever congressional assent to sovereignty and independence are conceded, the people of a Territory may act as they please, and it is an independent State thereafter. Now, when assent is not given prior to the time of admission, there is no danger of that kind of difficulty.

But, Mr. President, is it so important that an "enabling act" should be passed? The Senator thinks so, and refers to instances when such acts were passed. Why, sir, Tennessee, Arkansas, Michigan, Florida, Iowa, California, Maine, and Vermont, eight States—new States, not in the original Confederacy—came into the Union without any enabling act on the part of Congress. Was Tennessee improperly admitted? It was recommended by George Washington. The proceedings that were instituted under Governor Blount in the then Territory of Tennessee, met the sanction of the Republicans of that State. Among the members of the convention, that revolutionary—no, the Senator does not give it that name—that "irregular" convention, is found the name of Andrew Jackson, of Tennessee. He was one of that "irregular convention;" and that "irregular convention," formed in part of General Jackson, made a constitution which was never submitted to the people, but was sent up to General Washington, then President of the United States; and here is the letter that he sent to Congress at the time he submitted the constitution of Tennessee for their consideration. It will be seen that it harmonizes well with what President Buchanan has said with regard to the constitution of Kansas:

UNITED STATES, April 8, 1796.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

By an act of Congress passed on the 26th of May, 1790, it was declared that the inhabitants of the territory of the United States south of the river Ohio should enjoy all the privileges, benefits, and advantages set forth in the ordinance of Congress for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, and that the government of the said territory south of the Ohio should be similar to that which was then exercised in the territory northwest of the Ohio, except so far as was otherwise provided in the conditions expressed in an act of Congress passed the 2d of April, 1790, entitled "An act to accept a cession of the claims of the State of North Carolina to a certain district of western territory."

Among the privileges, benefits, and advantages thus secured to the inhabitants of the territory south of the river Ohio, appear to be the right of forming a permanent constitution and State government, and of admission, as a State, by its delegates, into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, when it should have therein sixty thousand free inhabitants: provided the constitution and government so to be formed should be republican, and in conformity to the principles contained in the articles of the said ordinance.

As proofs of the several requisites to entitle the territory south of the river Ohio to be admitted, as a State, into the Union, Governor Blount has transmitted a return of the enumeration of its inhabitants, and a printed copy of the constitution and form of government on which they have agreed, which, with his letters accompanying the same, are herewith laid before Congress.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

It contained no special executive recommendation; and, in that respect, harmonizes most beautifully with the position taken by President Buchanan. The Territory thus had an organic form; it was a people. Without any enabling act they met, formed a constitution, which was presented to Congress and approved; and the State admitted into the Union with as much regularity, with as much system, with as much order, as has accompanied the movements of any Territory and of any people within the compass of our whole republic.

How is it with Arkansas? The Senator from Illinois would have us understand that the movements in Arkansas seemed to meet the disapprobation of President Jackson. President Jackson, who had himself participated in the convention in Tennessee, is to be presented to us as though he condemned the proceedings in Arkansas. An examination of the opinion of the Attorney General in that case, will show the distinction; and make it clear as the noonday sun, unless I am greatly deceived in regard to the purport of that opinion:

"In the exercise of this right, the inhabitants of Arkansas may peaceably meet together in primary assemblies, or in conventions chosen by such assemblies; for the purpose of petitioning Congress to abrogate the territorial government, and to admit them into the Union as an independent State. The particular form which they may give to their petition cannot be material, so long as they confine themselves to the mere right of petitioning, and conduct all their proceedings in a peaceable manner. And as the power of Congress over the whole subject is plenary and unlimited, they may accept any constitution, however framed, which in their judgment meets the sense of the people to be affected by it. If, therefore, the citizens of Arkansas think proper to accompany their petition with a written constitution, framed and agreed on by their primary assemblies, or by a convention of delegates chosen by such assemblies, I perceive no legal objection to their power to do so, nor to any measures which may be taken to collect the sense of the people in respect to it; provided always, that such measures be commenced and prosecuted in a peaceable manner, in strict subordination to the existing territorial government, and in entire subservience to the power of Congress to adopt, reject, or disregard them, at pleasure. It is, however, very obvious that all measures commenced and prosecuted with a design to subvert the territorial government, and to establish and put in force, in its place, a new government, without the consent of Congress, will be unlawful."

Kansas has never proposed to put in operation a State government without the consent of Congress. They have formed it in subordination to the powers of the territorial government. It is but an emanation of the territorial government. It is to be submitted to Congress. If admitted into the Union, the constitution takes effect as the supreme law of that State in subordination to the Federal Constitution only; but, if not admitted, they do not propose to set up a separate State government. This, it will be seen, harmonizes with what I said on the subject of the assent of Congress, to wit: wherever any Territory undertakes to set up a territorial or State government, in opposition to Federal authority, it is rebellion. If the present acting, or claiming to act, Governor of Utah should undertake to set up a separate government, we have the undoubted right to refuse our assent, and to subjugate him to our authority by the force of the military arm of this Government. If the people of Kansas were to undertake to set up a government in opposition to the Federal authority, the same power could be exercised there. But while they do not propose to interfere with the Federal Government, nor to interfere with the territorial government until the assent of Congress is received, it makes no kind of difference whatever. This, too, harmonizes with the opinion of the Attorney General, which the honorable Senator from Illinois introduced and read.

There are, therefore, eight States in the Union that have formed their constitutions without an enabling act; for two of those States the Senator from Illinois voted. California had no enabling act. But the Senator undertakes to show that though there was no enabling act, yet all the steps taken by the authorities of California were in subordination to the local government established there; in other words, under General Riley. Whether that be right or wrong, whether his reference be correct or incorrect, I shall not stop to inquire; but this much is true: the action of the convention in the Territory of Kansas is as much in subordination to the Federal authority as was the action in the Territory of California; and if he could vote for the admission of California, there can be no reason why he may not vote for Kansas with the same propriety. If he could vote for the admission of Florida, there can be no reason assigned why he may not vote for that of Kansas. If he could vote for Iowa, there can be no good reason why he should not vote, under the same circumstances, for the admission of Kansas. By his own deed he is estopped; by his own act he is forever estopped from alleging, as a necessary prerequisite, an enabling act. The assent of Congress may be given at any time; either before or after the formation of a constitution.

There is a peculiar reason for it in the case of Kansas. The Louisiana treaty defines and guarantees the rights of the people living in that Territory. The law of Congress, subsequently passed, made an additional pledge that the people should have a right to admission at the proper time. The authors and advocates of the great Kansas-Nebraska act thought it had added to the rights, or reclaimed the rights, of the people living in organized Territories. Its framers thought they had conferred some principles heretofore denied to them. If so, under the treaty of Louisiana, under the law of Congress, under the Kansas act, the right of the people, whenever their numbers are sufficient to take preparatory steps for the formation of a constitution, and present it for admission into the Union, is conceded. They do not present it for approval; they do not present it in order to have it indorsed. They present it, if at all, for the sake of being admitted into the Union. If the constitution is republican, we may admit them; if it is not republican, we cannot admit them.

In strict conformity with this doctrine stands the Democratic platform to which the Senator referred. It says, in emphatic terms, that the people of a Territory should, whenever they had numbers sufficient, proceed to form their State constitution, and to adopt such institutions as they should think proper.

But the main objection which the Senator has presented is, that while we may forego these objections, there are other reasons why we should not forego either them or any others. My position is, that the mere want of an enabling act is not an objection; that lawful proceedings in an organized Territory, to form a constitution, are regular, in conformity to law, in conformity to usage, and I have presented cases just such as the Senator has heretofore indorsed and approved; and, consequently, they ought not to be considered in the list of objections that he raises against the admission of Kansas.

His chief objection, however, seems to be, that the constitution is not submitted to the people. On that he dwells; and wherefore? Why, that the principle of popular sovereignty required the constitution to be submitted to the people! In other words, he says that a subsequent vote ought to have been had in addition to what the convention has done, so that the people by subsequent vote might decide this question of constitution or no constitution. Mr. President, if, as the Senator from Illinois says, the Kansas-Nebraska act puts the slave question where all other questions before were, then, in order to see what the rights of the people were under the Kansas act, we have but to ascertain what their rights were on all other questions before the Kansas act was passed.

How were they? Is it true that the people do not act, in any case, unless they meet in mass meeting?—in a tumultuous assemblage?—or is it not in harmony with the genius of republican institutions—is it not in strict conformity with the Americanism of government that we act through delegates, through agents, through representatives? The constitution of the Senator's own State was not submitted to the people of Illinois. The constitution of his native State, Vermont, was not submitted to the people of that State; and yet it is worthy of remark that the constitution of Vermont uses this language: "We, the people of the State of Vermont do ordain and establish." Yet they ordain and establish by their delegates, by their representatives. So with Illinois. In its constitution the words, "we, the people," are used; and yet the people never acted upon it, save through their agents, their delegates in convention assembled. In the State of Illinois the constitution says, "all prosecutions shall be in the name of the people of the State of Illinois," not in the name of the State. The people stand as prosecutors. I believe the first time I ever had the honor to make the acquaintance of the very distinguished gentleman was while he presided on the bench in the city of Quincy. There was a prosecution conducted in the name of the people of the State of Illinois. Was that prosecution by the people, in their own proper person? No; the people were ably and well represented on the bench by the distinguished Senator from Illinois; the people were represented in the grand jury room by selections made for their purpose; the people were represented by the prosecuting attorney, a distinguished gentleman selected for that purpose. It was all done in the name of the people, in behalf of the people, for the people, but done by the people's agents and representatives.

Mr. President, it is not only so in these instances, but, as I before remarked, it is the great Americanism of government more peculiar in the United States than anywhere else. The people act through agents; and I believe it to be a universal rule of agency, that where there is a general power given, the principal is bound by all the acts of the agent, unless there be a reservation of a right of submission to the principal for his approbation.

How was it with the convention in the Territory of California? I have before me a list of States, showing that Kansas was not peculiar in this respect. A majority of the constitutions of the States forming this Union were adopted by conventions, and never submitted to the people! More than this; the very opinion of the Attorney General, read by the Senator from Illinois, with reference to the Arkansas case, (his own authority,) says the people may, in primary assemblies, or through delegates chosen by them for that purpose, form a constitution and send it to Congress for their consideration.

We have, then, the gentleman's own State, native and adopted; we have a large majority—the exact number I will not state—of all the States of this Union, whose constitutions were formed by the people, through their agents, and without a submission of them to a vote of the people; and in a minority of instances only, have the constitutions of States been submitted to the people for their approbation or rejection. More than that; we have the Senator's own commitment in his support of the Toombs bill at the last Congress. The Toombs bill was taken by the honorable Senator, who was then chairman of the Committee on Territories, pressed by him, and passed through the Senate. That bill did not contain any clause requiring the constitution to be submitted to a vote of the people. The bill which he had first introduced did contain such a requirement; and yet, when the two were put side by side and he was called on to choose between them, he took that which had no such provision in it, thus leaving it for the convention of the Territory to decide as they might deem proper.

If the Senate of the United States, and if the father of the Kansas-Nebraska act—if the great advocate of popular sovereignty could introduce, support, and cause to be passed, an enabling act permitting the convention of Kansas to make their constitution, and to make it final, to ordain and establish it without submitting it to the people, surely, when the people of Kansas, through their territorial government, came to act on the same subject, if they imitated the honorable Senator, and passed a similar bill, they ought not to be held up to public scorn and indignation. They had an "illustrious predecessor;" they had a very distinguished example in the person of the Senator from Illinois, and if they but followed that example, they ought not to be held up to public scorn and indignation. I think they acted wisely in submitting the matter to the convention which represented the people. It is better for the people of Kansas to be heard through their representatives than for the people of Illinois to interfere in Kansas matters through the able Senator from that State, or the people of Missouri through myself or my colleague.

We have heard much of popular sovereignty and popular rights, but they seem to be frittered away and cut down, limb after limb. First you cut off one, and then another, until you leave nothing whatever to boast of when you go before the people of the country and speak of the great merits of the Kansas-Nebraska act. If you can tie up the people's hands, and say to them, "You shall do this," are you carrying out the principles of the Kansas act? The act says they may do it in any manner they please. They did please to adopt a constitution finally in convention, as did Tennessee, Illinois, and Vermont. Now it is gravely proposed that the Senate and House of Representatives shall say the people of Kansas did not please to do it in a way which Congress is pleased to consider right, and, therefore, it shall be undone, thus trampling under foot the very principle which the Senator said had been sanctioned in the bill, that they might do as they please; that they might adopt a constitution in any manner and form they thought proper; that they might establish their domestic institutions in their own way. The express language of the bill is, "in their own way"—not the way I might advocate, not the way the Senator from Illinois might advocate, not the way the North, or the South, might like, but the language, the spirit, the principle, the essence of the bill, is "in their own way." The people of Kansas have adopted their own way, and that "way" is in strict conformity with the example set when the Senator from Illinois supported the Toombs bill. It was to let the convention, as the representatives of the people, do as they pleased on the subject presented to them. That convention did as they pleased on the subject, and now it is formally proposed to revise, reform, remodel, and recast, all the action that has taken place, although the people of Kansas, through their convention, have done their work only "in their own way." I can see no consistency in this. But I do see in it a principle set up in opposition to what we have been told was the principle of the Kansas-Nebraska act.

It has, however, been intimated by the honorable Senator from Illinois that the Kansas-Nebraska act itself required the constitution to be submitted to the people of Kansas after its completion by the convention. On that point, I join issue. The act makes no such requirement. It contains no such obligation. On one point, I confess I did not distinctly understand the position of the Senator, and I hope, therefore, he will not consider me intrusive if I ask him how I am to understand him on the subject of the Governor's interference in regard to submission or non-submission of the constitution?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I declined to discuss that, because the Governor had acted under the instructions of the President.

Mr. GREEN. Then I understand the Senator as taking no position on the point, whether the executive of the Territory did right or wrong when he proposed that the whole constitution should be submitted. My view is, that, if he says the Governor did right, it conflicts with the principles of the Kansas-Nebraska act, and lets the agent of the Federal Government interfere to do what he said the people of the Territory might, uninfluenced, and of right, do "in their own way." If the Senator says the Governor did wrong; if the Senator says the Governor of the Territory had no right to advise on this point, that is an admission that the Governor's conduct is not justified by the provisions of the Kansas-Nebraska act. Because, if that act required the submission of the constitution to a fair and uninfluenced popular vote, it was the official duty of the Executive to see that part of the bill, like every other, executed and carried out. Here is a dilemma, and I leave the Senator to take either horn. If he says the Governor did right, he permits a Federal functionary to dictate to the people, when the language of the act is, that they may act in their own way. If he says the Governor did wrong, it is an admission that the act did not require the submission of the constitution.

But we are told that the people have been deceived in this matter; that pledges and promises were made to the people of Kansas which have been broken and violated. On questions of fact, about which there is great controversy, and upon which we have no evidence, I do not deem it proper to dwell at all. Who made the pledges alluded to, and to what extent were they made? I apprehend it will be found that the Senator from Illinois is mistaken on this point. That an individual pledge in favor of submission may have been made I do not pretend to controvert; but that it was general, or very extended, I wholly deny. We have no evidence of it. It is true that Mr. Stanton, who was acting Governor of the Territory before Mr. Walker arrived, made use of this language.

Mr. DOUGLAS. From what book is the Senator about to read?

Mr. GREEN. From the "Political Text-Book," a compilation by Mr. Cluskey.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is a private book.

Mr. GREEN. Yes; it is not a public document. The correspondence and proclamations have not yet been officially printed; but I suppose the genuineness of what I am about to read will not be controverted.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I presume not.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Stanton, before the people had voted for delegates to the convention, used this language, in speaking of the act providing for the convention:

"In this light the act must be allowed to have provided for a full and fair expression of the will of the people through the delegates who may be chosen to represent them in the constitutional convention."

Here, before the members of the convention were elected, the idea of the acting Governor is promulgated to the people, that they have a full and fair opportunity to speak through the convention. What else?

"I do not doubt, however, that, in order to avoid all pretext for resistance to the peaceful operation of this law"—

Not because there is any obligation to do so, but to avoid all pretext for complaint—

"the convention itself will, in some form, provide for submitting the great distracting question regarding their social institution, which has so long agitated the people of Kansas, to a fair vote of all the actual bona fide residents of the Territory, with every possible security against fraud and violence. If the constitution be thus framed, and the question of difference thus submitted to the decision of the people"—

That is, if the slavery question be submitted to the people—

"I believe that Kansas will be admitted by Congress with out delay as one of the sovereign States of the American Union; and the territorial authorities will be immediately withdrawn."

Now we see what was the understanding of the people before the election of the convention. It was this: the people can be heard through delegates if they choose; now is the time for them to exert their power; if you have any preferences on the subject, come up and vote; "but," says the acting Governor, "as a mere question of policy, to avoid all pretext of complaint, let the slavery question be submitted to a separate vote." Governor Walker is a little broader in his language, but he substantially takes the same position. There seems to be in the mind of Governor Walker a confusion of ideas. He does not seem to apprehend that they could have a separation of the slave question from the body of the constitution. The policy or propriety of this separation is not a matter for me to consider. It is a matter for the consideration of the people of Kansas, who have the power to settle all these questions "in their own way," and I am the last who would trample under foot that principle which has been so much lauded by the honorable Senator from Illinois. While the Governor has the confusion of ideas of which I have spoken, it is very manifest that his whole attention was directed to the slavery question as the proper matter for submission to the people. Before the election of delegates took place he arrived in the Territory, and published his inaugural address, in which, talking to the whole people of Kansas, he said:

"You should not console yourselves, my fellow-citizens, with the reflection that you may, by a subsequent vote, defeat the ratification of the constitution. Although most anxious to secure to you the exercise of that great constitutional right"—

He does not say it is a legal right emanating from the Kansas-Nebraska act, but a constitutional right. I should like to have him, or any other man, show me the clause of any constitution, State or Federal, that requires the people of a new Territory, in forming the first constitution under which they act, to submit it, or even any part of it, to a subsequent vote of the people—

"and believing that the convention is the servant and not the master of the people, yet I have no power to dictate the proceedings of that body."

They were acting under a law which said the people might settle all these questions in their own way. The Governor adds:

"I cannot doubt, however, the course they will adopt on this subject. But why incur the hazard of the preliminary formation of a constitution by a minority, as alleged by you, when a majority, by their own votes, could control the forming of that instrument?"

This shows that he did not regard it as a fixed fact that the law, or any other power, could induce the convention, necessarily, to submit the constitution to a popular vote. His argument was advisory. Addressing those who were disposed to keep aloof, he says to them, "If you have the majority why not go to the polls, secure the convention, and have a constitution made in the manner you prefer?" May I not say that they refused to participate in the election from one of two considerations; either they knew that they were a minority of the Territory, or they were standing out in open rebellion to the legal authorities, defying both the territorial and the Federal Government?

The honorable Senator's speech conforms to precisely this position. He admits that the convention was regularly called, in pursuance of law, acting in conformity both to Federal and local authority. Why was it opposed? Was it for any wise purpose? Was it in order to accomplish any good end? The opposition was in order to keep the subject open. It was a captious, a factious opposition. It was an opposition from a party composed of two elements which have been dangerous to the peace of our western country, uniting, on the one hand, fanaticism, with a hope of pecuniary reward on the other, Fanaticism is sterile. Fanaticism is barren. Fanaticism is unproductive. Fanaticism will die out of itself when the sober reflection of the people comes round. To keep up that fanaticism they unite with it another element—the element of wild speculation, the hope of pecuniary gain. The union of these two elements has fanned the flame, endangered the Government, hazarded our peace, rendered insecure our property, alienating the feelings of brother from brother, because they happen to live on different sides of an imaginary line. I hope to see this union of elements broken down. I hope to see the Kansas embroglio ended; ended in conformity with law; ended in conformity with the action of the legal convention of the people; ended by giving force and effect to a constitution that has been as regularly, as honestly, as fairly agreed on, as any constitution that this Government finds within the range of the thirty-one States. Should Kansas be admitted; should the peace of the country be reestablished; should this bone of contention be taken away forever; town lots, land investments and the other means of pecuniary profit broken down, the fanatical excitement will cease and determine. It is the hope of some to keep up the excitement, and I am sorry to see the course of the honorable Senator from Illinois who has fought for us so long—not for "the slave power," but for justice, for equality north and south, for equality without reference to locality, for great principles. Knowing that he is still wedded to these principles, I am sorry to see his course calculated to give that fanatical element the benefit of his powerful talents. This is the real cause of my regret.

It is said—and I throw in the expression here to let my view be known, and not as material to the matter under consideration—that the law of climate has dedicated Kansas to freedom, meaning thereby that it is not adapted to African slavery. That may be so or not. I am not a very good judge of climate, and I do not believe the Senators present are very good judges of the climate of Kansas. I do not think many of them have seen it, or have had very accurate reports of the range of the barometer and thermometer there for the last few years. What I say is, that if the law of climate is to determine the question of slavery in any Territory within the limits of the United States, where the two races are thrown together, I am content to trust it to that law of climate without any coercive law, without any law of Congress, without any territorial law, without any State law. Let me appeal to my northern friends who believe there is so much potency in the law of climate, the law of production, the law of vocation, the law of pursuit; if these be sufficient, open your northern States and see whether you will not soon have a few of our slaves there performing menial services. Whether that be true or not, is it not well to leave Kansas to the people of Kansas, to the voters of Kansas? If they are willing to trust this matter to the law of climate they are settling it in their own way. If they are determined to have a positive prohibition of slavery in their constitution they are settling it in their own way, in conformity with the law which gave them an organic form. Those of us who boasted of the rights they had under the law, should be the last to complain of the manner in which they exercise those rights.

I know, however, that there is one thing greatly complained of by various persons, and which is regarded by some as a sufficient reason why Kansas ought to be kept out of the Union; while others, who do not go to that extreme, express much regret on the subject—I allude to the fact that the whole constitution has not been submitted to the popular vote. I hold that there was no necessity for any such submission. If after the convention expressed their judgment, it was proper, as a mere matter of policy or prudence, to submit any question to a separate vote of the people, they ought to submit the real bone of contention. I hold further, that the submission of the slavery question in the manner in which it has been submitted, is fairer, better calculated to collect the real will and judgment of the people, than if the whole constitution had been submitted. Suppose the convention had adopted a constitution prohibiting slavery, and had submitted it to the people as the Senator from Illinois thinks the law required. If this had been done, and my friend from Mississippi [Mr. Brown] lived there, he would have been compelled to vote against slavery or against the constitution. Whenever many questions are mixed up together, and they are all presented as an entirety, neither one of them has a fair expression of the people who thus pass judgment on them. So far is this principle known to be correct, that the constitution of Louisiana requires that every law shall embrace but one subject, which shall be stated in its title.

Mr. BIGLER. That feature is in the new constitution of Kansas.

Mr. GREEN. It is in the constitution of Kansas.

Mr. GWIN. And of California.

Mr. GREEN. If the matter were investigated, I think it would be found that the same provision exists in many other States. The object is to prevent "log rolling," and to insure a fair, honest expression of the people or their representatives when they pass judgment on any subject. You may put together in an improvement appropriation bill many items, neither one of which has sufficient intrinsic merit to receive the assent of Congress; but tie them together, and perhaps you can pass all. If the slave question had been tied to the suffrage question; the governor's qualification question; the taxation question; the bank question; and if I had been a citizen of Kansas I should have been compelled, in order to vote for holding negroes in Kansas, to swallow all the objectionable features in every other branch of the constitution. To submit a single question is the only fair way, the only just way, the only simple, certain method of collecting the public will. There is uncertainty in all human proceedings. The people may not come to the polls; the representatives may not do their duty; but we proceed on the idea that there is a just principle involved; and if the principle be just, and the people have an opportunity to carry it out, and do not carry it out, but forfeit their rights, it is their misfortune, not ours; and our sympathies are blunted when we consider that their passions were the sole cause of the grievances of which they complain.

The constitution is not submitted to the people of Kansas. I know the Senator undertook to prove that the people were placed under coercion, that they were compelled to go to the polls and vote, and that before they could vote on the slave question they were compelled to vote for the constitution. If the whole constitution had been submitted before they could vote for or against slavery, they would have been compelled to vote in the manner which the Senator represented as objectionable, which he animadverted upon, which he censured and condemned. If the whole constitution had been submitted, the voter, in order to vote for slavery, would have been compelled to indorse every feature of the constitution; and, in order to vote against it, would have been compelled to vote against the other features of the constitution, and thus leave him without a State government. The anxiety to get a State government might be strong enough to induce him to forego his objections to other branches of the constitution, and hence, as I before remarked, the mode of submission adopted by the convention was the only simple, fair, and just method of collecting the popular will upon the slavery question. In the convention of California, a proposition was made to submit the slavery question to a separate vote of the people. The convention was anxious not to endanger the admission of the State into the Union. They did not believe a majority of their people desired slavery, and therefore they did not submit it as a separate question, but they submitted the whole constitution to a vote of the people of California. It came up here, and we all know there was a great deal of complaint on the part of northern as well assouthern Senators and members in consequence of the non-submission of the slavery question.

By an examination of the schedule, framed by the Kansas convention, it will be seen that the constitution itself is not submitted. The Senator is mistaken when he says that the constitution is submitted, and that the people are required to vote for it. He says the constitution receives its vitality and takes effect from its ratification. The Senator is entirely mistaken. It never does take effect until Kansas shall be admitted into the Union by Congress. "But," says the Senator, "the schedule says the constitution is to be submitted to the people." Yes. For what purpose? For ratification. What is the meaning of "to ratify?" It is to settle, to fix. There is a part of the constitution not settled, not fixed, and that must be ratified. That question is to be passed upon by the people, when they say at the polls whether they will retain a provision sanctioning African slavery, or will strike it out. They are to settle, fix, ratify that unsettled, unfixed, unratified part. That is all the article provides for. We are not to take a mere expression, but must take the purport of the whole article. If a logician, or a judge, or a statesman, undertakes to construe the meaning of that article, he takes the whole of it together, and so taking it, what does he find? That nothing is to be ratified, fixed, settled; but the unratified, unfixed, unsettled part, which is whether slavery shall be retained in the constitution or not. There is to be no decision on any part of the constitution, except that which relates to slavery.

The Senator from Illinois, however, seems to think that each voter must first vote for the constitution, before he can vote for or against slavery. That is another mistake. The voter does not vote for or against the constitution. He simply votes a ballot which is to be counted for or against slavery. If he votes the ballot containing the words "constitution with slavery," it is to be counted in favor of slavery; but if he votes "constitution with no slavery," it is to be counted in favor of striking out the article in the constitution providing for slavery. The only question submitted is, Will you, or will you not, have in the constitution of Kansas a clause sanctioning slavery? Is the writing of the word "constitution" on the ballot to be construed as making the voter vote for the constitution? Then I can show that, if a man in Louisiana voted on the adoption of their new constitution, he was involved in this seeming contradiction. The constitution of Louisiana was submitted to the people, under a schedule which required, "each ballot shall be indorsed 'the constitution accepted,' or 'the constitution rejected.' " There would be just about as much plausibility in saying that a voter in Louisiana was compelled to vote first for the constitution and then for its rejection, or first for the constitution and then for its acceptance, as in saying here that a man in Kansas is to vote first for the constitution and then for or against slavery. The question submitted in Louisiana was the acceptance or rejection of the constitution. The question submitted in Kansas is the insertion or striking out of an article sanctioning slavery. That is the sole question to be decided.

The opposition party in Kansas—I do not know what title they assume to themselves—deny that the constitution is submitted, and the Senator makes an issue with them. Those who live on the ground, who know what has been done, say that the whole constitution is not submitted. I say there was no more necessity for its submission than there was for the submission of the constitution of Illinois. The people of Kansas acted through their representatives. Those representatives had power either to adopt a constitution finally, or simply to make a proposition, and submit it for the consideration of the people.

There is nothing novel in the positions which I have stated. They are in conformity with the past action of the Government. I have before me statements showing what States have been admitted with an enabling act, and those admitted without any such act having been previously passed.

The following States were authorized to form constitutions by acts of Congress previous to their admission: Ohio, Louisiana, Indiana, Mississippi, Illinois, Alabama, Missouri, and Wisconsin. The States for which no enabling act was previously passed, authorizing the formation of a constitution, were Vermont, Tennessee, Maine, Arkansas, Michigan, Florida, Texas, and Iowa. I have also a list of all the new States admitted since the Federal Constitution went into operation in 1789, showing what States were organized without the previous authority of Congress, and what States submitted their constitutions to a vote of the people, after being framed by their conventions. This throws important light on the past history of the Government, and that past history is in strict accordance with the views I have advanced.

For Vermont, the constitution was formed by a convention, in July, 1777. It was revised by a convention December 25, 1777, without authority of Congress. "The constitution was not ratified by the people." I quote from Thompson's "Vermont," part 2, page 105. The application for admission, was made February 9, 1791, and the State was admitted March 4, 1791, as I find from the Statutes at Large, vol. 1, page 191.

Kentucky applied for admission through the delegates of a convention, December 9, 1790; her constitution was not then formed. My authority is the appendix to the House Journal, vol. 1, pages 411-12. She was admitted June 1, 1792; her constitution was laid before Congress, November 7, 1792, as I learn from the House Journal, vol. 1, page 614. There is no evidence that the constitution was submitted to a vote of the people.

For Tennessee, the constitution was formed by a convention without authority of Congress, February 6, 1796, as I learn from American State Papers, "miscellaneous," vol. 1, pages 146-7. She applied for admission, April 8, 1796, as is shown by Senate Journal, April 11, and House Journal April 8, 1796. She was admitted June 1, 1796. The constitution was not submitted to the people, but it was forwarded to the Secretary of State, as I learn from the annals of Tennessee, pages 656-7, and the history of Tennessee, page 471.

For Ohio, the constitution was formed by a convention, under authority of Congress, November 29, 1802, as is shown by the Statutes at Large, vol. 2, pages 173, 201. She applied for admission January 7, 1803, as is shown by Senate Journal, vol. 3, page 251. She was admitted February 19, 1803, as I find in the Statutes at Large, vol. 2, page 201. The constitution was not submitted to the people, as I learn from Howe's Historical Collections of Ohio, page 16.

In Louisiana, the constitution was formed by a convention January 22, 1812, under authority of Congress of the date of February 10, 1811. I refer to the Statutes at Large, vol. 2, page 641. She was admitted April 8, 1812, and there is no evidence that the constitution was submitted to a vote of the people.

The constitution of Indiana was formed by a convention June 29, 1816, under authority of Congress as I find in the Statutes at Large, vol. 3, page 289. She was admitted December 11, 1816. I quote from the Statutes at Large, vol. 3, page 399. Her constitution was submitted to Congress June 10, 1817, as is shown by the House Journal, second session, Twenty-Fourth Congress, page 180. There is no evidence that the constitution was submitted to a vote of the people.

The constitution of Mississippi was formed by a convention August 15, 1817—I again refer to the Statutes at Large, vol. 3, page 472—under authority of Congress. (Statutes, vol. 3, page 348.) Her constitution was submitted to Congress December 4, 1817. She was admitted December 10, 1817, (Statutes at Large, vol. 3, page 472,) and there is no evidence that the constitution was submitted to a vote of the people.

The Constitution of Illinois was formed by a convention August 26, 1818, under authority of Congress—(see Statutes at Large, vol. 3, page 428;) submitted to the House of Representatives November 7, 1818, and admitted December 3, 1818. (Statutes, vol. 3, page 536.) There is no evidence that the constitution was submitted to a vote of the people.

The constitution of Alabama was formed by a convention, August 2, 1819, under authority of Congress, (Statutes at Large, vol. 3, page 489;) her constitution was submitted to the House of Representatives, December 6, 1819; and she was admitted, December 14, 1819, (Statutes at Large, vol. 3, page 608.) There is no evidence that the constitution was submitted to the people.

The constitution of Maine was formed by a convention without authority of Congress, October 29, 1819. Her constitution was submitted to Congress, December 8, 1819, (see House Journal, first session Sixteenth Congress, pages 18-60,) and she was admitted, March 15, 1820. The constitution was submitted to a vote of the people, as I learn from Williamsen's History of Maine, vol. 2, page 674.

The constitution of Missouri was formed by a convention, 19th July, 1820, under authority of Congress, (Statutes at Large, vol. 3, page 545.) Her constitution was submitted November 16, 1820. One of my authorities is Mr. Lowndes's report, November 23, 1820, (American State Papers, "Miscellaneous," vol. 2, page 625.) The joint resolution admitting the State on a "certain condition," was approved March 2, 1821. The condition was accepted, and the State admitted by proclamation of the President, of August 10, 1821. There is no evidence that the constitution was submitted to a vote of the people.

The constitution of Michigan was formed by a convention under the authority of the ordinance of 1787, and without the authority of Congress. It was submitted to and ratified by the people, (see Lammon's History of Michigan, pages 241-243; also, Senate Documents 5 and 211, Twenty-Fourth Congress, first session, and Reports of Committees of House of Representatives, first session Twenty-Fourth Congress, 380.) She was admitted on the condition that she should amend her constitution so as to change her boundary, (Statutes at Large, vol. 5, page 49.)

The constitution of Arkansas was formed by a convention without authority of Congress. I refer to House Documents, Twenty-Fourth Congress, first session, No. 164; Niles's Register, vol. 49, page 243, for Attorney General's opinion; and for debates, to "Congressional Debates," vol. 12, parts 1 and 2. She was admitted with a constitution, by joint resolution, June 15, 1836. The constitution was not submitted to the people.

The constitution of Florida was formed by a convention without authority of Congress, and submitted to the people. (See House Doc. 208, Twenty-Fifth Congress, third session, and Statutes at Large, vol. 5, page 742.) She was admitted with a constitution, March 3, 1845.

The constitution of Wisconsin was formed by a convention under authority of Congress. (Statutes, vol. 9, page 56; and House Doc. 49, Twenty-Ninth Congress, second session.) She was admitted on certain conditions. (Statutes, vol. 9, page 178.) The constitution had not been submitted to the people previous to her application with a constitution. For debates see Congressional Globe and Appendix, Twenty-Ninth Congress, first and second sessions.

The constitution of Iowa was formed by a convention on the 18th May, 1846, without authority of Congress, and was submitted to the people. (See House Doc. 16, Twenty-Ninth Congress, second session, page 17.) She was admitted with her constitution, March 3, 1845.

The constitution of California was formed by a convention without authority of Congress, and it was submitted to and ratified by the people. (See Senate Mis. Doc. 68, page 14, Thirty-First Congress, first session.) She was admitted September 9, 1850.

I have thus, as briefly as I could, undertaken to show, first, that Kansas is, under the Louisiana treaty, under the law of Congress, under the Kansas-Nebraska act, under the special pledge of the Democratic party in the Cincinnati convention entitled to admission, having now a republican form of government; second, that the convention was legally and fairly called, sanctioned by the Federal authorities, acting in conformity with the territorial government, not in conflict, not in antagonism, not in opposition. Third, I have shown that the presumption is that the convention fairly and truly represented the people and reflected their will. On this point we have heard of broken pledges and violated promises. We have heard of vows that have not been fulfilled, but we have no evidence on the subject.

I heard the Senator from Illinois also make remarks here touching what would be the final result of the submission of the slave question; that he had no doubt "returns" would come in, intimating that he believed frauds would be perpetrated. But eight months ago, who so loud, so forcible, and so eloquent as the Senator from Illinois in denouncing the party that had insinuated fraud! On what evidence is it that he would insinuate that frauds will be committed in the returns that are to come in when the question of slavery shall be submitted. I have no right to impute fraud. I never will impute fraud. Fraud is to be proved, not presumed. When the honorable gentleman occupied a place on the bench, if an attorney had made an argument like that, he would be ready almost to strike his name from the roll of attorneys. Is there any evidence, or are there any facts developed in this case which would justify him in inferring or presuming fraud? None that I have seen, and he does us injustice if he has it in his possession and retains it as a secret; it ought to be developed; it ought to come before the country in a tangible shape, for we are as much responsible for our action when that action depends on facts as the honorable Senator himself.

The legal presumption is, that the representative reflects the will of the represented. There is no evidence before us conflicting with that legal presumption. The election has not yet taken place. Is there any preparation for fraud? Have schemes been concocted, have plans been devised by which fraud is to be perpetrated in the voting upon that question? I will not believe it in advance of the fact itself. Is it for that reason the honorable Senator thinks this whole matter should be reversed, the whole subject thrown back, and a complete revival of the complication of difficulties that have beset us on our western border? Is it because of this anticipated fraud? I have shown it cannot be because of the want of an enabling act, for he has voted the other way in several instances. I have shown that it cannot be for the want of submitting the whole question to the people, because he has voted the other way in several other instances. I have shown that this convention was legally and constitutionally called. That he admits. I have shown that the legal presumption is, that they reflect the will of the people. Is there then any rebutting evidence? There is nothing else in the preceding part of the argument to justify his now separating from us, and, when we come to this bifurcated road, his taking the left hand. Is there any reason why he should do it on this simple, anticipated idea of fraud, on which there is no particle of evidence before us? No; the legal presumption still stands unassailed. The legal presumption is still potent enough to justify our action on it, and we must act on it.

In the next place, I have shown that the convention was under no obligation, imposed either by law or usage, to submit the constitution to a vote of the people. Further, I have shown, I think, that a majority of the States entered the Union with constitutions not previously submitted to the people. If Kansas has copied the example set by a majority of its elder sisters, surely nothing will be urged in complaint against Kansas because it did not follow the minority. It is true, I heard the Senator commending the rule, which he says is found in the Minnesota bill.

Here I will remark that, as far as I have examined the law—and I have examined every case I could—I find, from the beginning of the Government, in 1789, down to the present day, there never was a prerequisite, even where Congress passed an enabling act, that the result of the convention should be submitted to the people, save in the Minnesota bill. It was not in the Ohio bill; it was not in the Indiana bill, it was not in the Illinois bill; it was not in the Alabama bill; it was not in the Mississippi bill. The other States were formed on their own responsibility, without an enabling act. In none of those enabling acts—not even in the Wisconsin bill—was there a provision requiring the constitution to be submitted to the people. In no bill, save one, that ever passed Congress was any such provision contained. If the convention of the Territory of Kansas deemed it proper to copy the example which Congress had set, which a majority of sister States had set, I can see in this no cause of objection to Kansas at our hands.

Again, I have shown that the only question about which there is any controversy is separately submitted to a fair vote of the people. About this I have no doubt or controversy. The only question that has been a bone of contention, that has been the cause of stirring up strife, that has been made the pretext for assaults on different sections of this Union—that one single, important question, is submitted to a fair vote of the people. What the result of that vote will be it is impossible for me to foretell. This much, however, I can with propriety say: If a majority of the people there are determined not to have African slaves, it would be folly, by any scheme, by any trick, to get up a constitution adverse to the will of the majority; and hence I am glad this slavery question is fairly submitted. Although I greatly prefer having no constitutional and no legal barriers, though I subscribe most heartily to the doctrine of climate, of production, and of vocation, and think it the only sound solution of this question within the limits of the Federal Union, still my opinion is not to be set up as dictatorial to influence others. It is but my individual property; I shall act upon it so far as I am able. As it is thus submitted, it is the only question of controversy. Who is it that complains of any provision in the Kansas constitution? and who is it that could complain of a provision in that constitution who did not have a fair opportunity to make it otherwise, if he is in the majority? and if he is in the minority, let him complain and gnash his teeth in vain. Minorities are expected to complain; but it is the duty of minorities to submit as gracefully as their feelings will permit. If they were the majority, they had the opportunity to make it otherwise. If they did not choose to exercise their right, it is their fault and their misfortune. If the majority have exercised their legal rights in an honorable, upright, and fair manner, they are not to be forced to give way to a factious minority.

I have also shown there is no legal objection, and no prudential consideration, to prevent the admission of Kansas. How, then, are we to act on this subject? Are we to go back and travel over the detail of circumstances that occurred in Kansas, so far as presented in the President's message? It is unnecessary, except so far as they bear on the fairness of this convention, the fair opportunity for the free expression of the will of the people. Whether the President's reasoning be right or wrong, let it pass. It ought to commend him for his patriotism, for his disinterested view, and for the sound conclusion at which he arrives. With this commendation, and with this support, whether he is right or wrong in saying the law requires the slave branch of this controverted matter to be submitted to a vote of the people, I shall not utter one word of complaint.

There is a still greater object in view than to look back at the past, and find fault with this or that proceeding which occurred in Kansas. This is the President's view. Practical men must take hold of subjects and act in a practical manner, to effectuate the most good in a constitutional and legal way. From all the investigation I have given to this subject, I am satisfied that the good of Kansas, the good, the peace, the prosperity of the whole Union will be affected more or less by the decision that we make on this Kansas question. If Congress keeps it open, if excitement is still to spread through the land, if a system of warfare is to be gotten up plunging the land in gloom, and perhaps reaching to the extreme of shedding human blood, the consequences will be on those who reopen the slave question, the Kansas question, the squatter sovereignty question, or any other question connected with the well-being of Kansas. If there be any question that can be fairly decided in Kansas, it is the slave question. I believe that it will be fairly decided there. I believe the constitution meets the approbation of a majority of the people of Kansas. In regard to that, I have no question or doubt, and my belief, founded on the slight sources of information I possess, is at least to be treated as a set-off to the fear of fraud, and the allegation of improper influences, on the part of the people of Kansas, as alleged by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. President, I have thus given my views of this subject. I have elaborated no single point. It has been my purpose simply to show that there is no obstacle in the way, and that there are considerations why, in conformity with the past action of the country, we should admit Kansas at once. I believe she has acted as fairly as any other Territory. I have stated the reason why I have given my view of the case. Whether the constitution will come up in the one shape or the other, is a subject about which I have no right to express an opinion. Whether it will come up at all, or not, I am not able to say, though I apprehend it will. I have only felt bound to meet the objections urged by the Senator, because I thought they would have a prejudicial effect upon the country, and an exceedingly prejudicial effect in Kansas, where an election is to be held on the 21st of this month. It is true little that I can say or little that others can say, will reach Kansas before the election; but, at least, both sides ought to be partially heard—heard enough, at least, to compare them together and see which is in conformity with the Federal Constitution, and which is in conformity with the law, which is in conformity with the practice of the Government. Whether I have succeeded in showing that the position I take is correct, is, of course, for others to determine.

Mr. BIGLER obtained the floor.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I trust I shall be permitted to say a few words in explanation.

Mr. BIGLER. I shall most cheerfully yield the floor to the Senator from Illinois, after a very few remarks. My object is to take the floor—not to speak to-day, but to move the postponement of this subject until Monday, unless some other Senator desires to speak to-morrow.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will make the motion in the Senator's name, with that understanding.

Mr. BIGLER. That is satisfactory.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I have listened to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. GREEN] with unfeigned pleasure. There has been a fairness in his tone and in his line of argument which shows that he has been arguing from his convictions, with the view of stating what he conceives to be the true, sound aspect of this question. It is gratifying to me to hear the subject discussed in that spirit and tone before the Senate. I but do the Senator justice when I say that he has presented the question with marked ability and clearness; and I am inclined to think that the best view of the subject has been presented to-day which we shall have from the Senator's side.

I should not utter a word, but for the fact that the Senator has misapprehended my meaning and my position on one or two points, and I deem it due to myself to restate my views on those points, in order that he, the Senate, and the country, may see what the true position is. I acquit him of any intention to misstate; there was only a misconception. This may have been occasioned by my own fault, as I spoke rapidly, without preparation, and had no opportunity to revise the report of my speech. The Senator is under a misapprehension in supposing that I have assumed it to be a fatal objection to the admission of a State into this Union that there was no enabling act giving the consent of Congress in advance to the formation of a constitution. I took no such position.

The Senator is also mistaken in supposing that I took the ground that it was a fatal objection that the constitution was not submitted to the people before being sent to Congress for acceptance. I did not assume that position. My ground was this: the regular mode of proceeding is by an enabling act, and if the Territorial Legislature proceed to call a convention without first having the assent of Congress to do so, it is irregular, but not so irregular that it necessarily follows their constitution cannot be accepted. I argued and cited the opinion of the Attorney General in the Arkansas case, to show that, although a convention called by a Territorial Legislature without the previous assent of Congress, was irregular, yet it was not an unlawful assemblage, but was a body of men having a right to petition under the Constitution of the United States, and that having been assembled in convention, more force ought to be given to the mode of assemblage, but that it was not a constitutional body, authorized to institute government. In other words, I contended that a convention, constituted in obedience to an enabling act of Congress previously giving assent, is a constitutional body of men, with power and authority to institute government; but that a convention assembled under an act of the Territorial Legislature, without the assent of Congress previously given, has no authority to institute government. It has power to petition; it may put its petition in the form of a constitution; and when it comes here we are at liberty to accept or reject that petition.

This was my position in regard to the effect of an enabling act. I then went on to show that, there having been no enabling act passed for Kansas, the Lecompton convention was irregular. I argued that it was not an unlawful assemblage, but might present a petition to us in the shape of a constitution, which we should be at liberty to accept or reject, as we pleased. It was a convention authorized to petition, but not to establish or institute government.

I was aware that in the history of this Government some new States had been admitted without the passage of an enabling act by Congress in the first instance. I must be permitted, however, to spoil the effect of one or two of the Senator's cases—those upon which he dwelt with the greatest pleasure and most satisfaction to himself. He tells us there was no enabling act for Michigan. If the Senator will look back into the history of Michigan, he will find that the authority existed under the old ordinance of 1787. That ordinance, which was the organic act of Michigan, provided that the Northwestern Territory should be divided into not less than three nor more than five States, and each of those States was, by the ordinance, authorized to be formed and admitted into the Union when it should have sixty thousand inhabitants. Thus an enabling act was incorporated into the ordinance of 1787 for the five northwestern States. This is the reason why it was not necessary that there should be an enabling act for Michigan, nor for Ohio, nor for Indiana, nor for Illinois, nor for Wisconsin.

Next, with regard to Tennessee. The Senator quotes the names of Washington and Jackson—names that raise a thrill of patriotic feeling in the bosom of every American when they are mentioned, and to whose example we should, of course, yield the tribute of our approbation. How was it with Tennessee? The Senator says it was the first new State admitted without an enabling act. Tennessee, when cut off from North Carolina and formed into a Territory known as the Southwestern Territory, was organized into a territorial government by an act of Congress, which extended to it all the provisions of the ordinance of 1787, except the slavery clause. Thus, the territorial organic act of Tennessee contained within itself an enabling act, declaring that the people of Tennessee should have authority to form a constitution and State government whenever the Territory should have sixty thousand inhabitants. Being thus authorized, the Legislature of Tennessee took steps to find out when they had the sixty thousand inhabitants. When they ascertained that fact by a census, they called a convention to form a constitution. When they applied to Congress for admission, President Washington, in that beautiful letter which the Senator read, referred to the fact that in the act organizing the Territory of Tennessee there was an enabling clause, guarantying to that Territory the right to come into the Union whenever it should have sixty thousand inhabitants. The Governor of the Territory having furnished the evidence showing that there were then sixty thousand inhabitants in Tennessee, according to the census, that people had a right to come into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. These facts dispose of the alleged example of Washington and Jackson, for they show that in the very case in which both acted, the assent of Congress had been previously given.

I am aware that in the Florida case and in other cases there was not an enabling act in the first instance. The rule upon which we acted was, that, although this was an irregularity, it might be waived or insisted upon according as we thought public policy and public duty required. I took that ground in my speech last week. I said further that, where an enabling act had been passed and a convention had been organized in the manner therein provided for, it was a constitutional convention empowered to institute government; and hence stood on a different footing. That distinction has been clearly taken, elaborated, and established by the Senator from Missouri in his speech. If he is right and I am right in this argument, it follows that the convention which met at Lecompton and formed a constitution was not a body properly constituted and empowered to institute a government, for the reason that it had not the previous authority of Congress, but was merely an assemblage of citizens regularly collected for the purpose of petitioning for a change of government from a territorial to a State government, and when that petition comes here we shall be at liberty to accept it or to reject it—to dispose of it as we may see fit.

Again, sir; the action of the convention shows, in my judgment, clearly, that they took the same view of the subject; for I must still insist that the convention did not assume that they had a right to institute government by virtue of the power which they possessed, but only to frame a constitution to be submitted to the people, and go into operation when ratified. The Senator thought I was mistaken in this. Let us refer to the record and see which of us is mistaken. The sixteenth section of the schedule provides:

"This constitution shall take effect, and be in force, from and after its ratification by the people, as herein before provided."

If not ratified it is to be void; if ratified it is to take effect from that time, and by virtue of that ratification. This clearly shows that the convention did not claim to be a body empowered to institute government, but simply a body authorized to frame a constitution in the shape of a petition, and to pray for its acceptance by Congress. That was the distinction.

Again, in the seventh section of the schedule we find:

"Before this constitution shall be sent to Congress for admission into the Union, as a State, it shall be submitted to all the white male inhabitants of this Territory, for approval or disapproval as follows:

It then goes on to give the form of the vote, "constitution with slavery," or "constitution with no slavery;" but before it can be sent to Congress the schedule says it shall be submitted for approval or disapproval. Can it be said, in the face of this language, that the convention declared the constitution in force without submitting it to the people? Can it be said that the constitution can ever take effect, unless ratified by a vote of the people? If I can understand the plain meaning of language which appears to be unequivocal, it is not susceptible of doubt that the constitution is referred to the people for acceptance or rejection, and that whatever validity or vitality it is to have, will be received from the people's ratification. If I am right in this position it brings me back to the old point, that the submission is such as not to give an opportunity for a fair vote on the slavery or any other question.

I come next to the position which I assumed with reference to the submission of a constitution for ratification. I did not contend that a constitution might not, under any circumstances, be put in operation unless submitted to the people for ratification. I said before, and I say now, that the constitution must be the act and deed of the people of Kansas; it must embody the will of the people of Kansas; no constitution should be received by Congress, and none can fairly be considered republican which does not embody the will of the people who are to be governed by it, and is not formed by their act. Having assumed, as an essential fundamental principle, that the constitution must embody the will of the people, the next question is, what is the best and most appropriate mode of ascertaining that will? Upon that point I concur with the President of the United States in his message, that the best mode is to refer it to the people for their acceptance or rejection by a fair vote. The principle being that it shall embody the will of the people, its submission to a popular vote is only a means of ascertaining a fact, which fact, namely, that it embodies the will of the people, gives it vitality, and makes it an appropriate constitution. I regard the argument of the President of the United States in favor of that mode of ascertaining the people's will as conclusive. The President's argument is, that delegates represent districts, and a majority of the delegates may represent a minority of the people, in consequence of some being elected by large majorities and others by small majorities; hence the President says a delegate election is not a fair test, but you must refer it to a vote of the whole people in order to ascertain the vital, the fundamental, the cardinal point whether or not the constitution is the embodiment of the will of the people. I advocate submission, as a means of ascertaining an end, not as a principle. I do not say that there could be no possible case in which I would not accept a constitution without its having been thus submitted. Suppose, for instance, a constitution had been formed by delegates, and there was not a murmur against it, not a protest, not the slightest reason to believe that anybody dissented from it, and the only question in dispute was the sufficiency of the population, I am not certain but that I should waive the irregularity, and take it for granted that such a constitution did embody the will of the people. If I should accept it on such terms, it would be because there was satisfactory evidence that it was the will of the people. That will embodied in the constitution is the cardinal principle which is, or should be, a me qua non in the establishment of governments for the admission of a new State.

This is the point of difference between the Senator from Missouri and myself. As he evidently misconceived my meaning on the matters to which I have referred, it has seemed to me to be due to him to restate my views, especially as he has treated the subject with a candor and courtesy that deserve to be followed and imitated. Certainly they will leave their impression on me in conducting discussions with him. I shall endeavor to profit by the example he has set this day in the mode of debate.

Mr. GREEN. I am somewhat surprised at the position taken by the honorable Senator from Illinois. He undertakes to prove that the State of Michigan was authorized to form a constitution by an enabling act, and this by a process of reasoning which I had not expected from him. He undertakes to prove it by the ordinance of 1787, which contained a provision that the Territory should be divided into not less than three and not more than five States. So far as this division is concerned, he is well aware of the fact that it has been violated. The Territory is made into more than five States; but does the ordinance give authority to the people of a Territory to form a constitution? Does it convey from Congress to the people authority to create a government? He says yes. Congress did not so consider when they passed an enabling act for Ohio. Congress did not so consider when they passed an enabling act for Indiana. Congress did not so consider when they passed an enabling act for Illinois, the gentleman's own State. Four out of the five States in the Northwest Territory formed their constitutions only after enabling acts had been passed by Congress.

But I propose to show that, if that process of reasoning be submitted to prove the existence of an enabling power to create a State government for Michigan, it exists in Kansas in all the perfection it ever possessed in Michigan. There was, says the Senator, an enabling act in the case of Michigan, because the ordinance of 1787 said the people, when they numbered sixty thousand, should be entitled to form a State government. Now the Louisiana treaty, by which the United States acquired Kansas, contains similar provisions, and the law of Congress, passed to give effect to that treaty when the United States took possession of the Territory, contains an express stipulation to that effect. The opinion of the Attorney General in relation to Arkansas, which the Senator read, is as follows:

"The treaty by which Louisiana was ceded to the United States, though undoubtedly, for many important purposes, a part of the supreme law, must, therefore, be laid out of the present question. It is true that the third article 'imposes on the United States, as a nation, the duty of incorporating the inhabitants of the ceded territory into the Union of the United States,' and of admitting them as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States; and, in the mean time, they are to be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess. And it must also be admitted that Congress, by the seventh section of the act of the 2d March, 1805, 'providing for the government of the Territory of Orleans,' have construed this article as pledging the faith of the United States to admit the inhabitants of Louisiana into the Union of the American States as an independent State, or States, and on the footing of the original States, whenever the proper number of free inhabitants shall be found therein."

Now, we have a treaty stipulation, which is the supreme law of the land, providing, prospect-

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1857.

NEW SERIES... No. 4.

ively, for the people of Kansas to form their constitution. We have a legislative construction by the Congress of the United States, guarantying that right to them. If the mere ordinance of 1787 conferred on the people of Michigan the power, (which is disproved by the acts of Congress in four cases out of the five in the Northwest Territory to which the ordinance of 1787 applied,) the same argument proves that an enabling act does exist for Kansas.

That is not all. The Senator said he referred to it for the purpose of taking away one of the instances to which I referred with so much gusto. I did refer to it with pleasure; but he fails to take it away; or, if he does, he supplies an enabling act for Kansas; and he may take his choice of the positions. If he does not take it away, the argument I before made stands unanswered. If he does take it away, he proves the existence of an enabling act for Kansas, which is the very question we are talking about. He may take either horn of the dilemma.

He says I misconstrued him; that he did not mean to say this, that, or the other, was conclusive why we should not admit Kansas. I did not, I hope, represent him as saying that either one of those objections was conclusive why we should not; but he urged them as objections to the admission of Kansas, and I answered his objections. He did not say in his chain of argument that the want of an enabling act was conclusive why Kansas must be rejected, but it was one of the links of the chain, and I thought it best to break each link, one at a time. I broke the link of an enabling act, or tried to do so. I broke the link of previous submission of the constitution to the people, or tried to do it, and, as a conclusive example, I instanced his own State, the constitution of which was not submitted to the people. I have shown by examples in the Government that a large majority of the State constitutions were never submitted to the people before they were admitted as States, and, hence, I am urging no new doctrine, I am propagating no new theories. We stand upon the practices of our republican fathers, and but follow in the footsteps of George Washington and Andrew Jackson.

But the Senator says, when Territories have no enabling act, and the constitution has not been submitted to the people, Congress may, or may not, admit them into the Union as States. I understand him as taking that position. Very well. There is no physical compulsion that can be brought to bear in any case to compel Congress to admit any State. There is a moral obligation, and that appeals to us. I hold that that moral obligation exists not only as strongly, but, perhaps, forty thousand times stronger, in regard to Kansas, than any State which has ever presented itself at our doors for admission. No armies could march to this Capitol, and compel Congress to admit Texas, California, Illinois, Missouri, or any other State. There is no physical compulsion on us to admit Kansas into this Union. There is no legal objection, there is no prudential consideration, why it should not be done. Is there not a moral obligation to do it? That is the question. That moral obligation exists as strongly in regard to Kansas, as it ever did in regard to Illinois; and if the constitution of Kansas has not been submitted, neither was the constitution of Illinois, neither was the constitution of Missouri; and I would be very unfair to Kansas if I sought to apply a rule and a principle to it that were not applied to my own State when it was admitted.

Missouri came and asked admission into this Union, having formed a State government in compliance with what gentlemen are pleased to call, in this latter day, an enabling act, which imparts, as I before remarked, no new power to the people. All it does is to give, in advance, the assent of Congress, which may be given subsequent to the formation of a constitution for admission. The one is as regular as the other; the one is as legal as the other, and the latter is the safer of the two; for, as the Senator admits, and as I contended, if Congress give the assent in advance, that State stands as an independent State, in spite of the Federal Union, and nothing but physical power can ever bring her into the Union, except her voluntary action in conjunction with your voluntary action.

But again: the Senator thinks I misapprehended him in regard to the submission of the constitution. If I make any blunders, I will take great pleasure in correcting them. I undertook to show that the mere technical phraseology of this instrument was not the subject to be determined. It was its legal construction, and that we, as judges or statesmen, must pass sentence on its purport and meaning. What is its purport and meaning? That but one single subject is submitted for the consideration of the voters; that the whole subject was before them when they voted for the members of the convention; that if they stayed away, they stayed away in their own wrong; that they did their duty when they voted for members of the convention; that that convention was as legal and regular as any that ever sat in the whole limits of this Confederacy; and that this one question submitted to them is presented to them from a mere consideration of propriety and policy, and not from any legal compulsion whatsoever. This was my position.

Now, is the fair construction of this clause of the schedule in accordance with the position I take; or is it in accordance with the position assumed by the Senator from Illinois? The seventh section of the schedule says:

"That this constitution shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States at its next ensuing session, and as soon as official information has been received that it is approved by the same, by the admission."

For that is the only approving they have to do—"of the State of Kansas as one of the sovereign States of the United States, the president of this convention shall issue his proclamation to convene the State Legislature at the seat of government within thirty-one days after publication. Should any vacancy occur by death, resignation, or otherwise, in the Legislature or other office, he shall order an election to fill such vacancy: Provided, however, in case of refusal, absence, or disability of the president of this convention to discharge the duties herein imposed on him, the president pro tempore of this convention shall perform said duties; and in case of absence, refusal, or disability of the president pro tempore, a committee consisting of seven, or a majority of them, shall discharge the duties required of the president of this convention."

Then comes the section marked "eleven," which has reference to the mode of submitting to the people of Kansas whether they will have slavery in the constitution, or whether slavery shall be stricken out of the constitution. It is in this language:

"Before this constitution shall be sent to Congress."

It never takes effect until the admission of the State by Congress. Before it shall be sent to Congress certain things shall be done. The question on which I intended to correct the Senator was, that the constitution, as the constitution of a State government, never is to take effect unless Kansas be admitted by Congress into the Union.

"Before this constitution shall be sent to Congress for admission into the Union as a State, it shall be submitted."

What is to be passed upon? Let us see.

"—to all the white male inhabitants of this Territory for approval or disapproval, as follows:"

What is to be approved? It is submitted to them to be approved or not approved, on what point? Why, "as follows." What does follow:

"—The president of this convention shall, by proclamation, declare that on the 21st day of December, 1857, at the different election precincts now established by law, or which may be established, as herein provided, in the Territory of Kansas, an election shall be held, over which shall preside three judges, or a majority of them, to be appointed as follows: The president of this convention shall appoint three commissioners in each county in the Territory, whose duty it shall be to appoint three judges of election in the several precincts of their respective counties, and to establish precincts for voting, and to cause polls to be opened at such places as they may deem proper in their respective counties, at which election the constitution framed by this convention shall be submitted."

How?

"To all the white male inhabitants of the Territory of Kansas in the said Territory upon that day, and over the age of twenty-one years, for ratification or rejection, in the following manner and form."

The term "ratification" and the term "rejection" are both used, but to what had they reference? "For ratification or rejection in the following manner and form." It has reference to the only one thing submitted to them. What is that?

"The voting shall be by ballot. The judges of said election shall cause to be kept two poll-books by two clerks by them appointed. The ballots cast at said election shall be indorsed, 'constitution with slavery'."

Not "for constitution" and "for slavery." There is but one vote cast—not for two things. It is for one thing; the vote is cast "constitution with slavery," or on the other side, "constitution with no slavery." So that there is but one single point submitted to the people on which they can vote, or were intended to vote, by the mode in which this question was submitted. I remarked on the word "ratified," that it did not mean the whole constitution should be ratified and fixed and determined, but that the people were to fix, settle, and determine that which had not been fixed, settled, and determined, to wit; whether there should be a clause sanctioning slavery in the constitution or not. The last section is as follows:

"Sec. 16. This constitution shall take effect and be in force from and after its ratification by the people, as hereinbefore provided."

Its ratification means settling and determining, as before remarked; but it is to take effect "as hereinbefore provided." It is provided that it shall not take effect until Kansas has been admitted by Congress as one of the sovereign States of the Union. The people of Kansas have never proposed, and do not propose, in this constitution to erect a government in opposition to Federal authority. They have been pursuing Federal authority from the inception of their movements down to the present period of time. It met the sanction of the local government; it met the sanction of the executive power, and they have thus been acting in conformity with the Federal Government. When thus finished, it says it shall not go into operation until admitted as a sovereign State. Do they propose to elect Governors and judges, who are to be sworn into office and administer the government in opposition to the Federal Government? Do they assume the sovereignty of the Territory embraced within their boundaries? Nothing like that, whatever. We must not stop on a simple phrase or a single sentence, but take the whole scope of it together, and give it a fair construction; not the construction of a critic who is hunting for something to which to find objection, but a fair, reasonable construction; and that construction is in strict conformity with what I have before stated it to be.

When the Senator says he wants a constitution that will reflect the will of the people, I respond to him as heartily, and say I want no other kind of constitution. I must say, however, that when his bill says to the people of the Territory they may fix this constitution in their own way, and they have seen proper to take a way he did not approve, he has no power to supervise them; unless, indeed, he is prepared to trample under foot the very principles asserted in that bill.

I have also asserted, and again repeat, that the people can act as effectually, and completely, through delegates representing them in convention, as in any other way. Who in this Government would rise and say that the presumption is, not that the laws passed by Congress are approved by the States and the people? Who would rise and say the presumption is that the laws of the State Legislatures afford no intentment that they emanate from the people? It is subversive of the whole representative principle; it strikes at the foundation of republican government in this great Confederacy. Even if another way be preferred and be believed to be most in accordance with what Democracy requires, still it is for the Territory and not for the Federal Government to decide.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Missouri will not find an enabling act in the treaty with France. True, the treaty provides that the inhabitants of the territory ceded by France to the United States shall be admitted into the Union as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution—not when there shall be sixty thousand inhabitants, not when there shall be any particular number of inhabitants, but as soon as may be consistent with the principles of the Federal Constitution. Nor does it provide with what boundaries they should be admitted. We admitted the inhabitants of Louisiana, then those of Missouri, then those of Arkansas, then those of Iowa, until we had thus admitted all the inhabitants there were in the country acquired from France. There was waste country still left, but there was no time fixed by the treaty, no data laid down by which it could be determined when or how they should be admitted into the Union. Thus it has been reserved to Congress to determine when they may have the requisite population. It is for Congress to determine what shall be the boundaries. It is not for the people of a Territory to say authoritatively what boundaries they shall take. On the contrary, Congress has always reserved and insisted on the right of establishing the boundaries, and such is undoubtedly the case in the Kansas-Nebraska act.

Congress never intended that Kansas should necessarily have a right to come into the Union with her present boundaries; for the organic act expressly reserves to Congress the right to alter and divide the Territory, and attach parts of it to other Territories. In the enabling act which the Senate passed last year, we cut off about one third of the present Territory of Kansas, and provided for the admission of the remainder as a State. We never contemplated bringing her into the Union with the boundaries fixed by the organic act, and by the Lecompton constitution. Will it be contended that the Kansas-Nebraska bill contemplated bringing the whole of Nebraska into the Union as one State? Does that act authorize the people of Nebraska to form a constitution when they please, and to come into the Union with a territory eight times as large as New York? Certainly it was never the intention of that organic act to confer on the people of a Territory the authority of saying that they will come in when they please, with as few or as many inhabitants as they please, with such boundaries as they choose, absorbing the whole waste country of the United States, and making an empire instead of a State.

The meaning of the Kansas-Nebraska act was, that when the time should come for them to form a State government, they should be admitted into the Union with or without slavery, as their constitution might prescribe, and that they should be left perfectly free to decide on their local and domestic institutions for themselves; but there was no pledge, no authority given to them to form a State with the extended limits included within the Territory, nor to form a State at all until Congress should determine that they were authorized to form a State. It was for the very reason that the Kansas-Nebraska act did not contain an enabling provision that President Pierce, in his message at the first session of the last Congress, recommended to Congress to pass an enabling act authorizing the people of Kansas to form a constitution when they should have the requisite population. The President said:

"This, it seems to me, can be best accomplished by providing that, when the inhabitants of Kansas may desire it, and shall be of sufficient number to constitute a State, a convention of delegates, duly elected by the qualified voters, shall assemble to frame a constitution, and thus prepare, through regular and lawful means, for its admission into the Union as a State. I respectfully recommend the enactment of a law to that effect."

This message proves that, in the estimation of President Pierce and his administration, in the beginning of 1856, the time had not then arrived for the admission of Kansas, because she had not the requisite population, and also that an enabling act was necessary to give her authority to proceed to form a constitution and State government. Now, sir, let us see how the Committee on Territories of the Senate that year understood it. Here is the response of the committee to the President's message:

"In compliance with the first recommendation, your committee ask leave to report a bill authorizing the Legislature of the Territory to provide by law for the election of delegates by the people, and the assembling of a convention to form a constitution and State government preparatory to their admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, so soon as it shall appear, by a census to be taken under the direction of the Governor, by the authority of the Legislature, that the Territory contains ninety-three thousand four hundred and twenty inhabitants—that being the number required by the present ratio of representation for a member of Congress."

Thus, the Committee on Territories in 1856 responded to the recommendation of President Pierce, and the Senate responded to the report by passing through the body a bill authorizing the people of Kansas to form a constitution and State government. This shows that I am not the only man who construes the Nebraska bill to mean that an enabling act is necessary before the right of admission into the Union becomes complete. I show you that the President of the United States, who approved the bill, the President who made it an administration measure, so understood it at the time, and so declared in his message. I show you that the Committee on Territories which drafted the Nebraska bill, so understood it at that time. I show you that the same Senate which passed the Nebraska bill by the votes of the identical Senators who passed that bill, thus construed it at the time.

It is too late now to say that neither the President who signed the Nebraska bill, nor the committee who reported it, nor the Democratic Senate who passed it, understood it. The evidence can be accumulated mountain high, that it was the true intent and meaning of the act, as we expounded it at the time, that the people should be left free to form their institutions in their own way up to the last moment of admission—not slavery only, but all local and domestic institutions in contradistinction to Federal or national institutions. They have as much right to vote on the banking system, the judiciary system, the taxation system, the school system, as they have to vote on the slavery question.

The Senator tells us that the Nebraska bill meant only the slavery question, because we here felt no interest in anything else. It may be that the people of Missouri felt no interest in anything else. It may be that the people of Illinois felt no special interest about the banking system or school system of Kansas. It may be that the people of Virginia did not care what sort of a taxing system Kansas might have; but does it follow that the people of Kansas did not care? The people of Kansas had an interest in the taxation system, in the school system, in the banking system, in the judiciary system, in the elective franchise. These local and domestic institutions were everything to them. We did not care about them. Why? Because they were none of our business.

The Senator says that I ought not to refer to these questions, because I have no right to a voice in them. True, I have no right to a voice in their local institutions, but the people of Kansas have; and it is my duty to see that they have a free and untrammelled expression of that voice upon all their institutions. I deny that you have a republican constitution unless that is done. A constitution forced on a people against their will is not a republican constitution within the spirit of our institutions. It is no argument to say that this constitution is an excellent one. You have no right to cram a good thing down the throats of the people of Kansas against their will. It strikes at the fundamental principles of liberty. This question between us is radical. It is whether that people shall be permitted to form their own constitution, and whether the constitution under which they are to live shall embody their will or not. It is not a matter of form whether the constitution shall be submitted to them. That is but one mode of obtaining the evidence of the fact of their will. The President says it is the best mode, and I agree with him, the principle being that their will is the great essential sine qua non before you can bring them into the Union as a State.

Then, Mr. President, the simple question comes back, shall that people have the authority to form and regulate their institutions to suit themselves? The Senator says we may admit them if we see proper, and ought to do so, in order to terminate the controversy. Sir, I will do anything that is right, anything that is just, in order to terminate this controversy. No man living is so anxious for its termination as I am. I will sacrifice everything but principle and honor, and my country, in order to close this controversy. But how are you to close it? You must close it on principles of eternal justice and truth, or it will not stay closed. You must terminate it on the principle of self-government, or the constitution under which the people are to live is not republican. No patching up, no system of trickery by which the majority are cheated by the minority, will settle this question. Instead of producing peace, that will only be the beginning of undue controversy. When the broad fact stands admitted before the world that this constitution is the act of a minority, and not of the majority, the injustice becomes the more manifest and the more monstrous. The only reason for not submitting the constitution fairly is, that it would be voted down if it were submitted. This is an admission that it is the act of a minority, not of a majority. Do you expect that you will restore peace and quiet to the country by forcing upon a people a constitution which does not embody their will? I tell you that you will have to avail yourselves of the recommendations of the message to increase the Army, and to use the military power of this country if the majority is to be subjected to the oppression of a minority. I trust there will be no outbreak, no violence. I will use every influence, by counsel and exertion, to insure submission; but I fear the result if you shall use power to coerce a majority of four fifths into subjection to a minority of one fifth.

But, sir, we are told that they ought to submit, because they can easily get rid of this constitution. The President says they may change it immediately after their admission. Ah! how is that? The constitution formed at Lecompton, provides that it may be changed after the year 1864, by a convention called by two thirds of the Legislature. I hold it to be a principle of law, that when a constitution provides for its own change at a particular time and in a particular manner, that excludes all other times and all other modes. I undertake to say that any court in Christendom would thus construe this constitution. When it says that it may be amended at one time, it excludes all other times. When it says it may be amended in one mode, it excludes all other modes. Will you tell me that the Constitution of the United States can be changed by a town meeting, or a mass meeting, or in any other mode than that pointed out in the instrument itself? No, sir! There is no constitutional mode by which this constitution of Kansas, if once in force, can be changed before 1864. There is another mode—a revolutionary mode. It is by the Legislature first coming together, taking an oath to support the constitution, and then proceed to call a convention to change it, in violation of the constitution and of the oath. Suppose they should do this, and the convention thus called should make a constitution and establish a new government, and the old government should refuse to surrender the possession, who would be Governor—the one elected under the old constitution or the new? You would have two governments in operation at the same time, one under the old and the other under the new constitution, and you would call on the Army to decide between them.

The scheme is a scheme of civil war. It leads directly to war. If I ever voted for it, I should expect to vote also for an increase of the Army, and for supplies to the Army, to enforce it at the point of the bayonet. It means violence, or it means the subjection of the majority to the minority. I beseech Senators to pause before they commit themselves to so fatal a step. I beseech all to pause and see whether this is right or wrong, for on this matter we are free from party ties. The Senator from Missouri and myself agree that the President has not made it an Administration measure. We agree that he has not recommended it in his message. We agree, therefore, that every man on this floor is at liberty to go for or against it without changing his party ties or affecting his party relations. Why, then, can we not stop and pause before we rush on to a step that not only rends asunder the Democratic party, but threatens the peace and perpetuity of the Union itself.

It will not do to tell me that the President is in favor of it. Sir, I believe the President to be a frank, a bold, an honest man. I will not believe that he will make any measure a party one which he does not recommend in his message. I will not believe that he would ask his party to go for a measure to which he would not commit himself on paper. I will not believe that he wishes us to run our necks into the halter of disunion and civil war before he takes the lead and points the way. The absence of a recommendation in the message shows that no man can, consistently with the President's dignity of character, assert that he is in favor of this measure. Then I say, let us restore peace to the country by ignoring the irregular convention at Lecompton, by ignoring that irregular convention at Topeka, by passing an enabling act in proper form, authorizing the people to form a constitution and State government for themselves. Such an act will restore peace to the country in ninety days. In fact, the day you pass it everything will be quiet in Kansas.

The people of Kansas will then see that Congress is going to carry out in good faith the principle of self-government. They will see that Congress is going to allow them to have slavery, if they want it, and to prohibit it if they do not want it. They will see that Congress is going to allow them to make their own constitution and laws in their own way. The moment they discover that impartiality is to prevail, and justice is to be carried out, they will be content; all will be quiet; there will be peace at the North, peace at the South, peace in the Democratic party, peace throughout the whole country. I trust that we shall discuss this question in calmness, in good humor, and in a kind and respectful spirit, as we have discussed it to-day.

Mr. GREEN. I do not propose to notice the exhortation of the honorable Senator. It is only his argument and the points of difference between us that deserve investigation, and to them I shall direct my attention. He mistakes entirely when he assumes that I admitted that the slavery branch of this controversy must, of necessity, under the law, be submitted to the people. I said just the contrary. I said it was a question with the convention of the people of Kansas Territory. They were under no responsibility or obligation, legal or otherwise, to submit any branch of the result of their labors to a subsequent vote of the people at the polls; but I remarked that if they saw proper, if they deemed it a matter of propriety to submit that question, as it had been a matter of controversy, there was more propriety in submitting it as a separate question, for that was the only way to submit it in order to get a fair decision of that question and nothing else. That was my position.

But the Senator says that four fifths of the people there are against the constitution. He assumes this; he has no evidence of it; and I doubt his right to make the charge in the Senate. He says that the only reason why the convention did not submit the constitution to the people, was because they said it would be voted down. Some individual may have said so. I do not believe it myself. I believe that it meets the approbation of a large majority of the people of Kansas Territory. All these charges are only so many pretexts gotten up for ulterior purposes, to keep up that speculation and that fanaticism to which the Senator, with his influence, makes himself an unwilling coadjutor; for I know he does not aim at that.

When he says that no people ought to have a constitution forced down their throats, and that when a majority are not in favor of it, that it is not republican, he utters a truism that nobody denies; and he must not expect to lead me from the real points between us, by any such assertions. If the non-submission of the constitution to the people of Kansas is forcing down their throats a constitution which they do not want, and if it be anti-republican, then Illinois came into the Union anti-republican, with a constitution forced down the throats of her people.

I refer to that for the purpose of proving the fallacy of his argument. It does not follow because the people have not voted on a question forty times that they have not been heard. They voted on it when they elected members to represent them in convention. How often would you have them repeat it? If this constitution was submitted to them now, perhaps they would raise the same objection again, and we should hear the Senator say, "do not force this down the throats of the people of Kansas;" and so it would go on ad infinitum, with no limit. The true policy of this Government has been, as I hold, to adhere to the legal presumptions. The legal presumptions are that the people speak and act on all such questions when they form their convention and shape the constitution; and the people may instruct their convention as they deem best; and even if they violate their instructions, the Senator from Illinois cannot step in between a representative and his constituents. It is still a question between them. We cannot interpose.

I had thought that non-intervention was to be the principle of action on the part of Congress, and that the Senate would not intervene. Will the Senator set himself up as a judge whether Mr. Calhoun, or any other member of the convention, did right or wrong? To his own masters he is responsible, and by their verdict he stands or falls. His constituency constitute the master, and not the Senate of the United States. Why shall we therefore review it? Why shall we call it in question? They have had every submission of the question that a majority of the States of the Union have had, and now to say, that, because they have not had more, it is anti-republican, coercive, forcing it down their throats, is to say that a majority of the States have been thus tyrannically dealt with—one of which States the Senator represents, another I represent, and another, the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] represents, and another of them is the State of Florida.

So I might name more than seventeen out of the thirty-one States which never had a vote on their constitutions before they were admitted into the Union. Are they republican? Yes. Were they submitted to the people? Yes; but the people in those cases spoke through their representatives. Had the people of Kansas the same opportunity to speak through their representatives? Yes. Was the convention in Kansas as legal as it was in Illinois? Yes. Was it as regular—as it was fair? Was the qualification of voters as just and as reasonable? Yes. Wherefore, then, will Congress apply a rule in the one case that was not applied in the other? Wherefore will you assume that one is anti-republican and the other republican? that the one is a coerced measure, forced down the throats of the people, and the other perfectly fair, and just, and popular? No, Mr. President, it is a mere assumption.

More than that, when the gentleman says that the people ought to rule, there is not a Senator in this Chamber who dissents; but it is of no use to dwell on points of perfect agreement. Let us come to the points of difference. Do the people act through the convention, or is it possible that the people can act in no way except by mass meeting? It may be that the people of Kansas did not wish to undergo the expense, and excitement, and danger, and tumult, of an election. Ten thousand considerations may have entered into it, and we have every presumption that the people were as fairly heard and as fairly represented as in any other convention that ever sat in this Federal Union.

Such being the case, I hold that I have more legal evidence that this is the people's work, that this is the people's constitution, than he has to assume that four fifths of the people would vote it down. His is a mere assertion; mine is a legal presumption. Mine is in accordance with the principles of law, with the usage of constitutional representative government; his is the opposite in every particular. Judge ye, then, between us, whether I defend the people, constitutionally, justly, fairly, or whether I seek to trample down the voice of the people. The Governor of Kansas Territory told them "you ought to vote; if you have got the numbers, control it." If they had the numbers, is it not reasonable to suppose they would have voted? Knowing they did not have the numbers, they wanted to keep up a pretext for a revolutionary and insurrectionary measure, and that insurrectionary, rebellious portion of Kansas is to be reckoned as four fifths of the people of that Territory.

More than that, sir, the people of Kansas have this question submitted to them as a matter of propriety, not a matter of necessity, not a matter of compulsion. Kansas can come into the Union as a majority of the States have come in. Kansas has a republican form of government. As to the questions of boundary and of numbers, why bring them up at this late period of the discussion?

On Wednesday last, when I thought the ingenious mind of the Senator had scanned the whole question from the beginning to the end, and had hunted up all the objections he deemed tangible and worthy of consideration, he said not one word as to the boundary of Kansas; he said not one word as to the numbers of Kansas. Wherefore, then, refer to it now? To lead me from the point under consideration? No; but because, I suppose, he wished to name certain matters which Congress might consider if they deemed it proper to consider them. Nobody controverts that. This is not an attempt on the part of the Administration or of its friends to coerce the people. It is, however, an attempt on our part to sustain the will of the people. That will has been fairly and legally expressed. We have all the presumptions in that way, and we have none whatever against it.

But the honorable Senator brings out another objection. True, he does not claim the right to supervise the proceedings of the convention; but he is very fond of naming defects that the people ought to have an opportunity to pass upon; and, amongst others that he names, is the mode of amending the constitution. All I have to say is, that the Senator is mistaken. In all the sovereign, independent States in this Government, the people being organized—the people being political communities—there are two ways for the State to make a change. One is for the State, as a government, to make a change of its form of government. Its government is composed of its officers—a Senate, House of Representatives, Governor, and so on. The constitution generally points out a method by which the government may effect a change in the constitution. There is also an original power of change behind, superior to and overtowering that by which the people may call a convention, and this convention, acting in conformity with the constituted authorities, may be called regularly, as was that of Kansas, and form a constitution and adopt it themselves, or submit it as they please to the people.

Now, let us take the case of Kansas and exemplify. Four fifths of the people, says the Senator, are on his side. In other words, four fifths of them are opposed to the constitution. In the very first Legislature that meets there will be four fifths of the Senate and House, and the whole of the Governor, in favor of a convention. Four fifths of both Houses, and the whole Governor—because we cannot parcel him out—will pass a law calling a convention. They will make just such a constitution as they please, and four fifths of the people will ratify it, if you will have it submitted for a vote; and after that, those four fifths will elect another Governor, another House of Representatives, another Senate, and fill all the offices of State. I do not apprehend any conflict of authority. This thing has been done ten thousand times, to speak by mere way of hyperbole; it has been done an indefinite number of times. The question in the Rhode Island case was entirely different from this. It was there the people acting in opposition to the government. The initiative steps for a change of government were not taken by the government itself, and of that there was complaint. I do not pretend to go into the question whether that was rightful or wrongful. I have about enough points to consider now without lugging in unnecessary ones. I do say, however, that it has never been held, and will not be held by the Senator himself when he reflects on it, that if four fifths of the people of Kansas desire to change their constitution they cannot do it in three months if they please.

Mr. DOUGLAS. By revolution.

Mr. GREEN. A revolution instituted by the government itself, conducted by the government itself, a change effected in such a manner as does not conflict with the government. It was done in the Senator's own State. Was that revolution?

Mr. DOUGLAS. It was done in conformity with the constitution there, not in opposition to it.

Mr. GREEN. There is one part of the constitution of Kansas which is worthy of being considered, for it bears on this subject.

"All political power"—

Say the people of Kansas, speaking through their convention—

"is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their benefit, and therefore they have at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government in such manner as they may think proper."

That is a part of the constitution of Kansas. Surely, therefore, the regular government of Kansas can institute a proceeding which will result in the exercise of those inalienable and indefeasible rights in perfect and entire reformation of the constitution. There is no question on this point; there is no difficulty in it. It is a very little thing brought in as a makeweight.

Mr. DOUGLAS. At the desire of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIGLER,] I renew the motion to postpone the further consideration of this question until Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. JONES, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 16, 1857.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m., in the new Hall of Representatives in the south wing of the Capitol extension.

Rev. ANDREW G. CAROTHERS, pastor of the Assembly's Church of Washington City, offered up the following prayer:

Glorious and Eternal Jehovah! The Supreme Governor of the Universe, we bow before thy throne. We most humbly beseech thee to regard with thy favor all who are in authority, the President and the Vice President of the United States, the Senators and Representatives in Congress assembled, the Presiding Officer of this House, and all who are intrusted with executive, legislative, and judicial responsibilities. May this Hall, now dedicated by thy servants, the Representatives of the people, as the place wherein the political and constitutional rights of our countrymen shall ever be maintained and defended, be a temple of honor and glory to this land. Let the deliberations and decisions of this Congress advance the best interests of our Government, and make our nation the praise of the whole earth, for Christ's sake. The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God and the communion of the Holy Spirit be with you all. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REFERENCE OF A BILL.

The SPEAKER stated that the business first in order was the reference of the bill introduced by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] donating public land to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts. The amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] to refer said bill to the Committee on Public Lands was agreed to yesterday, and the question now recurred on the motion to refer as amended.

The motion as amended was agreed to; and the bill was accordingly referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the accounts of the Treasurer of the United States for the third and fourth quarters of 1856, and the first and second quarters of 1857; which were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a report from the Comptroller of the Treasury, showing the balances which were due for more than three years prior to the 1st of July last upon the books of the Second, Third, Fourth, and Fifth Auditors of the Treasury; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

CHAPLAINS TO CONGRESS.

The SPEAKER, also by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following communications from the clergy of the District of Columbia:

WASHINGTON, December 15, 1857.

SIR: The paper herewith inclosed contains a list of the names of clergymen present at a meeting called to-day, to consider the resolutions passed by the Senate and House of Representatives regarding the chaplaincy. In pursuance of a resolution passed at that meeting, other names may be reported to the undersigned to be added to this list.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, your obedient servant,
GEORGE W. SAMSON.

To the Hon. the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

WASHINGTON, December 15, 1857.

The undersigned, clergymen of the District of Columbia, in response to the resolutions recently passed by the House, inviting them to open with prayer the daily sessions of the House of Representatives, hereby respectfully tender their services for that purpose.

The SPEAKER then stated that resolutions were in order from the State of Vermont.

NEBRASKA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. QUITMAN. On yesterday an order was made for the printing of some documents relating to the contested election from Nebraska. I now ask leave to have referred to the Committee of Elections, and printed, together with the accompanying documents, the memorial of Bird B. Chapman, contesting the seat of FENNER FERGUSON, the sitting Delegate from the Territory of Nebraska.

There being no objection, the papers were referred to the Committee of Elections, and ordered to be printed.

DRAWING FOR SEATS.

Mr. CLEMENS obtained the floor.

Mr. WARREN. I rise to what I believe to be a privileged question. The House having moved into the new Hall, it strikes me that the first thing that ought to be attended to is the passage of a resolution similar to the one adopted in the old Hall, providing for the drawing for seats.

Mr. CLEMENS. I have obtained the floor for that purpose. I offer the following resolution, and demand the previous question upon it:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House immediately after the passage of this resolution, place in a box, the name of each Member and Delegate of the House of Representatives, written on a separate slip of paper; that he then proceed, in the presence of the House, to draw from said box, one at a time, the said slips of paper, and as each is drawn he shall announce the name of the Member or Delegate upon it, who shall choose his seat for the present session: Provided, That before said drawing shall commence, the Speaker shall cause every seat to be vacated and shall see that every seat continues vacant until it is selected under this order; and that every seat after having been selected shall be deemed to be vacant, if left unoccupied before the calling of the roll is finished.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I ask my colleague to allow me to offer an amendment. We have nowhere to retire to.

Mr. CLEMENS. I withdraw the demand for the previous question, for the purpose of hearing what the amendment is.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withdraw the demand for the previous question?

Mr. CLEMENS. I will hear the amendment read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the amendment will be read.

Mr. BURNETT. I object to the gentleman withdrawing the previous question to hear an amendment. I desire that it shall be withdrawn entirely, so that we may all offer amendments.

Mr. RUFFIN. I feel it to be my duty to object to the reading of the amendment. The usual resolution has been offered, and I think it is quite sufficient.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I ask my colleague to withdraw the call for the previous question. I will renew it.

Mr. CLEMENS. I am disposed to extend every courtesy to my colleague, but I must insist on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. My amendment is really an improvement.

Mr. CLEMENS. I must insist on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. We are in a new Hall, and although I have no right to make any remarks—

[Loud cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order, and the Chair is required on the right, and on the left, to enforce order. The gentleman cannot debate the question so long as the previous question is pending.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I rise for information. If there be a second, what will then be the condition of the question?

The SPEAKER. If the main question be ordered, the question will be on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Well, sir, can I call the yeas and nays upon the second?

The SPEAKER. Not upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would inquire if the resolution is before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is, properly, before the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then I move to lay it upon the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, demanded the yeas and nays on agreeing to the resolution.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CLEMENS moved that the vote by which the resolution was adopted be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The House then proceeded to execute the order of the resolution. The members retired from their seats to the open spaces in the Hall, and the names of all being placed in a box, they were drawn singly by a page, and the members, as their names were thus drawn, selected their seats.

PRIVILEGES OF CHAPLAINS.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to submit the following joint resolution, to which, I presume, there will be no objection:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, That the clergymen of the city of Washington who may officiate as Chaplains to the Senate and House of Representatives, shall be admitted to the library of Congress, with the same privileges that are allowed to the members of the two Houses.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time. It was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. SEWARD. Is the resolution amendable?

The SPEAKER. No, sir; the House has ordered the resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. SEWARD. I wanted to have the resolution amended so as to extend the same privilege to all the ministers of the United States.

The joint resolution being engrossed, was read the third time.

Mr. BURNETT. I want, if it be in order, to move to refer this resolution to the Committee on the Library.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order at this stage of the proceedings. It might have been in order before the resolution was ordered to be engrossed.

The question was taken; and the joint resolution was adopted.

Mr. CAMPBELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was adopted, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REGULAR ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a joint resolution.

Mr. LETCHER. I object, and call for the regular order of business. Let us take things in order, and we will get along faster.

REPORT OF BILLS AND ESTIMATES.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending 30th June, 1859; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES also asked and obtained the unanimous consent of the House to have the estimates and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury taken from the table and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

ADDITIONAL PAGES.

Mr. SAVAGE asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution for the appointment of additional pages.

Objection was made.

CONTESTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. I rise to a question of privilege. I have been requested by Mr. Henry P. Brooks, of the city of Baltimore, to present to this House a memorial, contesting the right to a seat of the Hon. HENRY WINTER DAVIS, from the fourth district of the State of Maryland. I have thought proper to apprise my colleague [Mr. DAVIS] of my intention to avail myself of the first opportunity, this morning, to present the memorial. I take the occasion, further, to state that Mr. Brooks charges that there was not a fair opportunity at Baltimore to exercise the right of suffrage. Whenever any of these contested-election cases come up I shall be prepared judicially to take such action as the merits of the case may deserve, without regard at all to the political affinities or sentiments of those who may be involved. I ask that the memorial may be referred to the Committee of Elections, and be printed.

It was so ordered.

Mr. BOWIE. I rise for a similar purpose. I rise for the purpose of presenting the petition of William Pinckney Whyte to vacate the seat of J. MORRISON HARRIS, and to ask that it may be referred to the Committee of Elections, and ordered to be printed.

It was so ordered.

PRINTING OF THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the resolution in reference to printing an extra number of copies of the President's message and accompanying documents, presented the following report:

The Joint Committee on Printing on the part of the House, to which it was referred to inquire into the expediency of printing twenty thousand extra copies of the President's message and accompanying documents, report: first, that the number proposed is in accordance with the usage of the House in printing the said document. Your committee therefore report the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the members of the House of Representatives, twenty thousand extra copies of the President's annual message and accompanying documents.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to withdraw the call for the previous question, that I may have the privilege of addressing the House for a few moments on this matter of the President's message.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. Very well; if it be only for a moment I have no objection.

Mr. COX. I do not wish, on the present occasion, to detain the House with regard to the general business of the country; but there are some matters connected with the President's message about which I would like to say a few words on the motion which is before the House.

Mr. BOCOCK. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman has no right to go into a general discussion upon the motion which has been submitted by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order for the gentleman to discuss the President's message.

Mr. COX. I think I can bring my remarks within the rule of order.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Do I understand the Chair to decide that a motion to print is not debatable?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion, upon further consideration, that the motion opens up the whole question to debate.

Mr. COX. Then I wish to say that, while I concur most heartily in the message of the President in almost every particular—

Mr. HUGHES. I rise to a question of order.

I shall, for one, object to this general farming out of the floor in this House by the withdrawal of the demand for the previous question, upon condition that it shall be renewed by the member for whose benefit it is withdrawn. But if the practice is to be kept up, if such bargains are to be tolerated, then I insist that the contract shall be strictly executed. Now, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] appealed to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Smith] to withdraw the demand for the previous question. The gentleman from Tennessee, if I understood him correctly, consented to do so on the condition that the gentleman from Ohio should renew the demand after occupying the floor for a moment. Now, if that is the contract between the two parties, and the House intend to tolerate such contracts, my point of order is, that these contracts shall be strictly executed; and that, under the contract entered into by the gentleman from Ohio, he shall not be permitted to enter into a general discussion upon the merits of the President's message.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can recognize no contracts between members of the House in respect to the occupation of the floor.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I need not say how heartily I concur with the message of the President, in almost every regard. Upon the questions of finance he shows a far-sighted economy, which will find its ready approbation in the judgment of the country. In relation to that "twin relic of barbarism"—Utah—he deals with its enormities in such a way as to give earnest of a policy which will assert the supremacy of decency and civilization, while the supreme power of the Republic will be vindicated. In our foreign affairs, in which his tact and statesmanship have been so conspicuously exercised at home and abroad, he may still be proclaimed the great pacificator. That policy of peace under which our nation has thriven beyond all the marvels of time, is still uppermost in his desires.

Mr. QUITMAN. I call the gentleman to order. My point of order is, that the gentleman cannot discuss the merits of the message on a motion to print.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the motion to print opens the merits of the President's message.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would suggest another point of order. This is not a motion to print the message. The House has heretofore made the order to print. This is merely a question to print extra copies. It is true that a simple motion to print opens up the merits of the document itself, but a motion to print extra copies of a message which has already been ordered to be printed, does not open to debate the merits of the message itself. The message is not before the House. It has been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and is not in the possession of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the question of order made by the gentleman from Tennessee. The Chair is of opinion that the motion to print extra copies opens the whole message for debate. The House may be governed by the sentiments which the message contains in the number of copies, whether larger or smaller, which it may order to be printed. Debate is in order.

Mr. COX. So dear to his heart is the peace of the country that the President is ready to make great sacrifices to preserve it, not alone abroad, but in our home relations—not alone between the States, but between the people of the States and between the pioneers upon our borders. Herein is to be found the solution of that part of his message with reference to Kansas.

While the President lays down his general principle of submitting the whole constitution to the people, he subordinates the question to that of peace. He thinks it right to stand by the principle, but inexpedient to do so in the present aspect of affairs in Kansas.

But in my judgment, there will be no peace from this admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. Expediency is a dangerous doctrine, when in collision with principles. There can be no peace to that people while their rights are jeopardized. Certainly none in that ill-starred Territory, if the attempt to gain partisan ascendancy there be founded in stratagem and fraud. If every question of difference be not honestly submitted to the whole people and decided without restraint or hinderance—no other device can be framed which will insure quiet. If there be treachery, there will be civil war. If there be a Judas, there will be an Aceldama. Kansas will be that field of blood.

But whether there be peace or not, I would not sacrifice the principle involved herein for any peace that can be purchased.

That principle is stated by Mr. Buchanan, in his message, thus:

"Under the earlier practice of the Government, no constitution framed by the convention of a Territory, preparatory to its admission into the Union as a State, had been submitted to the people. I trust, however, the example set by the last Congress, requiring that the constitution of Minnesota should be subject to the approval and ratification of the people of the proposed State, may be followed on future occasions. I took it for granted that the convention of Kansas would act in accordance with this example, founded, as it is, on correct principles; and hence my instructions to Governor Walker, in favor of submitting the constitution to the people, were expressed in general and unqualified terms."

It receives his sanction as a principle, though he cannot now recommend its application, ex post facto, with reference to Kansas. He hopes it may be hereafter adopted universally. I agree with him—and the whole Democracy of the nation agree with him on this last proposition. Because I may insist on its application to Kansas even yet, it does not follow that I am indifferent, much less unfriendly, to the success of his Administration.

True, the President, in his message, has expressed his opinion that the "question has been fairly and explicitly referred to the people whether they will have a constitution with or without slavery." He has instituted an argument in favor of the legality of the Lecompton constitution; while he also expresses his unabated faith in the wisdom of the general principle of submitting the whole constitution. But he takes care to avoid any recommendation to Congress. Our action is unimpeded by party fealty. If it were thus impeded, if the President had recommended a different course, I should not hesitate to say that, as Congress has the exclusive right to admit States, I should pursue the obligations of my sworn duty. The Administration is the trustee of the party, within its own sphere of duty. In this sphere it is entitled to our confidence. It shall receive my whole-hearted support. But as to the question in my own sphere, I may be allowed to represent my people. I am not of the opinion of the old theologians, that a man must be willing to be eternally damned for an imputed sin, before he can be saved. In thus deciding, conscience, honor, pledges, and constituency, all compel me to stand to the Democratic policy—which is the submission of the whole constitution to the whole people.

This Administration was called into being by virtue of this principle.

This Democratic majority is due to the ascendancy of this principle.

You, Mr. Speaker, owe your high place to the fidelity of those who sustained that principle.

That principle has a history, written in an agitation unsurpassed by any bloodless political contest of the world—at least since the repeal of the corn laws in 1846, or the French revolution of 1848. It began in 1850, when the wisest of our statesmen framed the compromises of that year. It had its precedents before that year. But it was not based on precedents. It was above all precedents, settlements, or compromises. With its virtue, the Kansas and Nebraska act was inspired. That act struck down the Missouri restriction; which was as odious to the South as it was antagonistic to the Constitution. Minnesota has since received an enabling act upon this same principle. It was framed by the same Senator who framed the act of Kansas and Nebraska; and whose authority, next to the act itself, is more binding as to its true intent and meaning than that of any other man in the land.

When the unreasoning crusade was made against it in 1854—when it was denounced as a swindle by those who seem now so anxious for its establishment—when its author was made the synonym for traitor in the Republican lexicon—then it was that the Democratic party pledged themselves to abide by the decision of the people as to all their domestic institutions when they sought to become States.

This is the right line of policy, for it is the right line of principle. "As in geometry, so in government—the shortest, easiest, and best way from point to point is the right line."

I mean, in this argument, to pursue that line. Any policy that does not stand squarely to it comes in "such a questionable shape that I will speak to it."

In pursuance of that line, I claim the right now to place myself and my constituency unequivocally in the position of protestants against any doctrine which would seem to approve of the conduct of the constitutional convention in Kansas.

I do not propose now to argue at length. I propose now only to nail against the door, at the threshold of this Congress, my theses. When the proper time comes, I will defend them, whether from the assaults of political friend or foe. I would fain be silent, sir, here and now. But silence, which is said to be as "harmless as a rose's breath," may be as perilous as the pestilence. This peril comes from the attempt to forego the capital principle of Democratic policy, which I think has been done by the constitutional convention of Kansas.

I maintain:

1. That the highest refinement and greatest utility of Democratic policy—the genius of our institutions—is the right of self-government.
2. That this self-government meant the will of the majority, legally—if you please, legally expressed.
3. That this self-government and majority rule were sacredly guaranteed in the organic act of Kansas.
4. That it was guaranteed upon the question of slavery in terms; and generally with respect to all the domestic institutions of the people.
5. That domestic institutions meant all which are "local, not national—State, not Federal." It means that and that only—that always.
6. That the people were to be left perfectly free to establish or abolish slavery, as well as to form and regulate their other institutions.
7. That the doctrine was recognized in every part of the Confederacy by the Democracy; fixed in their national platform; asserted by their speakers and presses; reiterated by their candidates; incorporated in messages and instructions; and formed the feature which distinguished the Democracy from its opponents, who maintained the doctrine of congressional intervention.

The proof of this seventh proposition is everywhere of record.

1. Cincinnati platform.

At the Democratic National Convention, held in June, 1856, when Mr. Buchanan was nominated for the Presidency, the following solemn declaration was unanimously made:

"Resolved, That we recognize the right of the people of all the Territories, including Kansas and Nebraska, acting through the fairly expressed (not implied) will of the majority of actual residents, and whenever the number of their inhabitants justifies it, to form a constitution, with or without domestic slavery, and be admitted into the Union upon terms of perfect equality with the other States."

2. The President's inaugural.

Mr. Buchanan, in accepting the nomination, unequivocally pledged himself to a faithful execution of the act of Congress of 1854, and to be guided in his administration by the resolve of the Cincinnati Convention. In his inaugural address he referred to this matter, and thus expressed himself:

"What a conception, then, was it for Congress to apply this simple rule—that the will of the majority shall govern—to the settlement of the question of domestic slavery in the Territories!"

And in the same address, the President, after referring to the question of the time of admission of a State as unimportant, uses this emphatic language:

"This is, happily, a matter of but little practical importance. Besides, it is a judicial question which legitimately belongs to the Supreme Court of the United States, before whom it is now pending, and will, it is understood, be speedily and finally settled. To their decision, in common with all good citizens, I shall cheerfully submit, whatever this may be, though it has ever been my individual opinion that, under the Nebraska-Kansas act, the appropriate period will be when the number of actual residents in the Territory shall justify the formation of a constitution with a view to its admission as a State into the Union. But be this as it may, it is the imperative and indispensable duty of the Government of the United States to secure to every resident inhabitant the free and independent expression of his opinion by his vote. This sacred right of each individual must be preserved!"

3. Governor Walker's acceptance and address.

Mr. Buchanan, shortly after coming into power, found Kansas without a Governor; he took time to select a good man for the post. He tendered it to Hon. Robert J. Walker, who declined it. He again and again tendered the office to the same gentleman, who at last, on the 30th March, after frequent conversations with the President, accepted the post. In accepting the office, he did so after thus addressing the President in writing:

"I understand that you and your Cabinet cordially concur in the opinion expressed by me, that the actual bona fide residents of the Territory of Kansas, by a fair and regular vote, unaffected by fraud or violence, must be permitted, in adopting their State constitution, to decide for themselves what shall be their social institutions. This is the great fundamental principle of the act of Congress organizing that Territory, affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and is in accordance with the views uniformly expressed by me throughout my public career. I contemplate a peaceful solution of this question by an appeal to the intelligence and patriotism of the people of Kansas, who should all participate freely and fully in this decision, and by a majority of whose votes the decision must be made, as the only and constitutional mode of adjustment.

"I will go, then, and endeavor to adjust these difficulties, in the full confidence, as strongly expressed by you, that I will be sustained by all your own high authority, with the cordial cooperation of all your Cabinet."

Was there any complaint when Governor Walker thus accepted this post of trouble and responsibility? Who thought the conditions of his acceptance illegal, or in violation of usage or principle? Was the President's action hailed with denunciations, or with acclamation?

Meanwhile, the President addressed the clergy of Connecticut to the same purport.

4. Mr. Buchanan's to the clergy.

In Mr. Buchanan's letter to the Connecticut clergymen he thus defines his motives, and justifies his action in sending troops to Kansas:

"The convention will soon assemble to perform the solemn duty of framing a constitution for themselves and their posterity; and, in the state of incipient rebellion which still exists in Kansas, it is my imperative duty to employ the troops of the United States, should this become necessary in defending the convention against violence while framing the constitution, and in protecting the 'bona fide inhabitants,' qualified to vote under the provisions of this instrument, in the free exercise of the right of suffrage, when it shall be submitted to them for approbation or rejection."

Still, anxious and fearful, the President sent after the Governor written instructions, which leave no doubt as to his integrity and determination to make good his inaugural, his instructions given personally, and his letter to the clergy. Here is the most pointed part of those instructions.

5. Instructions to Governor Walker:

"The institutions of Kansas should be established by the votes of the people of Kansas, unawed and uninterrupted by force and fraud.

"The regular Legislature of the Territory having authorized the assembling of a convention to frame a constitution, to be accepted or rejected by Congress, under the provisions of the Federal Constitution, the people of Kansas have the right to be protected in the peaceful election of delegates for such a purpose, under such authority; and the convention itself has a right to similar protection in the opportunity for tranquil and undisturbed deliberations. When such a constitution shall be submitted to the people of the Territory, they must be protected in the exercise of their right to vote for or against the instrument, and the fair expression of the popular will must not be interrupted by fraud or violence."

This was what the country, including the people of Kansas, had a right to expect. But, as if to put it beyond all doubt, Governor Walker gave to those most nearly interested—the people of Kansas—his renewed assurance of the mode in which their constitution should be adopted.

6. Governor Walker's inaugural.

How did Governor Walker and the country understand these expressions of the President and the official act of the Administration? Governor Walker, upon his arrival in the Territory, in his inaugural address, thus expressed his views and the views of those who sent him there. The language is absolutely prophetic. He said:

"Is it not infinitely better that slavery should be abolished or established in Kansas, rather than that we should become slaves, and not be permitted to govern ourselves? Is the absence or existence of slavery in Kansas paramount to the great question of State sovereignty, self-government, and of the Union?"

"If patriotism, if devotion to the Constitution, and love of the Union, should not induce the minority to yield to the majority on this question, let them reflect that, in no event, can the minority successfully determine the question permanently; and in no contingency will Congress admit Kansas as a slave or as a free State, unless a majority of the people of Kansas shall first have fairly and freely decided the question for themselves by a direct vote on the adoption of the constitution, excluding all fraud or violence."

"The minority, in resisting the will of the majority, may involve Kansas again in civil war; they may bring upon her reproach and obloquy, and destroy her progress and prosperity: they may keep her for years out of the Union, and, in the whirlwind of agitation, sweep away the Government itself; but Kansas never can be brought into the Union, with or without slavery, except by a previous solemn decision, fully, freely, and fairly made by a majority of her people, in voting for or against the adoption of the State constitution."

Now, it must not be forgotten that, under these repeated assurances—indorsed by the press of this city, of Virginia, of the North, the West, and the East—the constitutional convention was called into being in February. In June, delegates were voted for. The leading spirits in that convention were the delegates from Douglas county, led by Calhoun, whose tactics and chicanery seem to give character to the proceedings. These delegates were questioned by the Democracy as to this policy. They gave this reply:

7. Calhoun's pledges.

"To the Democratic voters of Douglas County:

"It having been stated by that Abolition newspaper, the Herald of Freedom, and by some disaffected bogus Democrats, who have got up an independent ticket, for the purpose of securing the vote of the Black Republicans, that the regular nominees of the Democratic convention were opposed to submitting the constitution to the people, we, the candidates of the Democratic party, submit the following resolutions, which were adopted by the Democratic convention which placed us in nomination, and which we fully and heartily indorse as a complete refutation of the slanders above referred to.

JOHN CALHOUN,	A. W. JONES,
W. S. WELLS,	H. BUTCHER,
L. S. BOLING,	JOHN M. WALLACE,
WM. T. SPICELY,	L. A. PRATHER,

"LECOMPTON, KANSAS TERRITORY, June 13, 1857."

"Resolved, That we will support no man as a delegate to the constitutional convention, whose duties it will be to frame the constitution of the future State of Kansas and to mold the political institutions under which we, as a people, are to live, unless he pledges himself fully, freely, and without reservation, to use every honorable means to submit the same to every bona fide actual citizen of Kansas, at the proper time for the vote being taken upon the adoption by the people, in order that the said constitution may be adopted or rejected by the actual settlers in this Territory, as the majority of the voters shall decide."

Now it must not be forgotten again, that, by this time, the slavery question was virtually settled in Kansas. The remaining question was that of self-government. It was white, not black Republicanism. It was the complete subjugation of all interests to the popular will.

What, then, can equal in treachery the conduct of these Catlines of Kansas, who, under all these obligations of principle and honor, attempt to subjugate the popular will to theirs? Were these delegates angels, that they should intervene to despoil the people of their expected boon of free expression as to the institutions under whose protection their homes, their lands, their children, were to be panopied? Better, far better, than this, the intervention of this distant Congress, than that of the traitors within the very citadel of their rights!

Having thus shown the pledges of the Democracy to the people of Kansas, I affirm—

8. That to be found recreant to them now, when the practical test is upon us, would be a gross breach of faith, and a disgraceful desertion of duty, for which there is no escape from public condemnation.

9. That the approval of the Lecompton constitution, however the result of the election of the 21st of December next may eventuate, whether there be a slave State or a free State, involves this breach of faith and desertion of duty; because,

First. That constitution, while it is asserted that it is submitted to the people in the essential point, thus recognizing an obligation to submit it in some mode, cannot, in any event, be rejected by the people of Kansas. The vote must be for its approval, whether the voter votes one way or another. The people may be unwilling to take either of the propositions, and yet must vote one or the other of them. They have to vote "constitution with slavery," or "constitution without slavery;" but the constitution they must take. They have no business with the constitution; slavery they may dabble in. With that they are graciously permitted to meddle. But as for their organic law, "hands off, ye plebeians; your touch is unholy!" They come to exercise their will at the polls. They find a clenched fist on either hand. No open palm, unless first they give up their franchise as to the constitution. Then, oh! then, they may be permitted to vote on one subject only. Is there a Democrat here who would stand that? If there is, he ought to go west and learn a little of the character of these independent men of the border.

A scheme like this, to submit a part of the constitution, while it pretends to submit all, is a device so thin as to have no upper nor under side. It is so transparent that its statement is its badge of fraud. It is an attempt to carry out a salutary principle, in part, which was established in its entirety. It is worse. It compels the voter to swear to support a constitution before he can vote to kill it; and then he is not allowed to strangle it. It is an attempt, by a pretended submission in part, to carry the idea of a total submission; and thus force an unsubmitted constitution on an unwilling people.

If that convention could legally submit one question, and withhold all others, they can reserve that one question, or all! The submission of one clause, be it slavery or banks, judiciary or taxation, liquor or legislature, is an argument against the reservation of any other; and of course, against all others. This juggle will not do. It is too nice to be honest.

Again: take this slavery question, and observe how the mystagogue and demagogue have combined to cheat the people. The constitution has a slavery article, (VII.) It recognizes in its first section the right of property in slaves and their increase. In the second section, it permits emancipation by the Legislature on payment to the owners of "a full equivalent in money for the slaves so emancipated." The emancipation and slavery clause are bound together in the same article.

Now turn to the schedule! Suppose the constitution with slavery is voted; then slavery and emancipation remain as in the seventh article. But suppose "constitution with no slavery" is carried: what then? The seventh article shall be stricken out; slavery and emancipation go out together; but the right of property in slaves now in the territory shall not be interfered with! In other words, if Kansas be made a slave State, slaves can be introduced from abroad; and as fast as they come, the Legislature may emancipate. That is your slave State. If it be a free State, there can be no emancipation of slaves or their increase forever.

Now, will gentlemen tell me which would be the free State, which the slave? This beautiful specimen of a constitution is not unlike certain animalculæ found by naturalists, where the two polypi may be made to change heads; for the head of one may be ingrafted on the body of another by placing the tail of the one in the mouth of the other. The two heterogeneous extremities will readily unite so as to confound all our notions of identity.

How can you expect freemen to vote for such a schedule of chicanery? "Oh! if the free-State men would vote," say the politicians, "how it would release the Democracy from its dangerous dilemma." For my part, I will never beggar Republicans to sustain the standing and character of the party to which I am devoted. Follow the right line, and that party need not coax or wheedle to sustain its dignity and supremacy.

Second: There is not, a priori, by the election of delegates, a legal approval of the constitution. Although there were fifteen counties entitled to vote for delegates, for which there was no census or registry, which could not participate in the election, as Governor Walker proclaimed on September 16, 1857, yet it does not follow that the constitutional convention was an unlawful assemblage; nor does it follow, if it were lawful, that their constitution is to be valid, without the popular suffrage in its favor.

This the people had here expressly reserved to them in the organic act—the confirming or dispensing power. The Territorial Legislature could not affect that organic act. The sovereignty in this case never departed from the people. It was not lodged in the convention. It was clearly understood, and universally expected, that it would be exercised by the people. The President expected it. He regrets the failure to submit it. Any attempt to abridge or take away this popular sovereignty is a fraud of so hideous a character, that language has no term of reproach, nor the mind any idea of detestation, adequate to express or conceive its iniquity.

If that sovereignty was lodged in the convention, who lodged it there? 1st. Did Congress? No; for the act does not provide for the calling of a convention, or the formation of a constitution. There has been no legislation by Congress on the subject.

On the contrary, Congress, by rejecting Mr. Toombs's bill, refused thus to initiate such proceedings.

2d. Did the Territorial Legislature? If Congress could not do it, it could not. It was the creature of Congress—of the organic act. It could not do what the organic act, under which it lived, did not authorize. The creature could not do what the creator refused to permit to be done. What authority had this convention? If it had none from Congress, could it be claimed that the Territorial Legislature had an authority from the people to call this convention? Unless that be expressly shown, it will not be implied. If it be not expressly shown, that sovereignty was reserved to the people. The Territorial Legislature derived its powers from the act creating it. Those powers are defined, and but generally defined, in the twenty-fourth section:

"That the legislative power of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation consistent with the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of this act."

In no part of the act is there any express power to call a convention to frame a constitution. Who will say that such a power can be implied? Such a power dissolves the territorial government. Its own death by suicide cannot be within the purview of the Territorial Legislature. If it can compass its own death, it can kill the power of Congress which called it into being.

This is in accordance with right reason. It is in accordance, too, with precedent. I am not one of those who swear in the words of any master. Precedents depend for their force on their intrinsic worth. Precedents serve only to illustrate principles, and to give them a fixed authority. Principles are the result of reason. "Authority is a long bow, the effect of which depends upon the strength of the arm which draws it, and reason is a cross-bow of equal efficacy (if well directed) in the hands of a dwarf or a giant."

Authority and reason unite to declare that no Territorial Legislature has the power to call a constitutional convention. It cannot override the organic law, any more than it can destroy the Constitution of the Union. This is reasonable. It does not depend on the strength of him who utters it; but authority does. We have that authority from statesmen of such conspicuous greatness that no one will question them—Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, and James Buchanan.

Jefferson always spoke of the first constitution of Virginia, adopted in 1776, as wanting the popular sanction. In 1824 he regarded the acquiescence of the people even as no supply for the want of original power from them. Here are his words:

"To our convention no special authority had been delegated by the people to form a permanent constitution, over which their successors in legislation should have no power of alteration. They had been elected for the ordinary purposes of legislation only, and at a time when the establishment of a new government had not been proposed nor contemplated. Although, therefore, they gave to this act the title of a constitution, yet it could be no more than an act of legislation, subject, as their other acts were, to alteration by their successors. It has been said, indeed, that the acquiescence of the people has supplied the want of original power. But it is a dangerous lesson to say to them, 'Whenever your functionaries exercise unlawful authority over you, if you did not go into actual resistance it will be deemed acquiescence and conformation.' Besides, no authority has yet decided whether the resistance must be instantaneous; when the right to resist ceases; or whether it has yet ceased. Of the twenty-four States now organized, twenty-three have disapproved our doctrine and example, and have deemed the formal authority of their people a necessary foundation for their constitution."

In the Arkansas case the question was fairly met by General Jackson's Attorney General, who decided that the Legislature could not act in the formation of a State government. In the Michigan case, Mr. Buchanan held, in 1835, that Legislatures "had no right whatever to pass laws enabling the people to elect delegates to a convention for the purpose of forming a State constitution. It was an act of usurpation on their part."

If Jefferson, Jackson, and Buchanan were right, if reason is right, then where is the authority of this Lecompton convention?

It is said that precedents are found in Michigan and California. Ah! but in those cases there was no doubt as to the popular approbation. Irregularities and formalities may be disregarded when the popular voice gives the substance to the application. But in a case like this of Kansas, form is substance. When the voice of the people is ambiguous, or in doubt, or against the constitution, it is clear Congress should require a popular verdict before it should pass judgment. Even in Wisconsin, where Congress provided for a convention in March, 1847, it sent the constitution back to be submitted to the people. This was wise and constitutional. The people rejected the first constitution, made a second, and were admitted under it in May, 1848.

I need not here refer to the case of Minnesota, where, in the enabling act, provision is made for submission. I only refer to it now to show that the policy of this country is becoming fixed in that way. Our earlier constitutions were not submitted, as the President remarks; but lately the people are taking a deep interest in constitutional questions. They not only like to pass upon them, but it is their privilege to do so by that surest of all modes—the silent ballot. Wherever this is possible, no agent shall intervene between them and their will. That is Democracy? Its progress may be marked in the fact that twenty-one out of thirty-one of the present constitutions of these States have been submitted to the people. Here is the list:

So much for precedents. The weight of them is in favor of the principle of submission.

It has been argued that the Lecompton convention was a legal body; but legal only as a petitioning body praying for a certain object. I cannot say that I have seen anything of a prayerful character about that body. Their ordinance about the public lands—as impudent as it is startling—does not look to be in a prayerful mood. But, be that as it may, suppose they are legal petitioners, I contend that that is not the proper mode for the formation of States. It might do if there were a popular sanction; otherwise, most certainly not.

But I will go further. I will admit just now, for the argument, that the convention had an authoritative existence; that the Territorial Legislature had power to convoke it; nay, more, that it has prepared a legal constitution; and yet I say it has no power to adopt it. That lies with the people, under the organic law. Oh, yes, gentlemen may say, is not the convention legal? If that, why not its product? If that be legal, is it not intervention to do aught save admit Kansas, under this contrivance, as an equal State? The convention may be legal. It may have all the forms of law. It may even be authorized by the organic act; and its action may be in accordance with authority and precedent; but still I say it lacks the life-giving spirit by which it can be made a State coequal with my own—Ohio. It may be legal—may seem so. Its forms may be skillfully drawn. It may be as good in its general provisions as the President says it is. So you may see a languishing body have all its parts, and yet be useless for many purposes of life; you may reckon all the joints of a dead man; but the heart is cold, the joints stiff, the pulses still, and it is only fit for the grave. So with this constitution; it may be legal and formal, but until the popular breath is breathed into it, it is of no validity or force. It is worse: it is not only pulseless—heartless—but it is, through trickery and fraud, a mass of detestable putrescence! Without that popular confirmation, it will never, never be suffered to appear above ground. No scientific galvanism contained in that schedule can inform or vivify its decaying members. Divine power worked a miracle to bring forth Lazarus. There is no power in this land to do that office for this unwholesome thing. If it be dragged into this Hall for "admission," with a rope round its neck, in defiance of the popular will of Kansas, there will be scalpels used with a keen readiness, never before illustrated in political surgery!

Third. I deny, therefore, that it is congressional intervention in domestic affairs to question the form and mode of this application for the admission of Kansas. I do not affirm that Congress should say for Kansas whether she should have a bank, or not; (though if a bank becomes "vested" how are the people to get rid of it?) should have a Governor of twenty years' residence in the Union, or not; should pass on the taxing power of the State, as to the public lands, or not; should have slavery, or not.

In domestic affairs the constitution may have all the excellences of Plato's Ideal, More's Utopia, and Harrington's Oceana; it may be the transcript of angels from the tablets of the Omniscient Law-Giver; yet, if unsubmitted to the people, I would not vote for its admission. We have no right to force on men what is best for them in our own opinion. This has been the plea of despotism for ages. It is the hard dogma that sustains the perjured dynasties of Europe on their thrones. It is founded in the petrification of the human heart.

Neither, in domestic matters, do I care how bad the constitution may be, ethically or politically. If submitted, my approbation follows that of the people. This is non-intervention.

But when Congress undertakes to protect the people, in judging of these matters of domestic concernment, let it be done thoroughly and well. Let not Congress give the protection which the wolf gives the lamb. Let Congress, when it guarantees self-government, see to it that it is not a mockery, or a phantom, but a real, living, glowing reality—an opportunity for public volition, informed by conscience, and irradiate with intelligence—to decide for themselves, under the constitution, as to the laws under which they are to live.

For myself, I but repeat the expression of the Democracy of the capital district of Ohio, when I say that, however we may dislike slavery, we are utterly indifferent, as a political question, whether slavery goes to Kansas or not; provided the people pass on it honestly and fairly. Let it be a slave State; let it, on the other hand, be a free State; but let it be a State which is self-governing, for otherwise it is not republican.

When the bill of Mr. Dunn was presented to this body, for the pacification of Kansas, it made provision for the slaves in Kansas to remain there. The Democracy opposed that bill, because Congress, by it, undertook to intervene on the subject. Let the people pass such a provision in their constitution, and it shall be no objection to me that it is right or wrong. My answer is, it is the people's will! Congress, by Dunn's bill, was wrong in thus attempting to fix the status of any person in the Territory. The people can fix it as they please. It is their business. Far better let African slavery be established than an irresponsible tyranny. It matters not, that it may be changed the next day, or the next year. Anglo-Saxon independence will not brook this organized despotism. The English language has not servile syllables enough to spell out the presumptuous audacity of those delegates of Kansas, who have dared thus to steal the livery of sovereignty in the face of the thirty millions of thinking freemen of America! It is no question of African slavery, no maudlin sentimentality about the black race; but it is the right of the white man that is attempted to be filched from him by a pack of land-hucksters and political jobbers.

I have pledged myself to vote for the admission of Kansas as a slave State, if fairly made so. I am here to redeem that pledge; and now, to-day, would rather have Kansas a slave State, than to have its self-government beaten down under the heels of an irresponsible cabal. Fill Kansas with negroes as compactly as the district of my friend from South Carolina, where there are one hundred and ten thousand negroes to five thousand voters; am I right? (to Mr. KEITT.) [Mr. KEITT, (in his seat.) Yes, that's right. I wish there were more of them.]—but, in the name of Democratic fealty and Democratic sense, let us stand like men of trust and men of honor, to the sovereignty of the people, in whose will constitutions are but wisps of straw, and whose breath can make and unmake law, as it can make and unmake congressmen.

I said I was utterly indifferent as to the character of the domestic institutions formed and regulated in the constitution, provided they were all approved by that perfect freedom of action guaranteed to the people by the Kansas and Nebraska bill.

First. I would limit this only as the United States Constitution limits it. In the third section of the tenth article, it says: "New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union;" and in the subsequent section, it "guaranties to every State in this Union a republican form of government."

Coupled with this naked power to admit—a discretion to be used as other discretionary powers are used—is the limitation that the government must be republican. I hold that a constitution like that made at Lecompton cannot be republican; where it has no authority from Congress; no imprimatur from the people; and is no reflection of the popular will. The form may be republican in one sense; but that higher form, that essence, that fifth essence of republicanism, its sine qua non, the popular sense, is not expressed in it; and, therefore, as Mr. Buchanan said of Arkansas, it is a usurpation.

Second. Not only is there no substantial submission of the constitution to the people, but even the formal mode of submitting the propositions of the schedule do not insure fairness in voting or in the record of the voting. The agents to supervise the election have no check from, and no responsibility to, any other than the appointing power, which is the president of the convention. The commissioners are appointed by the president. They appoint the judges; the judges appoint the clerks. The poll books are returned to the president of the convention. No check by other officers, territorial or Federal. All is subordinate to the presiding genius whose constitution this is. Can such an election command confidence in the present condition of Kansas? The President hopes for peace by the acceptance of a constitution thus ratified. He says that if this opportunity of settling the question in Kansas should be rejected, "she may be involved for years in domestic discord, and possibly in civil war, before she can again make up the issue now so fortunately rendered, and again reach the point she has already attained." It seems to me that such a state of anarchy will follow, if this election goes on, and is to be sustained by the strong Federal arm. Germany stood for thirty years with her hand upon her sword; the rustle of a leaf disturbed her. Kansas is in similar suspense. Never was there more need of heed, caution abundant, and beyond cavil or question, as to the popular expression.

Third. In the ninth section of the schedule, the voter, if challenged, is required to swear to support the constitution, under the pains of perjury. Is this republicanism? Is this miserable mode of making a constitution to be countenanced by this Congress?

Fourth. There is another ground for the rejection of this constitution. There is a fraud recognized in it, which we are bound, while inquiring into its republican form, to notice. The basis of popular will is the basis of representation. This is violated. In the creation of representative and council districts, the Oxford city fraud has been made the basis of estimating the population of Johnson county. The entire official vote of that county did not exceed four hundred. Fraud swelled it to eighteen hundred by the return of sixteen hundred fictitious names from Oxford city, a hamlet of three dwelling houses. Shawnee, with eight hundred voters—bona fide voters—gets only half the representation of Johnson. Well might Judge Elmore protest against this fraud. Well might Governor Walker complain of it, after having set it aside solemnly. Other frauds are to be found of a similar character. If we are to judge of the republicanism of the State to be inaugurated, we should discard this constitution.

This convention sanctioned this fraud, not only by making it the basis of representation, but by electing one of the creatures who signed the forgeries as their clerk. And I have it from the best authority, that the president of the convention himself is believed by the body of the people of Kansas to be implicated in this same fraud. Who that admits this fraud can sustain a constitution founded upon it?

Fifth. I hold, lastly, that that constitution is not republican in form; because, in the fourteenth section of the schedule, it prohibits—ay, that is the effect—amendment, alteration, or change until after 1864. It is utterly idle to say it meant to provide for alteration, amendment, and change meanwhile, ad libitum. When a constitution provides a mode and time to amend, all other ways and times are excluded. After implying no change till 1864, then it proceeds to hamper the "perfectly free" action of the people of 1864, by requiring two thirds of the Legislature to concur, before they will allow a majority of the people to call for an amendment. And, as if to clinch the whole of this absurdity with another more glaring, it provided that even then "no alteration shall be made to affect the rights of property in the ownership of slaves."

Now, I do not seek to intervene in domestic affairs, when I declare that whatever may be the precedents in this respect, I will never vote for a State to come in under such impossible, absurd, and tyrannical conditions. Congress guarantees a republican form; and this constitution fetters every limb of that form.

"But," it is said, "these conditions are void. The State may turn around to-morrow and discard them all." So it may. New York did; so did Louisiana. But it was revolution. We have no right to force people into revolution against the established order. It may not be that revolution which, like a tempest, overturns the public authority by "wild sword law" or popular frenzy. It is not that inimitable thunder which aroused America in 1775, France in 1787, or England in 1630. It is rather like a machine, which, having a principle of compensation, corrects irregularities without breaking the machine or retarding its motion. Still, it is revolution; whether it be a perilous one or not, it is the only way to get rid of the restrictions placed on the popular will by this constitution. To those who say the State may, after admission, alter the constitution at once before 1864, I ask this question: Were the delegates in earnest when they forbade amendment till 1864? If so, they will attempt to carry out their ideas; and, in doing so, they must resist innovation. If they resist, there can be no assurance of a peaceful, harmless revolution. Those who attempt to amend provoke resistance; and they who vote for this constitution must resist that resistance. The consequences must be revolution and civil war. If the delegates were not in earnest in prohibiting amendment till 1864, what a mockery in us to approve of such wild work, especially when bloody work must or may follow. The tracks of blood ever follow the wrongdoer, and follow him to the bitter, bitter end.

This constitution is made, in most respects, irrevocable until after 1864. The machinery for amendment begins to run then. Still it is an irrevocable law; and it is not only absurd, impossible, tyrannical, but anti-Democratic. Democracy, as taught in Ohio, believes in the repeatability of everything by the popular voice. My State has no power to-day to tax certain banks; because the Supreme Court of the United States, under the plea of "vested rights," has taken away our sovereignty in that respect. "Governments," said Burke, "without the means of change, are without the means of their own conservation." Who, that remembers the scorching logic of Jeremy Bentham and Sydney Smith, on the "fallacy of an irrevocable law," can fail to feel the utter silliness of those who propose to bind down the freemen of Kansas for ten years in most respects, and in one respect forever. I refer to Bentham, vol. 2, page 402; and to Sydney Smith, vol. 2, page 391.

"A law," says Mr. Bentham, (no matter to what effect,) "is proposed to a legislative assembly, who are called upon to reject it, upon the single ground, that by those who, in some former period, exercised the same power, a regulation was made having for its object to preclude forever, or to the end of an unexpired period, all succeeding legislators from enacting a law to any such effect as that now proposed."

Now, it appears quite evident that, at every period of time, every Legislature must be endowed with all those powers which the exigency of the times may require; and any attempt to infringe on this power is inadmissible and absurd. The sovereign power, at any one period, can only form a blind guess at the measures which may be necessary for any future period; but by this principle of irrevocable laws, the government is transferred from those who are necessarily the best judges of what they want, to others who can know little or nothing about the matter.

If it be right that the conduct of the nineteenth century should be determined, not by its own judgment, but by that of the eighteenth, it will be equally right that the conduct of the twentieth century should be determined, not by its own judgment, but by that of the nineteenth. And if the same principle were still pursued, what, at length, would be the consequence? That in process of time the practice of legislation would be at an end. The conduct and fate of all men would be determined by those who neither knew nor cared anything about the matter; and the aggregate body of the living would remain forever in subjection to an inexorable tyranny, exercised as it were by the aggregate body of the dead!

"The despotism," as Mr. Bentham well observes, "of Nero or Caligula, would be more tolerable than an irrevocable law. The despot, through fear or favor, or in a lucid interval, might relent; but how are the Parliament who made the Scotch union, for example, to be awakened from that dust in which they repose—the jobber and the patriot, the Speaker and the doorkeeper, the silent voters and the men of rich allusions—Cannings and cultivators, Barings and beggars—making irrevocable laws for men who toss their remains about with spades, and use the relics of these legislators to give breadth to broccoli, and to aid the vernal eruption of asparagus?"

Long after Calhoun and his confederates shall have moldered and have been forgotten, the men of Kansas will look back with pity and contempt on this futile and foolish attempt to bind them by the decrees of 1857. The men of 1864—if not the men of 1858—will laugh to scorn this attempt. The border States of this country are not the places for such despotic experiments.

"If the law be good," says Bentham, "it will support itself; if bad, it should not be supported by the irrevocable theory, which is never resorted to but as the veil of abuses. All living men must possess the supreme power over their own happiness at every particular period. To suppose that there is anything which a whole nation cannot do, which they deem to be essential to their happiness, and that they cannot do it, because another generation, long ago dead and gone, said it must be done, is mere nonsense. While you are captain of the vessel, do what you please; but the moment you quit the ship, I become as omnipotent as you. You may leave me as much advice as you please, but you cannot leave me commands; though, in fact, this is the only meaning which can be applied to what are called irrevocable laws. It appeared to the Legislature for the time being to be of immense importance to make such and such a law. Great good was gained, or great evil avoided, by enacting it. Pause before you alter an institution which has been deemed to be of so much importance. This is prudence and common sense; the rest is the exaggeration of fools, or the artifice of knaves, who eat up fools."

"When a law is considered as immutable, and the immutable law happens at the same time to be too foolish and mischievous to be endured, instead of being repealed, it is clandestinely evaded, or openly violated, and thus the authority of all law is weakened."

If this irrevocable law be so absurd, tyrannical, and knavish in England, as it seems to be under this analysis, how utterly and abominably absurd, tyrannical, and knavish, is it in a nation like our own? There, laggard conservatism is so loth to change, that abuses are canonized and ancestry receives apotheosis! Here, change is the essential condition of social and political existence: here, States are formed in the twinkling of an eye; cities grow up in a night, as if under the magic of Aladdin's lamp: here, economical ideas, more powerful than political tenets, are ever permeating the body politic, to change its form and substance: here, the border men are students of politics, and seek popularity and wealth by ameliorating institutions: here, the telegraph throws its thought from the very Capitol in which we speak to the borders of our territory; and the "goblin of steam," under the aid of congressional land grants, is doing the work of years in a week, and the work of a hundred years in one. Behind its power, the dwarf removes mountains and bridges rivers; civilization follows in the train. Here, in America, more than anywhere else, the poet's verse is appropriate:

"Beneath our starry arch
Nought resteth or is still,
But all things hold their march
As if by one great will.
Move one—move all!
Hark to the foot fall!
On—on—ever!"

Here in America, where the changes of a year are equal to the changes of a century in Europe, and where the changes of a lustrum only herald greater changes, and all through change, working out that secular magnificence which is the destiny of our land, we are to have irrevocable laws for our border States!

An irrevocable law in such a land! Enact that frost shall cease in the north and blooms in the south—fix the figure of Proteus or the air, by law; but let us not do such impossible tyranny for ten years, or one year. Why, California sprang into Statehood—the golden rigol of independence on her brow—in less than a twelvemonth! And Minnesota and Oregon, within the year, stand waiting to knock for admission. Washington, New Mexico, Arizona, Dakota, are pushing on toward the goal of independent sovereignty, and two years may see them where their sisters are now. An irrevocable law for such a land! Take Kansas; read the Indian treaties made by Colonel Marypenny, of 1834; and now visit Leavenworth, and ask if such a land is to be irrevocably bound by the edicts of an irresponsible convention? In the name of republicanism, I trust it will never be pressed in this House.

It would be bad enough to accept a constitution, made under popular sanction, with irrevocable clauses; but made irrevocable, without such sanction, it is monstrous and impossible. "Governments are republican," says Jefferson, "only as they embody the popular will and execute it."

In conclusion, I protest against this constitution, because it is against the principle of self-government—against the organic act—is not the authorized or legal expression of the people; because it is anti-republican in form and substance; because it is absurd, tyrannical, fraudulent, and impossible; because it undertakes to bind down the sovereignty of the people by irrevocable laws, which are opposed to the genius of our institutions.

But beyond all other objections is that implacable one, that cannot be appeased—the demand for its submission to the people, in whole and in part. Whatever may be the legality of the constitutional convention—whatever may be its work, and how irrevocable soever they have sought to make it, why has it not been submitted? Come to this question! Away with rubbish! Let us dig down to this primitive rock. "Ah," say its friends, "it will be voted down; the people will not have it." True, they do not want it. If the press of the Territory be any indication of the popular wish, that is true. But one out of the twenty-one presses of all parties in the Territory sustains it. Democrats and Republicans unite to condemn it. True, very true, it would have been voted down, and therefore it is not to be submitted to a vote. This is Democracy, is it? Let us, then, rewrite our lexicons. Democracy means, does it, to withhold the right of suffrage to all who may vote against you? Wise beyond Jefferson are the sages who thus teach! But the people of Kansas have acted wrong, are culpable, have not acted right in voting heretofore. But are they, for that, to be disfranchised? Away with such puerility. It reminds me of the gracious Sultan under the old Turkish constitution, who gave to the Ulemats the privilege of questioning his firmans; but if they exercised it, they were to be pounded to death in a mortar by the janizaries.

This is no sectional question. The North has everything to gain by standing by its pledges and principles as enunciated in the Kansas bill. What has the South to gain by an opposite course? Does she expect to make Kansas a slave State? No. Would she, if she could, against the wish of the people? I say no! Does she wish to resuscitate the waning fortunes of a sectional party? If yea, then let her place the northern Democracy in the wrong, where it can be reproached and insulted, taunted and despised; where our opponents, wagging their heads, may say: "You meant the South, you meant slavery, you meant everything else but popular sovereignty, when you mouthed of popular sovereignty."

Nor will it do for us to answer: "We adhere to the general principle of submitting the whole constitution, but cannot now apply it to Kansas." Such a reply will place us of the North in the position of the French fleet at Aboukir, which Nelson destroyed—it was neither at sea nor afloat. Give me the open sea, with a small craft, and the flag of popular sovereignty, in its integrity, at the mast-head, and I will not ask any favors that our opponents can bestow. I will trust my humble bark on the open sea without fear, nay, with confidence and joy! There is plain sailing for us, without tacking and filling, if we pursue the course proposed in the case of Wisconsin, where the condition of admission was the ratification by the people of the constitution. We can pursue that course in this instance without dishonor; or we can pass the Toombs bill with the amendment proposed by my colleague [Mr. SHEARMAN] last session. It is as follows:

"And the said constitution shall be submitted to the people for acceptance or rejection, under such regulations as said convention shall prescribe."

Who can object to such a course? Will the North—the South—the President—the people of Kansas? Will the Democracy of the Union? My vote shall be ready for such a solution of this difficulty. But it cannot be made ready to sanction the Lecompton contrivance. If it be the only record I have to make here, it will be a "no" that shall echo the voice of my constituency. Let Kansas come as Minnesota, in daylight, to the front door, in honest purpose, and manly bearing; and not as a burglar, in the dark, with the appliances of artifice and a record of shame! Her people had a right to expect from this Government, if not from that convention, a full submission of her organic law. This right is denied. Being denied, her people can say, with a bitterness too well warranted by the history,

"—be these juggling fiends no more believ'd
That palter with us in a double sense;
That keep the word of promise to our ear,
And break it to our hope."

The events of the next month may alter the position of this question in this House and before the country; but for myself, nothing can change my determination to stand by the principles of Democracy, as we have pledged ourselves before the country. In this contest, I adopt as my motto the words of one who has sacrificed much for liberty in another land: "NOTHING FOR THE PEOPLE, BUT BY THE PEOPLE; NOTHING ABOUT THE PEOPLE, WITHOUT THE PEOPLE!"

I, therefore, give notice of my intention to introduce an act to enable Kansas to form a constitution, with the amendment above suggested.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to follow the example of the gentleman from Ohio, and to enter into an extended discussion at this time of the merits of the President's message. I rise to express my surprise, and my regret also, that the gentleman has chosen this occasion to precipitate upon this House the discussion of the principles and measures recommended in that message.

There are those, sir, who conceive that the Administration is in trouble; that clouds are gathering about the Democratic party. In this condition of things, I humbly conceive that the friends of the Administration and of the principles of the Democratic party, should not be the first to sound the alarm. There is something in the time and circumstances attending a speech which enter quite as largely into the question, whether it is a good or a bad speech, whether it is right or wrong, as the abstract sentiments contained in it. I say that it is not my intention to attempt any reply to the positions assumed by the gentleman from Ohio, but I do say that so far as time is concerned, so far as circumstances are concerned under which he has chosen to make his speech, they are all against him.

What is the question before this House? A motion to print twenty thousand extra copies of the President's message for the information of the people. That message contains some ideas and some recommendations in reference to Kansas affairs. There is no question before this House as to what shall be done with Kansas, whether she shall be admitted into this Union as a free State or as a slave State. If that question is to come, it is to come in the future. If the Lecompton constitution, which the gentleman has discussed, is to come to this House, it is to come hereafter. Upon this question, thus presented, the gentleman, as he will permit me to say, startled this House, or at least his political friends here, by entering into a discussion of the merits of the President's message on this motion. His written speech, elaborately prepared and delivered on this question, was unexpected to me, because I knew, or at least believed, that we had no presidential candidates in this body. Allusion has been made to a distinguished Senator and to his position. It may be well, perhaps, for that Senator to look to his laurels and his presidential prospects. He may learn that discussions on the merits of a message, precipitated upon a deliberative body on a motion to print, can be raised in the House of Representatives as well as in the Senate.

I wish to correct one position that the gentleman from Ohio has assumed in regard to the questions which were decided by the people of the Northwest in the last presidential election. I understand him to say in substance and with emphasis, that the people of Ohio, in the last presidential election, did decide that the constitution of Kansas, whatever it might happen to be, should be submitted to a vote of the people. Sir, I apprehend that there was no material difference between the issues presented in that canvass in the State of Indiana and those presented in Ohio; and if the gentleman from Ohio will travel back with me for a short space of time he will recollect that the term "popular sovereignty," upon which he has dwelt with so much emphasis, was not understood until after the presidential election was over, [laughter,] and after the decision in the Dred Scott case by the Supreme Court of the United States. Until then the question was not understood in all sections of the Union alike, and was not understood in the sense in which he seems to understand it.

The gentleman will recollect that the Missouri compromise was a prohibition which could only obtain over Kansas while it remained in a territorial condition. That compromise was repealed by the Nebraska bill. I ask the gentleman what was the doctrine which he advocated in the State of Ohio? Why, sir, it was that much-abused doctrine of "squatter sovereignty;" it was that the people in a territorial condition, speaking through the Territorial Legislature, constituted under the organic act of the Territory of Kansas, had the power to decide the slavery question for themselves; and, sir, if the gentleman will refer to the debates in this House during the last session, he will find that my colleague from the New Albany district, [Mr. ENGLISH,] in discussing this question, stated that that was the understanding of the Democracy of the Northwest upon that question; and it was frankly admitted here, by gentlemen from the North and by gentlemen from the South, that upon this question there was a difference of opinion—but not a material one, or one of any importance—between the party in the North and the party in the South. But now, sir, we have a construction by a judicial decision, and it has always been the doctrine of the Democratic party to conform to the judicial decisions of the country, although it is not the doctrine of that party which seems to be amused on this floor by the mere recital of the truths of history.

But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] is the advocate of popular sovereignty. He proposes not to stand by the President, in his message, upon this question. Well, sir, if such were my conviction, I should hold it back to the last moment. If I found myself compelled to separate from the Democratic party and from the Administration, I should go reluctantly; I should go at the last moment; I would not be the first to leave the ship. Where will the gentleman go to carry out this favorite idea of popular sovereignty?

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me to answer his question?

Mr. HUGHES. I will yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. COX. I will go to the Cincinnati platform; to the pledges of Mr. Buchanan; to the instructions given to Governor Walker; and to the message of the President himself, and stand by the general principle he lays down there, although he says for the present he cannot carry that principle out; and, standing on that rock, the gentleman cannot drive me out of the Democratic party by any little scornful indignation from Indiana. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUGHES. It was very far from my purpose to attempt to treat the gentleman or his argument with scorn. It was an able argument. I think it was a mischievous one. I look upon it with sorrow and regret. But I will repeat the inquiry, where will the gentleman go in search of that popular sovereignty which he says means that the people, and the whole people, shall have the privilege of voting upon their constitution, and upon the whole of their constitution? Will he go to those men and to that party who are attempting to force upon the people of Kansas the Topeka constitution? Will he go to the party which made that constitution a plank in their platform in the presidential canvass?

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman want an answer?

Mr. HUGHES. I would rather not be interrupted.

Mr. COX. Well, I will not go there.

Mr. HUGHES. Where will the gentleman go, then? Why, he says he will take the Cincinnati platform under one arm and the President's message under the other, and Governor Walker's proclamation in one pocket and the President's instructions in another, and will go off and form a party by himself. That was the idea. Well, sir, it is to be regretted that some gentlemen are not either of sufficient importance in the country to build up a new party, or sufficiently humble to follow faithfully in the ranks of one already organized.

Now, sir, I said that I did not propose to follow the gentleman in this discussion. I am not prepared to do so. I deprecate the discussion. I think that, in point of time and in point of circumstances, it is a discussion which all the friends of order, of peace, and of harmony in this country ought to deprecate. Who has yet asked the gentleman in this House to vote for the Lecompton constitution? Who is it that is complaining against the supposed tyranny that is to be exercised upon the people of Kansas? Wait until that constitution is presented here, and wait then until complaints come from the people of Kansas, and be not in haste to go to the great State of Illinois to violate the principle of popular sovereignty, and find out what the State of Illinois thinks ought to be done in Kansas.

Sir, the question before the House is on a motion to print. In its present form, it does not admit of any test. I think it due to the message, and due to the President, that since his sentiments and his recommendations and his policy have been thus prematurely assailed, the question should be presented to this House in such form that gentlemen can distinctly vote their approbation or their disapprobation of that message. I want to see gentlemen from the North as well as gentlemen from the South show their hands upon this question. I, for one, would have been glad to see this matter postponed; perhaps the cloud would have passed away; but since the assault has been made, I am called upon to choose whether I will remain with the Administration and with the Democratic party, or go to the opposite party, or stand neutral, giving aid and comfort to the enemies of popular sovereignty, and to those whose uniform course it is to denounce the judicial tribunals of the country, if, in the discharge of a sworn duty, they happen to cross their ideas of political policy.

Since we are brought to that, let us choose, and let each member have an opportunity to say where he will stand upon this question. I therefore offer the following as a substitute for the resolution reported by the Committee on Printing; and upon it I demand the previous question:

Whereas, the principles declared and the measures recommended in the annual message of the President of the United States meet with the approbation of this House, and ought to be embodied in the legislation of the present session of Congress, wherever legislative action is necessary to give them effect: Therefore,

Resolved, That twenty thousand extra copies of the message and accompanying documents be printed for the use of the members of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the previous question will not be seconded.

Mr. KEITT. I call for tellers on the second.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KEITT and BILLINGHURST were appointed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is that amendment in order? I do not think it is.

The SPEAKER. Upon what ground?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Because it is irrelevant. We have not got the message under consideration, but merely the question whether we will print extra copies of it or not. The amendment is out of order, in my opinion, because it is irrelevant.

Mr. PHELPS. I appeal to the gentleman from Indiana to withdraw the demand for the previous question, and then to withdraw his amendment. If that be done, I desire to appeal to the House to sustain the previous question, and take a vote on the resolution reported by the Committee on Printing. [Loud cries of "Order!"] We can then go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and discuss this question. [Renewed cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. SHORTER. I desire to make an inquiry. Is it in order to move to strike out the preamble to the amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order, as the previous question is demanded.

Mr. BARKSDALE, (at five minutes of three o'clock.) I move that the House do now adjourn. The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to ask the Chair whether, in voting on that amendment, we do not vote first on the resolution, and then on the preamble?

Mr. STANTON. I rise to a question of order. I object to debate on the pretense of asking a question.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman had better know what he objects to before he does object.

Mr. STANTON. What I object to is the gentleman making an argument under the pretense of asking a question.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman is mistaken. I asked, in good faith, a question of the Chair. I desire to know of the Chair, whether, in voting, we do not vote first on the resolution, and then on the preamble in the amendment? I asked it in good faith, and the gentleman went off at half-cock.

Mr. STANTON. I should like to know whether the gentleman from Alabama did not know that before he asked the question?

Mr. HOUSTON. I doubt very much whether the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] understands the point involved in my question even now.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will withdraw his call for the previous question.

It was not withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman is in order, and overrules the question of order of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.]

The tellers took their places, and the House proceeded to vote on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Pending the vote—
Mr. HUGHES said: I am disposed to yield to the solicitations of my friends, and, with the advice of older heads, I propose to withdraw the substitute, but I adhere to the demand for the previous question on the proposition.

The tellers reported—ayes, one hundred.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana withdraws his amendment, and renews the demand for the previous question.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Can he withdraw it after the vote has been taken on the previous question?

The SPEAKER. He can withdraw it at any time before the result of a vote is announced. It is the uniform practice of the House, as the gentleman from Ohio knows.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I suggest, however, that it is beyond his power to withdraw before the vote is taken.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has the right—as the gentleman knows—to withdraw his amendment at any time before the result is announced.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I interpose this question: When the House is dividing, is it in order for any man to interpose any motion, or any other business, till that vote be completed? That is the question I make.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Indiana was not entertained by the Chair till after the House had divided in the affirmative.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Can he withdraw it, then, until this vote be taken and announced? Can he interpose any business whatever?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he can. The gentleman from Indiana withdraws his amendment. The question now recurs on seconding the demand for the previous question on the original resolution submitted by the Committee on Printing.

Mr. DEAN called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. DEAN and CASKIE were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 101, noes 89.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXTRA COPIES OF FINANCE REPORT.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee, from the same committee, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed sixteen thousand extra copies of the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances—fifteen thousand copies thereof for the use of the House of Representatives and one thousand copies for the use of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee, demanded the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. LETCHER. Is that the usual number of extra copies?

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. It is the usual number.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to withdraw the demand for the previous question for a single moment.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. No, sir; I shall not withdraw the demand this time.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The resolution was then adopted.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I ask the consent of the House to offer a joint resolution, which I send up to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have read.

Mr. RUFFIN. I object to the reading, except for information.

The resolution was read for information, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the compensation allowed to members of Congress, by the act entitled "An act to regulate the compensation of members of Congress," approved August 16, 1856, be paid in the following manner, to wit: On the first day of the first session of each Congress, or as soon thereafter as he may apply, each Senator, Representative, and Delegate, shall receive his mileage as now provided by law, and all his compensation from the beginning of his term, to be computed at the rate of $250 per month, and during the session compensation at the same rate. And on the first day of the second, or any subsequent session, he shall receive his mileage as now allowed by law, and all compensation which has accrued during the adjournment, at the rate aforesaid, and during said session compensation per month at the same rate.

And be it further resolved, That so much of the said act, approved August 15, 1856, as conflicts with this joint resolution, and postpones the payment of said compensation until the close of each session, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. STANTON. I object.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection. If it is in order, I move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order.

REGULATIONS FOR THE NEW HALL.

Mr. FAULKNER. I rise to a question in reference to the organization of the House. I have received a communication from the Doorkeeper of the House, stating that with the present force with which he is provided, it is impossible to preserve the order of the House and to extend the requisite accommodations to members. I therefore offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to inquire into and report to this House the number of additional messengers, pages, and other officers, if any, required for the use of the new Hall; and that said committee have leave to report at any time.

Mr. BANKS. If the resolution is received, I ask the gentleman from Virginia to accept an amendment, that the same committee have authority to consider and report to the House what accommodations should be made for reporters not already provided for.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would suggest, also, that the committee shall have authority to inquire as to what persons should be admitted to the floor of the House during its sessions.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would suggest to my friend from Tennessee that a committee be specially raised upon that subject. It is important to the business of legislation that we should be protected from those who are not entitled to the privileges of this Hall. I think a special committee should be raised to ascertain and report who should be entitled to come in here, and who not.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the gentleman will propose such a committee, I will go with him.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not want to do it myself; I only throw out the suggestion for the action of the House.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. There are now, as the rules stand, certain persons who are entitled to the privileges of the floor; and, in order to see what it is that is now proposed, I ask for the reading of the 17th rule.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think, sir, there ought to be a committee raised to investigate into and report to this House on the subject. If the privilege of the Hall is extended in this, as it was in the old Hall, we will not, I think, be able to legislate at all.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. This is a much larger Hall than the old one.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is true; but we have not here the same protection we had there; there is no railing.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. When we get the additional officers asked for, we will.

Mr. HOUSTON. No, sir; not if these persons are allowed to come inside of this Hall. There is nothing, then, to keep them out of the seats of members, whenever they may choose to occupy them.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I ask for the reading of the rule.

The Clerk read the rule, as follows:

"17. No person except members of the Senate, their Secretary, heads of Departments, Treasurer, Comptrollers, Registers, Auditors, President's Secretary, Chaplains to Congress, Judges of the United States, Foreign Ministers and their Secretaries, officers who by name have received or shall hereafter receive the thanks of Congress for their gallantry and good conduct displayed in the service of their country, the Governor, for the time being, of any State or Territory in the Union, such gentlemen as have been heads of Departments or members of either branch of the National Legislature, the members of the Legislatures, for the time being, of the States and Territories—January 14, 1850—and, at the discretion of the Speaker, persons who belong to such legislatures of foreign Governments as are in amity with the United States, shall be admitted within the Hall of the House of Representatives; and no person not known to the Doorkeeper to be entitled to the privilege of the floor shall enter the Hall, unless the Doorkeeper shall be informed by a member that the individual is entitled to admission under this rule, and in what capacity.—January 14, 1850. And a book shall be provided by the Doorkeeper, in which shall be registered the names of all persons, other than members of Congress, who may apply for admission upon the floor of the House, setting forth by virtue of what position such privilege is claimed."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is the present state of the question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that the gentleman from Alabama moves any amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not move an amendment; I have merely thrown out a suggestion to the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is, then, on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. FLORENCE. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will add to his amendment the words, "reporters for the press generally."

Mr. WARREN. My understanding is, that not only the official reporters of the House have been provided for, but that the reporters for the press generally have been amply provided for in the gallery over and back of the Speaker's chair.

The SPEAKER. With the permission of the House, the Chair will make a statement. He found no arrangements had been made for the accommodation of the reporters and correspondents of the press, except for the reporters for the Globe, and therefore instructed the superintendent to provide accommodations for them in the gallery, immediately above the Speaker's chair. The Chair directed that ten seats should be provided there for that purpose. The Chair is informed by the superintendent that those seats can be elevated so that the reporters sitting there can see and hear everything going on in the House, probably better than anywhere else.

The Chair would also say that he received, previous to the removal into this Hall, between fifty and one hundred applications for the privileges of the House, from gentlemen connected with the press in different sections of the country.

Mr. BANKS. I was not aware of the fact stated by the Chair—that he had taken order in the matter—and supposed some such amendment as the one I offered was necessary. With the leave of the House, therefore, I withdraw my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be happy to have his action indorsed by the House.

Mr. WARREN. I am perfectly willing that the action of the Speaker should be indorsed by the House. The only reason I had for making any suggestion at all was, that the committee appointed to examine this Hall, and report on its condition, determined that it would be the better policy to place the reporters for the press generally where they have been assigned places by the Speaker's order. If they be permitted to occupy these places, this course will meet the views of that committee. I hope, therefore, that the House will indorse the action of the Speaker.

Mr. FLORENCE. I renew the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts. The committee to which this subject is to be referred should especially inquire what accommodations, under the circumstances, are necessary for the reporters and correspondents of the public press generally. I think the Speaker has done, so far, just as well as he could. Look at the reporters and correspondents up in the gallery over the Speaker's chair. They have now very limited accommodations. There they all sit in a row, reminding me very much of musicians. They are organists, my facetious friend from Tennessee whispers to me. If the arrangements for the correspondents of the press, in the judgment of the House, are to be made in that gallery, so be it. I am of a different opinion; but if they are to be put there, in my opinion there is great propriety, on the part of this committee, in inquiring what sort of accommodations should be afforded to them there. During exciting debates upon the floor of this House, great as are the capacities of the galleries for the accommodation of spectators, these gentlemen would be especially incommoded. If, then, they are to occupy places in the gallery where they are now, I desire that they may have a place especially set apart and railed off for them, into which they, and none others, shall have the entree.

I trust that the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, which I have renewed, with these words added to it, "reporters for the press generally," may be agreed to. The good sense of the amendment—I do not speak egotistically, for the proposition belongs to the gentleman from Massachusetts—will, I presume, forcibly impress every member in its favor.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I have no doubt that the Chair has done the best that, under existing circumstances, could be done for the representatives of the press. But suppose there are ten or a dozen very convenient desks provided for them: they are not sufficient, if we have heretofore had fifty or sixty gentlemen enjoying these privileges. It seems to me, therefore, that there ought to be some further accommodations provided for the press. I am not prepared to say whether these gentlemen are now in the best position or not. But, sir, there are persons who have had this privilege, well known to members as gentlemen of intelligence, and whose reports are of great interest to the country; and as the Hall is capacious enough to accommodate at least a part of them, it would be well enough to authorize the Chair—I merely throw out the suggestion—to give the privilege to such a number of these gentlemen as might be admitted to the lobbies back of our seats, without incommencing members and other privileged persons.

I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLORENCE] will be adopted; that this matter will be referred to a committee; and I have no doubt they will be able, in their report, to suggest some mode of affording additional facilities to the representatives of the press. I have in my eye a gentleman whom I know very well, and who assures me that the accommodations in the gallery are not sufficient. I second, therefore, the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and hope it will be adopted.

Mr. GARNETT. I heartily concur in the object proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to furnish proper accommodations for the representatives of the press; but I think, at the same time, that we should pay some regard to ourselves, and empower the committee to furnish proper accommodations for the members of the House. The amendment suggested by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] should, I think, be adopted, and the rule which has been read from the Clerk's desk be revised; for it is notorious that this Hall is not of sufficient size to accommodate the large number of strangers who have the privilege of the floor. We are not protected, as in the other Hall, by a barrier. There is an open space behind our seats; and I know, by my experience in another hall of legislation, arranged as this is in that regard, how impossible it will be for members in the outer circle to have even the privilege of their own chairs, unless the rule is revised, and the number of persons who have admission to this floor is materially restricted.

But that is not all, Mr. Speaker. I wish to empower the committee to provide other accommodations for members. Sir, those of us who occupy seats in the outer circle are now experiencing not only serious inconvenience, but inconvenience which I really believe is dangerous to our health. Cold air is continually flowing in upon us from these doors. There is no protection from double doors, as in the other Hall. Torrents of cold air are pouring in all around us, as any member can feel, and the whole atmosphere of this Hall is the atmosphere, not of a comfortable chamber for gentlemen to transact business in, but of a subterranean vault. Look at the panels round the Hall! Every one of them is discolored by blotches and blurs caused by dampness. I move, therefore, the following as an amendment to the amendment:

And that they also inquire what additional accommodations are required for the health and comfort of the members.

Mr. WINSLOW. I presume another amendment would not now be in order. I believe there is already an amendment to an amendment pending. I wish, therefore, to suggest to the gentleman from Virginia that he add to his amendment the words, "And what amendment, if any, shall be made to the 17th rule of the House?" The 17th rule is the one which has been read, relating to the privileges of the floor.

Mr. GARNETT. I accept the suggestion, and modify my amendment by adding to it those words.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I demand the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would suggest that the committee have power to report from time to time. It is not necessary that they should embrace all these matters in one report.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order; the previous question is demanded.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The amendment to the amendment was adopted. Mr. FLORENCE's amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The original resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

Mr. FLORENCE moved that the vote by which the resolution was adopted be reconsidered, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will waive that motion for a single moment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to call the attention of the House to the fact that the number of which the committee shall consist has been omitted.

Mr. KEITT. Make it fifteen.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. No; seven.

Mr. FLORENCE and several other members suggested five.

The SPEAKER. There is a blank in the resolution which has been adopted, and it will require unanimous consent to have the blank filled.

Mr. HASKIN. I move that the blank be filled with "five."

There being no objection, the motion was entertained, and agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. At the earnest solicitation of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TAYLOR,] I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

MODE OF PAYING MEMBERS.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I now ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the joint resolution which I offered this morning.

Mr. STANTON. I misunderstood the resolution this morning when it was read. I have since examined it carefully, and am satisfied that there should be no objection to it. I therefore withdraw my objection.

There being no other objection, the joint resolution to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate the compensation of members of Congress," approved August 16, 1856, was read by the Clerk.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, moved the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If that resolution be referred to the Committee on Mileage, I shall not object to it; otherwise, I shall.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I am perfectly willing to have it go to that committee.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee withdraw his objection?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will not withdraw it unless the resolution goes to the Committee on Mileage.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot determine that.

The objection was not withdrawn.

PROPOSITIONS FOR ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I move to amend that motion, so that, when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet in the old Hall.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is hardly in order.

Mr. FLORENCE. I desire to offer an amendment to the motion, as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives adjourn their respective Houses, for the present session, on Monday, the 2d day of June next ensuing, at twelve o'clock, m.

Mr. KEITT and several other members objected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not take precedence of the motion to adjourn.

Mr. FLORENCE. It struck me that it did. I offer it as an amendment or substitute to the proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules it out of order.

Mr. FLORENCE. I raise the point of order, that my proposition fixes a period remote beyond that suggested by the gentleman from Georgia for adjournment, and is in order. Gentlemen who do not like this Hall may vote my substitute, and leave it on the first Monday in June.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The question was taken on Mr. STEPHENS's motion, and it was decided in the affirmative; and thereupon, at three o'clock and forty minutes, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 17, 1857.

Prayer by Rev. STEPHEN P. HILL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Hon. STEPHEN R. MALLORY, of Florida, and Hon. SAM HOUSTON, of Texas, appeared in their seats to-day.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GWIN presented the memorial of George Kippen and others, residents of southern New Mexico, praying for a separate territorial organization, under the name of Arizona; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also presented the petition of Daniel Draper and William P. Draper, praying that a register may be granted to the bark Jehu, a Dominican vessel, lately called the Naiad Queen, bought by the Dominican Government and repaired in the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Asa Arkens, praying Congress to grant relief by pensions or otherwise, to the surviving officers and soldiers of the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BROWN presented the petition of John A. Ragan, for himself and others, praying that they may be allowed to purchase from the Government Lake Washington, in Mississippi, and Lake Point Coupee, in Louisiana, for the purpose of improving the breed of fish; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of Amos Kendall and others, praying an annual appropriation of $3,000 for the support of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented additional papers in relation to the claim of William B. Trotter; which, with his petition on file, were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented additional papers in relation to the claim of Nannie Denman, widow of F. J. Denman; which, with her papers on file, were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SEWARD presented the memorial of William H. Kennon, late a purser in the United States Navy, praying to be allowed the same compensation that was received by his predecessor and successor on board the United States steam-frigate Mississippi; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BENJAMIN presented the petition and papers of S. DeVisser & Co., praying for the passage of an act abandoning on the part of the Government all claims arising out of frauds of which they were innocent; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WILSON presented resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts in relation to the claim of that State against the United States for militia services during the last war with Great Britain; which were referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STUART presented a petition of citizens of Michigan praying for the abolition of the office of Chaplain in the public service; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. STUART. I presented, last week, a memorial of the Board of Education of the State of Michigan, and of the Faculty of the Agricultural College of the State, praying for a grant of land. As the committees had not then been formed, it was laid on the table. I move that it be taken up, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PUGH presented a petition of soldiers of the last war with Great Britain, praying that pensions may be allowed the soldiers of that war or to their widows; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MASON presented the memorial of Richard Randolph in behalf of John Slaughter, protesting against the adjudication of the claims of citizens of Virginia by the Commissioner of the General Land Office; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. IVERSON presented the petition of William D. Elam, asking for the passage of an act to regulate pleadings in the district courts of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of James Hudgins, son and administrator of Ruth Murphy, formerly widow of John Hudgins, a brigade quartermaster in the revolutionary army, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the memorial of Jonas P. Keller, praying compensation for services as general supervisor and watchman of the Winder building in 1849 and 1850; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the memorial of the heirs and representatives of Getano Carusi, praying for the fulfillment of a contract made with him by Captain Hall, late of the marine corps of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DURKEE presented the memorial of Anson Dart, late superintendent of Indian affairs in Oregon, praying for the passage of an act authorizing the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to settle his account with the Government on principles of equity and justice; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. POLK presented a memorial of the Legislature of Missouri, praying that the unsurveyed swamp lands may be patented to that State without being surveyed; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Missouri, praying for an appropriation for public lands to build a railroad from Springfield to Gibb's Bluff, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. EVANS presented a presentment of the grand jury of the United States for the district of South Carolina, in session at Charleston, recommending an appropriation for a new court-house at that place, and that provision be made for arranging the records of that court, and increasing the allowance for the maintenance of prisoners; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a presentment of the grand jury of the United States district court at Greenville, South Carolina, recommending an appropriation for a new court-house, and the appointment of commissioners, at suitable places, within the jurisdiction of that court; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EVANS. I ask for the reference to the Committee on Commerce of the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Charleston, in regard to the coast survey, which I presented before the committees were organized.

It was so ordered.

Mr. GWIN presented a memorial of a large number of the citizens residing in the western portion of the Territory of Utah, praying for the organization of a new Territory east of the Sierra Nevada mountains; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. J. C. ALLEN, their Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) in relation to the clergymen of the city of Washington who may officiate as Chaplains of the Senate and House of Representatives.

BOMBARDMENT OF GREYTOWN.

Mr. SEWARD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if compatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate copies of any correspondence which may have taken place between the Department of State and the British and French Ministers on the subject of claims for losses alleged to have been sustained by subjects of Great Britain and France at the bombardment of Greytown.

RAILROAD TO THE PACIFIC.

Mr. GWIN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That so much of the President's message and accompanying documents as refers to the subject of a national railroad from the Mississippi valley to the Pacific ocean, be referred to a select committee of nine members, to be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Messrs. GWIN, DOUGLAS, BRIGHT, DAVIS, HUNTER, SEWARD, BELL, FOOT, and IVERSON, as the committee.

THE DISTRICT BANKS.

Mr. SLIDELL. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed by the President pro tempore to examine into the condition of the corporations or associations acting as banks of deposit, discount, and issue, in the District of Columbia, and the authority under which said corporations or associations assume to transact the business of banking, with power to send for persons and papers, and to examine witnesses under oath. Also to inquire whether any, and what further legislation, is necessary to regulate and control banks of deposit, circulation, and issue, in the District of Columbia, and to report by bill or otherwise.

I have conferred with the chairman of the Committee on Finance and the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, the only two committees to whom the subject-matter of this resolution could, with propriety, be referred. They both think they have sufficient occupation, and that the subject is one worthy of investigation by a special committee. I hope the resolution will now be considered.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

The committee consists of Messrs. SLIDELL, POLK, BRODERICK, THOMSON of New Jersey, and HALE.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. A resolution was adopted yesterday, requesting the President "to communicate to the Senate all correspondence between the Executive Department and the present Governor of Kansas, together with such orders and instructions as have been issued to said Governor in relation to the affairs of said Territory."

It will be observed that this resolution is limited to the communications and instructions which have been made to the present Governor of Kansas. I think it very important that we should have all the correspondence, whether with the Governor or other officers. It is known that the Governor has not been there for some time, and it is important to have the whole of the instructions and communications which have been made. I have drawn up the following resolution with that view, which I hope will be adopted:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate all correspondence between himself or any of the Departments, and any Governor or other officer or person in the employment of the Government in Kansas Territory, not heretofore communicated, together with all orders and instructions which have been issued to the Governor of the said Territory, or any other officer or person in said Territory, in relation to Kansas affairs.

Mr. MASON. Let it lie over until we can look at it.

Mr. PUGH. I was about to offer an amendment to the resolution calling for documents which have not been embraced in any previous call; but if the resolution offered by the Senator from Illinois is to lie over, I ask that the following resolution may lie over with it:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate copies of the following documents:

1. Return of the votes taken in Kansas Territory at the October election, 1856, upon the question of calling a convention to frame a constitution and State government.
2. Act of the Territorial Legislature (in obedience to that vote) calling such a convention, and providing for the apportionment and election of delegates to the same.
3. The census and registration of voters, by counties and precincts, as taken under that act.
4. The apportionment of delegates made upon the returns of such census and registration.
5. Returns of the election by counties for delegates to the convention.
6. Returns of the last election, by counties, for members of the Territorial Legislature and a Delegate to Congress.
7. Proclamations of the Governor or acting Governor upon the subject of the census, registration of voters, and the several elections heretofore specified.
8. Journal of the convention held at LeCompton to frame a constitution and State government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will lie over, under the rule.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. WILSON gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to grant to the cities of Washington and Georgetown one million acres of the public lands for the support of common schools.

Mr. BAYARD gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to provide for the public printing, binding, and engraving.

Mr. BRODERICK gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to authorize and direct the payment of certain moneys into the treasury of the State of California, which were collected in the ports of said State as a revenue upon imports since the ratification of the treaty of peace between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, and prior to the admission of said State into the Union.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FOOT, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1) for the relief of George P. Marsh; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Also, a bill (S. No. 2) to grant a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of the public land to actual settlers; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 1) as to the constitutional power of the Executive in the removal of commissioned officers of the Army and Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BROWN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to bring in a bill (S. No. 3) to authorize notaries public to take and certify oaths, affirmations, and acknowledgments, in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PUGH, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce the following bills; which were read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (S. No. 4) to authorize writs of error in all cases prosecuted by indictment—to the Committee on the Judiciary;

A bill (S. No. 6) to provide for a survey of the Ohio river and its principal tributaries—to the Committee on Commerce; and

A bill (S. No. 7) for the improvement of navigation at the falls of the Ohio river—to the Committee on Commerce.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 5) to continue the pension heretofore granted to Katherine M. Hamer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GWIN, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 8) to organize the Territory of Arizona, and to create the office of surveyor general therein; to provide for the examination of private land claims; to grant donations to actual settlers; to survey the public and private lands, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a bill (S. No. 9) to authorize and facilitate the construction of a northern, a southern, and a central Pacific railroad and magnetic telegraph through the Territories of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the select committee on the subject, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 10) repealing all laws or parts of laws allowing bounties to vessels employed in the bank or other cod fisheries; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JONES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 12) making a grant of land to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad from McGregor's Landing to the western boundary of said State; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a bill (S. No. 11) making a grant of land to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad from Keokuk to Fort Madison, through the southern tier of counties in said State, to the Missouri river; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

TREASURY NOTES.

Mr. HUNTER. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, to report a bill (S. No. 13) to authorize the issue of Treasury notes. I ask the Senate, by unanimous consent, to proceed to the consideration of this bill now. There is great necessity for its prompt passage. If any Senator doubts the propriety of having it considered at once, I should like to have a letter which has been addressed to me by the Secretary of the Treasury read.

The Secretary read the following letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 15, 1857.

SIR: In my annual report to Congress of the 8th instant, an explanation of the causes which would lead to the necessity of supplying the Treasury with the means of promptly meeting the lawful claims upon it was given. I stated that "such provision should be made at the earliest practicable period, as a failure of sufficient means in the Treasury may occur at an early day."

At the time I prepared that statement, the weekly expenditures were exceeding the receipts to an extent that induced the opinion thus given. While the estimated amount of importations justified the conclusion that the revenue for the present year might be sufficient to meet the wants of the Government, yet the actual receipts into the Treasury in time to provide for the wants of the public service were dependent, not on the amount of merchandise imported, but the portion entered for consumption. At this time there is held in warehouse, in the city of New York alone, merchandise subject to duty exceeding twenty-eight million dollars in value, on which, when entered for consumption, duties must be paid to the amount of more than six million dollars.

The period when such payment of duty will be made may be influenced by so many circumstances, that the public credit should not be hazarded upon the contingency of its happening in time to meet the liabilities which we know must be provided for at an early day.

The amount now in the Treasury subject to draft is considerably less than six million dollars. When we reflect that balances must be kept in the hands of public officers in every part of the United States, by whom drafts are required to be paid, it will be readily perceived that the fiscal operations of the Government cannot be carried on with convenience and security with a less sum in the Treasury. The excess of the expenditures over the receipts is daily reducing this balance. I have been compelled to withdraw from the Mint and its branches the amount usually kept there for the purpose of facilitating the conversion of bullion into coin for the benefit of depositors. Such withdrawal necessarily occasions an inconvenience to the commercial community which should be obviated whenever it shall become practicable to do so.

It is proper to state that, in addition to the ordinary current demands on the Treasury, the sum of $722,652 29 must be paid on the 1st of January next for interest on the public debt.

In view of this state of things, I have the honor to ask your attention to the recommendation in my annual report that authority be given by law to issue Treasury notes. I think it important that Congress should act at once on the subject, that the necessary arrangements may be made by the 1st day of January to meet such public liabilities as become payable at and before that time, and which cannot be longer postponed.

Though the amount of $20,000,000 will not, in all probability, be needed at an early day, if at all, yet it is deemed best that the Department be authorized to issue and keep out that sum, should it be required by the public service. The rate of interest, for manifest reasons, should be left discretionary with the Department, subject to the approval of the President; but not to exceed six per centum per annum.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
HOWELL COBB,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. R. M. T. HUNTER, Chairman of Committee on Finance, Senate of the United States.

Mr. ALLEN. Yesterday the Senate determined that they would, at one o'clock to-day, proceed to the election of a Public Printer. I hope that will be done previous to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. HUNTER. I suggest to my friend from Rhode Island that, if we take up this bill, we can, at one o'clock, suspend its consideration, in order to execute that order; but I should like, if it be the pleasure of the Senate, to get the bill before them, because we must have action on it before Monday. I hope we may act on it to-day; but certainly we should do so before Monday.

Mr. SIMMONS. Has the bill been printed?

Mr. HUNTER. No, sir; it was only reported to-day.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope it will be printed before being acted upon. I think it is a very important bill.

Mr. HUNTER. I admit it is a very important bill. Of course, if any Senator insists on its going over, for the purpose of being printed, it must lie over and be printed. I will only say that, if we postpone it, in order to have it printed, we must sit to-morrow or the next day, so as to pass it, because it is indispensable that it should be acted on at an early day.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope we shall hear the bill read, and then we can judge of it.

Mr. HUNTER. It corresponds with the bill of 1847, with the exception of two provisions, which I can state briefly.

Mr. SEWARD. Then I can see no necessity for printing it.

Mr. KING. It would be better to have it printed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to see it printed. I do not want to vote for the issue of $20,000,000 of Treasury notes, to be kept in circulation as long as the Executive may think proper, without knowing exactly what I am doing. I should like to have the bill printed, so that we can read and understand it.

Mr. HUNTER. Of course, if the Senator insists on having it printed, it must go over.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to hearing it read.

Mr. HUNTER. Let it be read; but before the Secretary reads it, I will state the two points of difference between this bill and that of 1847. In the act of 1847 there was a provision for funding the Treasury notes. That provision is not in this bill. The impression is, that if it were put there they would be funded, and not perform the office desired. The other difference is as to the mode of putting them out. With the exception of $6,000,000, which will probably be wanted between now and the 1st of January, it is proposed that the residue shall be put out on public advertisement to the bidder, who will agree to take them at specie at the lowest rate of interest, so as to preserve the precise specie par between the notes and specie. These are the only two points of difference between this bill and the act of 1847. Perhaps the bill had better be read for the information of Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Do I understand the bill to be taken up for consideration?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No, sir. It is only on its first reading.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is it before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to hearing the bill read; but I shall certainly object to taking up for action a measure authorizing a debt of $20,000,000 to be incurred without any consideration. I think it altogether too important a matter to be treated in that way.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not desire to consume time. Any Senator, if he chooses, can have it laid over. Will the Senate agree to make it the special order for to-morrow, at one o'clock, and let us come here and dispose of it then? Of course it will be printed, under the rules of the Senate. Can we take it up for the purpose of making it the special order to-morrow, at one o'clock, and have it printed in the mean time?

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope no order will be made in regard to the bill until we have had an opportunity to read it. I think it very singular that when, on the 8th day of the month, there was a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, telling us that he had sufficient means within his control to last until the 30th of June next, and leave a balance of half a million at that time, he should, in seven days after, come in, without anything intervening that I know of, and ask for a loan of $20,000,000.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senator from Rhode Island will look at the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, he will find that the Secretary said he should ask for the issue of $20,000,000 of Treasury notes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not read the report all through, and that is the reason why I desire to read it and this bill before I act; but I have read the report as far as the figures go. I know that the Secretary of the Treasury reports that he had a balance in his hands, on the 1st of October, of about fourteen or fifteen million dollars. I know, also, that two thirds, or nearly three fourths, of the quarter in which he estimated that he should receive $12,250,000, had already passed before this report came in; and the amount received in that time, with the $15,000,000 he had on hand, would reach $27,000,000. I do not know how much he has expended: I do not profess to know, because I have not read the report. But he estimated the expenditures for the last nine months at fifty-one million dollars—about seventeen millions for three months. If the estimates that he made last week are right, he must have $10,000,000 to-day; but there may have been some extraordinary demands upon the Treasury. I know, from what I see in the newspapers, that he has purchased some two or three millions of the funded debt—I should think nearly three millions. That would leave six or seven millions. Now, I should like to make some inquiries; but I do not wish to be forced to place myself before the Senate in the position of catechising the chairman of the Committee on Finance on a subject of this kind until I have read the bill. I want to know what it is.

Mr. HUNTER. I am not asking the Senator to act on it now. I merely propose that we make it the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock, and have it printed. We can take it into consideration then. If the Senator from Rhode Island should think it proper to oppose the bill he can be heard, and the Senate can, if they choose, refuse to pass it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not willing to consent to anything until I can read the bill. I am ready to hear the bill read now for the information of Senators, but I do not like to have what a worthy Senator from Missouri [Mr. Benton] used to say was a "snap judgment," in the Senate. I desire a little time to read a bill of this magnitude. I want to know what is meant by continuing the issue of these $20,000,000 of Treasury notes. I do not know what that is yet.

Mr. SEWARD. I suppose that, unless by unanimous consent it be waived, every bill which is introduced must be read when it is first presented. I desire to hear this bill before we decide whether to take it up or otherwise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course any Senator has a right to call for the reading of the bill. It will be read.

The Secretary read the bill; and it was ordered to a second reading.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senator from Rhode Island objects to the bill being read a second time to-day, it must be laid over until to-morrow. I do not know that it is necessary to make it the special order, as, I presume, if I make a motion to-morrow to take it up, a majority of the Senate can take it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.
Mr. HUNTER. That being the rule, I give notice that I shall move at one o'clock to-morrow, or as soon as the morning business may be disposed of, to take up this bill for consideration. In the mean time, it will be printed under the rule.

ELECTION OF PUBLIC PRINTER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of one o'clock having arrived, the Senate will proceed, in pursuance of the order adopted yesterday, to elect a Public Printer.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Is it possible to amend the original resolution providing for the election of a Printer?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That cannot be done without a reconsideration of the original resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The amendment which I desire to have made is the addition of this proviso to the resolution:

Provided, however, That this election of a Public Printer is made on the express condition that the right is reserved in Congress to modify or repeal any or all existing laws on the subject of public printing if it shall be deemed proper, and that no loss or damage to the person or parties elected as Public Printer which may be alleged to have been sustained by reason of such modification or repeal shall be allowed as constituting any claim for indemnity against Congress.

The House of Representatives, I understand, attached a proviso of this kind to their resolution providing for the election of a Public Printer on their part; and this suggested to me the propriety of our pursuing the same course. It is quite possible that during the present session Congress may deem it proper to repeal or modify the existing printing laws.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that the only way for him to reach his object is by a reconsideration of the resolution adopted yesterday providing for the election of a Public Printer to-day at one o'clock.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I move to reconsider the vote by which that resolution was adopted, with a view of offering my amendment. The amendment is, I think, proper, if not absolutely necessary. I regard it as probable, though of course not certain, that our printing laws will be changed before the close of the present session of Congress. If we now elect a Public Printer, without reserving to ourselves the right to change the prices or make any other modification of the law, we may be precluded from making such changes hereafter; or at any rate it may be contended that we have entered into a contract which we cannot modify without the consent of the other party to it.

Mr. ALLEN. I offered the resolution which was adopted yesterday, and I second the motion for a reconsideration.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALLEN] is now before the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I offer the amendment which I read a few minutes ago. Perhaps the Senator from Rhode Island will accept it.

Mr. ALLEN. I accept the amendment.

Mr. STUART. I only desire to save what I think are the rights of Congress. So far as any inference may be drawn from this amendment that Congress without it would not have a full and unquestioned right to do what the amendment reserves, I entertain no doubt whatever. We have that right under the law as it stands. I have, however, no objection to the amendment. Hereafter if any question should arise as to printing that has been done heretofore, some argument might be drawn from the fact of our having taken this precaution. Against that I wish to protest.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Michigan has expressed precisely my views on this question. I think the power of Congress over the prices to be paid for the public printing is complete without any such proviso as that presented by the Senator from Arkansas. I have no objection to the proviso as a matter of precaution and to prevent our being troubled with claims hereafter; but the idea that because Congress appoints a Public Printer, and the rates for printing are established by law at the time of his election, Congress cannot by a subsequent law regulate those rates, is as unsound to my mind as it would be to say that Congress cannot regulate the fees of public officers of the United States throughout the country. So far as the salaries of the United States judges are concerned, I am aware that there is a constitutional provision preventing their diminution; but as to the fees of all other Federal officers, I suppose they are entirely within the power of Congress to be regulated as in its judgment may be deemed best at any time. We have entire control over the prices paid for public printing without this proviso.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I believe the proviso will do no harm. No doubt the protest entered, by the gentlemen will have great effect hereafter, and I think it is well they have put it in; but for greater caution, this proviso should be inserted. It is certain that the members of the House of Representatives have already adopted this course. I believe that it will leave us free without any room being left for the allegation that our hands are bound in the opinion of those who differ from the views of the gentlemen who have spoken. I wish to propose a further amendment to the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island, by striking out the words "to-morrow at one o'clock," and inserting "now."

Mr. ALLEN. I accept that.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted, as follows:

Ordered, That the Senate will now proceed to the election of a Public Printer, to do the public printing for the Thirty-Fifth Congress, in accordance with the eighth section of the "Act to provide for executing the public printing, and establishing the prices thereof, and for other purposes," approved the 29th of August, 1852: Provided, however, That this election of a Public Printer is made on the express condition that the right is reserved in Congress to modify or repeal any or all existing laws on the subject of public printing, if it shall be deemed proper; and that no loss or damage to the person or parties elected as Public Printer, which may be alleged to have been sustained by reason of such modification or repeal, shall be allowed as constituting any claim for indemnity against Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will please prepare their ballots for Public Printer.

The ballots were collected and canvassed, and the result about to be announced, when—

Mr. HAMLIN. I was out at the time of the balloting, but I suppose I have a right to vote. I rise for the purpose of inquiring whether I have that right?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rule, there is ground for presuming that a Senator is entitled to vote at any time before the result is announced; but the Chair thinks that after all the ballots have been deposited and counted it is not in order for any Senator to vote. The Chair, however, is not very conversant with the rules, and will be entirely under the control of the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. The vote has not been declared.

Mr. STUART. The Senator has a right to vote at any time before the result is announced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks otherwise; but he will submit the question to the Senate. Shall the Senator from Maine be permitted to vote?

The question was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I desire to state that I have not voted at all, and do not intend to vote on this question for reasons satisfactory to myself, but which I presume it is not necessary to state here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore announced the result, as follows:

Whole number of votes cast, 49; necessary to a choice, 25; of which

William A. Harris received.....	28
George M. Weston.....	18
John C. Rives.....	1
Cornelius Wendell.....	1
Blank.....	1

William A. Harris having received a majority of the votes cast, was declared to be duly elected Printer to the Senate for the Thirty-Fifth Congress.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. HUNTER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 17, 1857.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. A. G. CAROTHERS, of the Assembly's church.

DEATH OF HON. JOHN G. MONTGOMERY.

Mr. LEIDY. Mr. Speaker, it has become my duty to-day to announce to you and to this House the death of my immediate predecessor, the Hon. JOHN G. MONTGOMERY, a member elect of the Thirty-Fifth Congress for the twelfth district of the State of Pennsylvania. Mr. MONTGOMERY was born in Paradise, then in Northumberland county, in the State of Pennsylvania, in the year 1805. When he had attained a proper age—having pursued his preparatory studies in the vicinity of his home—he entered Washington College, in Washington county, at which institution he graduated with honor in 1824, I believe a member of the same class with Governor Wise, of Virginia.

Having completed his collegiate course, he immediately commenced the study of the law under the direction and instruction of the Hon. Alem Marr, formerly a member of this House, and a gentleman of deservedly high reputation as well for his legal learning and talents as for general intelligence. In the year 1826, he was admitted to practice in the several courts of Columbia county, and soon rose to an honorable standing in his profession. Shortly after his admission to the bar, he was appointed district attorney for the county of Columbia, and for several years continued to discharge the duties of that office with credit to himself and to the entire satisfaction of the public. He continued the practice of the law successfully, until the year 1855, when he reluctantly consented to become a candidate for member of the State Legislature; was nominated and elected; and so well did he discharge the duties of that office, so ably acquit himself as a legislator, that before the expiration of his first term, the public mind had fixed upon him as the next Representative for the district on this floor.

Immediately after his return from the Legislature, he was appointed a delegate to the Cincinnati Convention, in which he zealously labored for, and aided in, the nomination of our present Chief Magistrate, having been one of his earliest and firmest friends.

When the time for making a congressional nomination in the district arrived, he was nominated as the Democratic candidate for Congress for the twelfth district; and, at the ensuing election in October, 1856, was triumphantly elected by a majority exceeding 2,000; the largest majority which any candidate for Congress had received in the district for many years.

About the 1st of March, 1857, he visited Washington for the purpose of witnessing the ceremonies of the inauguration, and also of attending to the interests of his constituents at the organization of the new Administration; and while here, stopping at the National Hotel, contracted that mysterious disease which has proved fatal to so many of the sojourners in this city on that occasion. He remained here a few days after the first symptoms of the disease manifested themselves, and finding that he was still growing worse, he returned to his home in Danville, to avail himself of the kind attentions of his family, and the services of his family physician in whose skill he had the most unbounded confidence, in the hope of a speedy restoration to health. But in this he was disappointed; and after lingering for nearly two months, his disease baffling all medical skill, he departed this life on the 24th of April, 1857.

Mr. MONTGOMERY was a sound lawyer and able advocate, and well versed in all the general political questions of his day. He was fearless and free in the expression of his opinions, firm in his adherence to, and defense of, what he believed to be truth, and bold and uncompromising in combating error. He was a kind husband and father, a true friend, an estimable citizen, an honest man. I have thus briefly sketched so much of the history of his life and character as is proper for this time and place.

I may, however, be permitted to add, that, in the death of Mr. MONTGOMERY, not only have his family and friends suffered a most melancholy bereavement, but the people of his district, his constituents, who had so recently given him a most flattering testimonial of their confidence, have sustained a loss which they deeply feel and sincerely deplore. They have been deprived of the services of one whose eminent talents would have soon gained for him an honorable position on this floor, and whose integrity and social qualities would have secured for him the confidence and esteem of his fellow-members.

I stand not here to pronounce his eulogy; but, having known him intimately for many years, in all the relations of life, civil, social, and professional, I would here bear testimony to his worth as a citizen, his virtues as a man.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, at the time of his death, was about fifty-two years of age. He had entered upon public life with a mind well disciplined, and a judgment well matured, and with a constitution, physical and mental, which gave fair promise of many years of usefulness and honor. But, alas! how vain are all human expectations! How uncertain all human hopes! With the brightest prospects, and the highest hopes, in a day when he looked not for it, and in an hour when he thought not, he was stricken down by an unseen hand. The grave, which never saith "it is enough," claimed him as a victim. The dust has returned to dust, and the spirit has gone to God, who gave it. He is dead! How solemnly this brief sentence falls upon the ear! How great, how fearful the change which it indicates in the condition of its subject! Yet only a few more days, or a few more years, at most, shall have passed away, and other lips will pronounce, concerning each of us: "He is dead!"

Twice already, since our assembling here, have we been called upon in this solemn manner to remember that we are mortal; and to-day, for the third time, our thoughts are arrested and turned to the contemplation of death, the grave, and the future that lies beyond. May we all continually heed the solemn admonition, so oft repeated, "Be ye also ready."

I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the House have heard with deep and unfeigned regret of the death of the Hon. JOHN G. MONTGOMERY, a member elect of the Thirty-Fifth Congress, from the twelfth congressional district of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That, as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, the officers and members of this House will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That the Clerk forward to the family of the deceased a copy of these proceedings.

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, this House do now adjourn.

Mr. FLORENCE. The very limited acquaintance that I had with my deceased colleague, the Representative from the Luzerne district, hardly justifies me in rising at this time to say a word in seconding the resolutions. That short acquaintance, however, impressed me with the belief that, in the performance of the duties of a Representative of the people of his district, he would prove to have been a good selection—prove to be entirely competent and equal to the fulfillment of those important duties.

The suddenness of his decease, and the cause which produced it, made him almost a martyr, in political position, to the cause which he had espoused; coming here, as he did, to witness, to himself and to the whole people of Pennsylvania, an event in their history, to whatever party they may belong—the inauguration of a Pennsylvania President—he contracted during that joyous tribute to the distinguished gentleman who fills the President's chair, a disease which was the cause of his death. Sir, it warns us that in the midst of life, in the midst of health, surrounded though we may be with all the comforts of life, the unerring shafts of death may pierce us next. It admonishes us, "Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh."

I second the resolutions. I concur entirely in the tribute which has been paid to the memory of this distinguished gentleman, and regretting his decease, trust that the resolutions may pass.

Previously, however, without desiring to interfere improperly on this mournful occasion, I would propose, that when this House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I have no doubt at all that this gentleman deserved all the eulogies pronounced upon him by those who have addressed the House this morning; but, sir, I am impressed with the idea that to adjourn the House on account of the decease of a member elect to Congress who has never taken his seat, with whom none of us have ever associated here, and whom few, if any of us, residing out of Pennsylvania, or perhaps out of his district, have ever known, is certainly a wrong parliamentary precedent. It is the first time, during my congressional services, that the attempt has been made to fix the precedent of an adjournment of the House on account of the death of one who has never been sworn in as a member of Congress; and I throw out the suggestion that if the precedent has at any time been fixed, it ought not to have been so fixed. I know of no such instance within my recollection, but it may, nevertheless, have been done. I think, sir, with all due respect to the memory of the person who has died, that we ought to fix some limit. Gentlemen who were in the last Congress have departed this life. I can now call to mind two with whom I have served; and who, having been elected to this Congress, have departed this life before they came here. Now, sir, are we to adjourn from day to day, and from time to time, upon notice being given of the death of each of these gentlemen who have died? If so, we shall be upon the Christmas holidays before we shall get at the public business at all.

I desire the gentleman from Pennsylvania distinctly to understand that in making these suggestions, they do not spring from any indisposition to show all proper respect to the memory of the dead; but they do spring from a desire to get at the work for which we are convened, and for which we have left our homes and our families, and for the purpose of setting a proper parliamentary practice.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The proceedings now proposed are in conformity with the precedents of the House and of the Senate, ever since I have been a member of Congress. The gentleman from Kentucky is in error in respect to the precedents upon the subject. If the House should refuse to adjourn to-day, it would be the adoption of a new precedent. I think the old precedents were good; that it is due to the memory of the deceased, even if we never saw him; that it is due to the constituency who elected him, that we should adopt the resolutions. I hope that the House will conform to the precedents heretofore established, and honor the memory of the deceased by an adjournment.

Mr. ADRAIN. I concur in the remarks made by the honorable gentleman from Georgia. I have never had an acquaintance with the honorable gentleman whose decease has been announced this morning by his colleagues, and who ask, out of respect to his memory, that we shall adjourn. After that motion has been made, it is due to his memory, it is due to his colleagues, it is due to the great State of Pennsylvania, which he would have represented upon this floor, it is due to ourselves, out of respect to our own feelings and the occasion, that we should adjourn.

As I am a new member here, I know nothing in regard to the precedents upon the subject. It is not the time now to establish precedents. If it is proposed to adopt any other practice we may do it after we have passed these resolutions, and paid a proper tribute of respect to the memory of the deceased. We may then adopt some rule as to whether this House should adjourn or not, out of respect to the memory of a deceased member who has never taken his seat upon this floor. But, sir, this is not the time. I therefore heartily concur in the resolutions which have been offered, and shall sustain them by my vote.

Several MEMBERS. Withdraw the motion to adjourn over.

Mr. FLORENCE. I will withdraw the motion. Indeed, I made it from no want of respect to the memory of my deceased colleague. But, sir, aware it is the general practice to adjourn from Thursday until Monday, at this period of the session, I made the motion. It is known there is considerable dissatisfaction with the arrangements in this Hall, and I understand that, by Monday, other accommodations will be provided. I will have the candor to confess that I was actuated in making the motion partly by a desire to give members an opportunity to transact business at the Departments. As it seems to be the wish of gentlemen, however, that it should be withdrawn, I am willing to withdraw the motion to adjourn over.

Mr. LETCHER. I desire to have it done for this reason: I understand that there are several more deaths to be announced to the House, and it seems to me that if we adjourn over until Monday, two or three, and possibly four days, may be occupied next week with these announcements. I desire that we shall get to the business of the House; and it seems to me that there is no propriety in adjourning over if we have business to occupy our time to-morrow.

Mr. FLORENCE. I withdraw my motion. The resolutions were then unanimously adopted; and the House accordingly (at half past twelve o'clock, m.) adjourned until to-morrow, at twelve, m.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, December 18, 1857.

Prayer by Rev. STEPHEN P. HILL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HAMLIN presented a petition of the surviving soldiers of the third regiment, second brigade, of the eleventh division of Massachusetts militia in the last war with Great Britain, praying to be allowed bounty land; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of John Wentworth, of Maine, praying that the pension he now receives may be made to commence from the time of his discharge; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented the memorial of Rufus Dwinel, assignee of James Thomas, deceased, praying to be allowed interest on the amount of his claim; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Maine, in relation to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Dred Scott; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Maine, in favor of a law imposing severe penalties against the introduction or importation into this country of foreign paupers and criminals; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented the petition of John Pope, a captain in the Navy, praying to be allowed the difference between the pay he received and that allowed to the commander of a squadron, during the time he performed the duties of that station; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Maine, in relation to the bounty on cod fisheries; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Maine, in relation to the claims of citizens of the United States to indemnity for French spoiliations; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. KING presented the memorial of the legal representatives of Seth Belknap, praying for payment for work done on the fortification on Dauphin Island, in Mobile bay; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILSON presented resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts, in favor of the recognition of Hayti and Liberia as sovereign and independent States; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BIGLER presented the petition of Ann W. Butler, administratrix of General Richard Butler, complaining of what she thinks an unjust decision of the Court of Claims, on the claim of her intestate for money loaned and services rendered the United States, during the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BRIGHT presented the petition of Mary B. Renner, executrix of Daniel Renner, late of the firm of Renner & Heath, praying for compensation for property destroyed by the British in 1814; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HALE presented the petition of Eliphalet Brown, jr., a master's mate in the Japan expedition, praying for compensation for services rendered by him, as an artist, in that expedition; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

MOTIONS TO PRINT.

On motion of Mr. POLK, the memorials of the Legislature of Missouri, yesterday presented by him, were ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. BRIGHT, the bill yesterday introduced by Mr. PUGH, to provide for the improvement of navigation at the falls of the river Ohio, was ordered to be printed.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. DAVIS gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill for the establishment of a navy-yard at the harbor of Ship Island, in the Gulf of Mexico.

Mr. WRIGHT gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to continue the improvement of the harbor of Newark, New Jersey.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GREEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to bring in a bill (S. No. 14) to confirm the title in a certain tract of land in the State of Missouri to the heirs and legal representatives of Thomas Maddin, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred (with the papers now on file relative to the case) to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. DOUGLAS, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill (S. No. 15) to authorize the people of the Territory of Kansas to form a constitution and State government, preparatory to their admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GREEN, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill (S. No. 16) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States," approved March 3, 1849; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BRIGHT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to bring in a bill (S. No. 17) to divide the State of Indiana into two judicial districts; and to provide for holding the district and circuit courts of the United States therein; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. IVERSON submitted the following motion; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Ordered, That the reports and bills, together with the adverse reports, heretofore received from the Court of Claims and not finally acted upon; and the reports and bills, together with the adverse reports received from the Court of Claims on the 10th instant, be referred to the Committee on Claims, to consider and report thereon, and that said reports and bills be printed.

ISSUE OF A REGISTER.

Mr. GWIN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of issuing a register to the steamer Fearless.

BOOMBARDMENT OF GREYTOWN.

Mr. SEWARD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if compatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate copies of any correspondence which may have taken place between the Department of State and the Minister of Bremen, on the subject of claims for losses alleged to have been sustained by subjects of the Hanse-Towns at the bombardment of Greytown.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

On motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by him yesterday:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate all correspondence between himself or any of the Departments, and any Governor or other officer or person in the employment of the Government in Kansas Territory, not heretofore communicated, together with all orders and instructions which have been issued to the Governor of the said Territory, or any other officer or person in said Territory, in relation to Kansas affairs.

Mr. HUNTER. I shall not object to considering that resolution now, provided that at one o'clock the Senator will agree to lay it down in order to take up the Treasury note bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is a mere resolution of inquiry. I suppose there will be no debate upon it.

Mr. HUNTER. I have no objection to it.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PUGH. I intended, when the resolution of the Senator from Illinois was called up, to offer mine as an amendment; but it does not make any difference, if the Senate will oblige me by taking up the resolution which I submitted, directing the attention of the President to some documents connected with the Kansas question, which I deem important. I move to take up the resolution which I submitted yesterday.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate copies of the following documents:

1. Returns of the votes taken in Kansas Territory at the October election, 1856, upon the question of calling a convention to frame a constitution and State government.
2. Act of the Territorial Legislature (in obedience to that vote) calling such a convention, and providing for the apportionment and election of delegates to the same.
3. The census and registration of voters, by counties and precincts, as taken under that act.
4. The apportionment of delegates made upon the returns of such census and registration.
5. Returns of the election, by counties, for delegates to the convention.
6. Returns of the last election, by counties, for members of the Territorial Legislature and a Delegate to Congress.
7. Proclamations of the Governor or acting Governor upon the subject of the census, registration of voters, and the several elections heretofore specified.
8. Journal of the convention held at Leecompton to frame a constitution and State government.

Mr. PUGH. This resolution merely specifies what I want—the census, journal of the convention, &c. If there is no objection, I hope it will be passed.

Mr. BIGLER. I have no objection to the passage of the resolution itself, but it is proper to state that it calls for information which is not in the possession of the Departments. The resolution of the Senator from Illinois covers quite all there is, and even more. No parts of these records have been communicated to the Department here, except the executive minutes, and I believe the constitution of the State and the schedule, by the president of the constitutional convention. Whether the whole constitution has been communicated or not, I am not absolutely certain. The only difficulty about the resolution is, that we are asking in three resolutions for information which is not in the Department, when one resolution could obtain all there is.

Mr. PUGH. I shall not press the resolution after that suggestion.

Mr. BIGLER. Will the Senator permit it to lie over?

Mr. PUGH. Let it lie on the table for the present.

Mr. SEWARD. I suggest to the honorable Senator from Ohio, and also to the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, that if the resolution already passed covers all the papers there are, there can be no harm, no prejudice, resulting from passing the supplemental resolution calling for them in another form. If it should not cover all the papers, this will bring them out. I suppose the object on all sides is to have them. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio to persist in his resolution.

Mr. BIGLER. I have not the slightest objection to the passage of the resolution.

Mr. PUGH. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will give me his ear, I can let him understand what I want to find out. The resolution of the Senator from Illinois calls for the communications between the President and the executive authority of Kansas. That I wish to see. But I understand that the election for delegates was held in pursuance of a census and registration of voters, and an apportionment of delegates to the counties. It has been asserted, whether truly or not I am not able to say, that in nineteen counties of Kansas there was no census taken—not from the refusal of the inhabitants to be registered, but from the neglect of the Territorial Legislature to elect any sheriffs for those counties. If that be true, the convention was not a full representation of the people. If it be not true, it is important to those who are disposed to sustain the constitution that the falsity of such an accusation should be made apparent. That is what I wish to learn. It seems to me a vital fact worthy to be ascertained in some form. If the information is not here, I hope the President will direct the Governor or the Secretary of Kansas to get it for him. I have been loath to state the accusation, because I did not wish to give it before the proof; but that is the reason why I wish these papers.

Mr. BIGLER. I beg to say to the Senator from Ohio that I have no objection whatever to the passage of his resolution. I had occasion to call at the Department this morning, and in conversation discovered that no such information was on file; that no communication had been made by the late Governor on the subject at all, except so far as related to his own action. The documents for which the Senator calls are not there; but still I am in favor of the passage of the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. When, a few days since, I offered a resolution calling for the correspondence, orders, and instructions, in relation to the affairs of Kansas, I supposed everything was covered by that resolution which would aid us to appreciate the conduct of the Federal officers, and to understand the facts bearing upon the question now under discussion in relation to Kansas. If I thought there was anything in the Executive Departments which would add to the comprehension, the just understanding of the subject, and which had not been called for, I certainly should not hesitate to extend the call on the least intimation that it might be productive of such result. I do not, however, believe that anything has been omitted. I think, if the President communicates fairly and fully, as I confidently believe he will, all that is called for in the resolution offered by me, and adopted by the Senate, that he will give us whatever the Governor of Kansas has communicated to him, whether in relation to the census, the election of officers, the returns, and all else which bears on the question of the legitimacy of this convention. But I desire that every Senator shall take that read which will satisfy his own mind that he has reached all the information attainable upon the subject. I trust we are to treat this question as just men, as men who have a duty to the country and to the Constitution. I wish nothing to be withheld or evaded, and trust that those Senators who act with me will allow any Senator to propose every inquiry which he thinks proper to suggest, and urges as conducive to a more thorough comprehension of the merits of the issues presented in connection with the Territory of Kansas.

Mr. PUGH. My attention has not been called to the resolution of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. Davis,] although I heard him offer it, and intended, at the time, to make inquiry of him on the subject. Yesterday, when the Senator from Illinois introduced his resolution, I intended to offer mine as an amendment. I should have moved it this morning, but I was engaged at the moment in conversation with another Senator. If my friend from Mississippi thinks his resolution covers the ground, I have no desire to press it or embarrass the matter in any way.

Mr. DAVIS. I think my resolution covers it; but if it does, this resolution will do no harm; and if it does not, this may bring out something which mine does not reach.

The resolution was agreed to.

DEATH OF HON. J. G. MONTGOMERY.

This message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. J. C. ALLEN, their Clerk:

Mr. President: I am directed by the House of Representatives to communicate to the Senate information of the death of the Hon. JOHN G. MONTGOMERY, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Pennsylvania, and the proceedings of the House thereon.

Mr. BIGLER. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the Hon. JOHN G. MONTGOMERY, deceased, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, will go into mourning by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

The people of the twelfth congressional district of Pennsylvania had chosen JOHN G. MONTGOMERY to represent them in the Thirty-Fifth Congress of the United States; but death interposed to prevent the execution of their will.

Mr. MONTGOMERY died at his residence, in Danville, in the county of Montour, Pennsylvania, on the 23d of April last, in the fifty-second year of his age. He was one of the victims of that singular and destructive epidemic which appeared at the National Hotel during the months of February and March last. He had left his home, in full health and with a cheerful spirit, to witness the consummation of his most cherished political desires in the inauguration of a President to whose promotion he had devoted his most ardent efforts. But the fatal epidemic soon drove him from the scene of his enjoyment, and he returned to his home, depressed in mind and afflicted in body, where he endured an incessant agony, only terminated by death.

He has left an amiable family, with a large circle of relatives and friends to lament his untimely end, and to unite their regrets with that of the intelligent and excellent constituency which had committed their interests to his protection.

Mr. MONTGOMERY was born in the county of Northumberland, Pennsylvania, in the year 1805, of highly respectable parents, whose virtuous examples and wise precepts he followed in after life. He graduated at Washington College, in his native State, about the year 1824, with more than ordinary distinction; and subsequently studied the law in the office, and under the tuition, of ALEM MARR, then a distinguished lawyer of the Northumberland bar. He commenced the practice of the law in 1827, and devoted himself exclusively to that profession until 1855, when he was induced by his friends to accept an election to the State Legislature, where, in a single session, he distinguished himself for ability, integrity, industry, and zeal in promoting the welfare of his constituency. In the line of his profession he had acquired an eminent reputation for candor and honor and sound judgment, and especially for counsels which looked more to the establishment of justice than to the increase of litigation. Plain and unpretending in his style of oratory, yet the peculiar directness with which he reached his point, with the correctness and sincerity of his manner, never failed to make a strong impression upon the tribunal and the auditory to which he addressed himself. As a private citizen, his life was such as to gain for him the affection and the honors of which I have spoken, as was fitting testified by the weeping circle which stood around his grave.

I will be pardoned for having thus spoken of one who was my cherished friend. Had he taken his place in the national councils, your own knowledge would have supplied these comments; his worth and virtues would have been reflected amongst you, and his loss would have enhanced the grief with which recent bereavements have afflicted this body.

But the distress of his friends was the more poignant, and their resignation the more reluctant, because of the terrible and mysterious nature of the disease which caused his death. Whether it arose from a miasmatic exhalation, or was the studied plot of some fiend to cut off, by mineral poison, the highest and most honored citizens of the land, involved the question whether his loss should be mourned as the victim of a natural and inevitable cause, or whether it should be vindicated by investigation at the hands of justice.

Public judgment remains still in suspense as to the character and origin of this disease. It seems to have baffled the speculations of science and the testimony of experience, and will, probably, remain forever a mystery. But it was no ordinary visitation, originating in the habits or localities of the filthy and vicious, and spending its wrath upon misery and wretchedness. It came like "a thief in the night," like the destroyer "that walketh in darkness and wasteth at noonday," or like the special mission of the "destroying angel," as if intended, indeed, to teach more emphatically the great lesson that neither wealth, nor genius, nor station, can exempt man from the common incident of mortality. It seized and prostrated the most gifted and loved in the land, and many now mingle their tears for worth, genius, beauty, and excellence stricken down by this fell and malignant destroyer. Happy all if as well fitted to meet their doom as that friend whose loss we now deplore.

But the career of my lamented friend was consistent to its close. In all the duties and relations of life he was without reproach. He had established a good reputation as a pure and estimable citizen, and was about to enter upon a new sphere of action, the labor and responsibilities of which those who hear me will bear witness are more than equal to its dubious honors, or its fleeting joys. That he has been summoned from the trials and vexations of representative life to the peace appointed for the just, is a loss to his country, but none to himself.

To those whose grief is yet inconsolable—to the people who had committed their rights and interests to his trust, I offer the sincere sympathy of one who loved him, and looked forward with pleasure to his counsels and to his support, through the labors and trials of the Congress just begun.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

TREASURY NOTES.

On motion of Mr. HUNTER, the bill (S. No. 13) to authorize the issue of Treasury notes was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HUNTER. I remarked yesterday that this bill corresponded with the bill of 1847, which is similar in its main provisions with all the Treasury note bills passed since 1837, with two exceptions: One exception consists in striking out the funding provision which existed in the bill of 1847. That is not to be found in this bill for the reason that if put in, it was apprehended the notes would be funded and converted into a loan, and for the further reason that an inconvenience was found lately when we were redeeming the public stock from that clause which existed in the bill of 1847. The holder of the note, instead of claiming what the law designed only to give him—what was due on its face—first funded it into stock under that provision, and then claimed a premium on the stock.

There is yet another difference. According to the laws which have been heretofore passed, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President, has been allowed to fix, at his own discretion, a rate of interest not exceeding six per cent., thus leaving it to his sagacity to determine whether the note, when issued, should be equivalent to specie at par. This bill provides that he may raise $6,000,000 in the old method, because about that sum will probably be wanted between now and the 1st of January; but, in regard to the residue, he is to advertise, upon notice of not less than thirty days, for bidders, who will agree to exchange specie at par for these notes at the lowest rate of interest—thus taking the most certain method within his power to ascertain precisely what will be the specie par of the note, and thus accomplish exactly the purpose which he has in view—that is, not to make the interest so high that the notes will be hoarded as an investment, and not to make it so low that they will be below their par value as specie, and thus come into the Treasury in payment of the revenue.

These are the only points of essential difference between this bill and the bill of 1847. The bill of 1837, as well as I can recollect, did not contain a funding provision. I think the bill of 1847 was peculiar in that regard. However, I will not be positive as to that matter.

In regard to the necessity for this measure, we know that the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report informed us that he should require $20,000,000; and although he estimated that in addition to the balance in the Treasury, he might receive money enough from the existing sources of revenue to meet the demands on him, yet he did not believe we should receive that money in time to meet those demands. Experience is showing us daily that we shall not do so. It seems to be supposed that if there should be a revival of trade, the full tide and flow will not come in until the last of April or the first of May. Although his estimates may be right in the whole, when we reach the commencement of the next fiscal year, yet experience shows that we shall be probably in want of this money to relieve the Treasury before that time. In other words, it is enabling him to use those means which the British Treasury have found so useful, by issuing notes called exchequer notes, which enable them to anticipate their revenue. If, on the other hand, it should turn out that he is mistaken, and will not receive as much revenue as he supposes, still greater will be the necessity for an issue of something like this amount; that is, for using the credit of the Government for a limited amount, for the purpose of supplying its temporary wants. If, however, it should turn out that the want is not temporary but permanent, then will be the time, if ever, to discuss whether there should be other means used in order to replenish the Treasury.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, that, owing to the derangement of commercial affairs and the collection of the revenues consequent upon it, there is a necessity for an issue of Treasury notes to relieve the Treasury, I think is clear enough; that it is commercially desirable that such an issue of Treasury notes should be made in this conjuncture, I believe is also true; but, on looking over this bill, during what little time I have had to bestow on it this morning, it strikes me that it ought to be guarded in two or three particulars, to which I wish to call the attention of the Committee on Finance.

In the first place, it is not proposed, and it is not necessary to create a permanent debt. If it were, this mode of issuing Treasury notes is not the way to create such a debt. The way to do that is to raise a loan. I assume, therefore, that it is the expectation of the Treasury, and the intention of the committee, and will be the purpose of Congress, merely to make a temporary issue of these notes for this immediate occasion only. Now, this bill has no limitation as to time, if I read it correctly. It will stand forever when it is passed, or until the whole amount of twenty millions shall have been issued by the Secretary of the Treasury, though the period of ten years should have elapsed. In other words, if the Treasury should be filled up in April, or May, or June, with the proceeds of the revenues, still this act will stand in force on the statute-book. It seems to me, therefore, that it ought to have a limitation of time. The question then is, what time? For myself, as well as I can understand the present signs of the times, I expect that the revenues to be collected during the present year will meet all the demands of the year; and, therefore, I should think it expedient to limit the bill to that period; but this may be a mistake. No one can make any sure calculation on that subject. But it is very certain that there will be a Congress here next year as there is now, and it would seem to me, therefore, that there is no necessity for anticipating the continuance of the present difficulty beyond the beginning of the next session of Congress. I would suggest, therefore, that this bill be limited, so far as relates to the issue of the Treasury notes, until the beginning of the next session of Congress, when Congress will be here, and can decide on it, and continue it in force if it shall be necessary.

In the second place, in regard to the amount: we want $6,000,000 now, but we are unable to say that we shall want $20,000,000 in all. We shall be here for a period of four or five months, and can test the extent of this want. I should think it would be quite sufficient to authorize an issue of $10,000,000 instead of $20,000,000. I suppose all will agree that the smallest issue ought to be made which can be made, because it is to inaugurate a feature in the fiscal system of the country which must not be permanent, and ought to be indulged in as sparingly as possible.

I am not so tenacious about the amount as I am about another matter, and that is, that this bill contemplates allowing too high a rate of interest. It contemplates that the Treasury notes, in order to raise the money, may require to bear an interest of six per cent. I do not think the credit of the United States will, at any time within the next year, be any less strong than it is now. The United States six per cent. stocks payable in 1867 sell at $112 in the market to-day. The interest is six per cent. for one year, and it sells for $112. If I understand it, you may take off the six per cent. interest, and then sell the note at par. The stock is redeemable in 1867, but that makes no difference, because the notes would enter more readily into exchange than stock redeemable in ten years. It is very certain that if the rate of interest shall be such as to render it at all desirable for investment, this money will immediately go into investments, instead of going into commercial circulation, and the great object which the commercial world has in the issue of the notes at all now is that they may be used for the purpose of exchange, while the exchanges of the country are deranged, owing to the fact that the resumption of specie payments is not yet universally and firmly established.

I suggest, therefore, that it would be safe to limit this rate of interest to four per cent. I have no doubt that that rate would command all the money of which the Government has need. Although it is true that the bill contemplates in both cases that the rate shall be fixed at less in the first instance by the decision of the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Treasury on examination of the market, and as regards the subsequent issues by sale in market overt, yet the offering of a loan of six per cent. when a four per cent. loan would answer the same purpose, will have a tendency to increase the prices which will be determined on in either case. I am not aware that I am right in these suggestions, but I throw them out for the consideration of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and the Senate.

Mr. HUNTER. I shall say but a few words as to the objections of the Senator from New York. First, he objects because there is not some limitation of time as to when the notes shall be called in.

Mr. SEWARD. No, sir; what I spoke of was the time in which they may be issued. The bill has no limitation in that respect.

Mr. HUNTER. If all he wishes to attain is to limit the time within which they shall be issued, and he will give until the next meeting of Congress, I will agree to it. I will only say that no such limitation has ever been imposed in a Treasury note bill before; because if they were not issued Congress could at any time stop the issue, and if they were issued it has the privilege, within one year, of redeeming them. But still I have no objection to limiting the time within which they shall be issued, if that is what the Senator desires.

Mr. SEWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUNTER. Next in regard to the amount: the Senator thinks the amount is too large, and that $10,000,000 will be enough. I will suggest to him—experience has shown—that in the operations of our Treasury we require a surplus of at least $6,000,000. We require also, as a Mint fund, $6,000,000; making altogether $12,000,000. The difference between $12,000,000 and $20,000,000, is only $8,000,000, which sum is to be used in the payment of our debts. We have already exhausted the surplus usually kept to work the Treasury Department, and are now operating on the Mint fund, very much to the detriment of the coinage operations and some of the great interests of the country. It inconveniences the Mint very much.

We have, in addition to this, the experience of the Secretary of the Treasury—who I am sure would not desire to issue a dollar more than was necessary, and who will not use his power beyond what is needful, to the extent of a dollar—to justify us in the belief that it will be safe to issue this amount. We know that the surplus has been rapidly diminishing. Ever since the suspension of specie payments by the banks, the expenditures have exceeded the receipts so largely as to diminish the surplus to a sum I believe now not much exceeding $5,000,000. We have large payments to meet by the 1st of January. It will require, we are inclined to think, something like $6,000,000 to meet the payments which will fall due between now and the 1st of January. We have, then, to replace the fund required for the operation of the Mint, and also the surplus that is necessary to enable us to work the Treasury Department safely and easily. It is not a creditable state of things for the Treasury to be forced to have the requisitions delayed; to delay the time of payment to those employed by it, on account of its being cramped by the want of means. By the use of our credit, to a limited extent, which will enable us to anticipate receipts that are to come into the Treasury, we may be enabled to avoid all these inconveniences.

Next as to the rate of interest. This bill corresponds in that respect with all the bills which have been passed since 1837. I have no idea that the Secretary of the Treasury will find it necessary to issue any note at the rate of six per cent. I think, according to the best information which he has received, he will try the market with the notes at three per cent. But, sir, in regard to the first $6,000,000, we have, as I said before, to depend on the sagacity of the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain what interest will make the notes equal with specie. With regard to the residue, we have a more certain and sure means: we try the market, and we give each note to the man who will give specie for it at the lowest rate of interest. We thus give the note precisely that character which the Senator from New York desires—we place it in a condition in which it will probably be equal to specie. We place it in a position in which, at the same time that we obtain the money for the Government at the lowest rate of interest, we offer incidentally to the merchant and to the banks a great advantage in Treasury paper of this sort, which is equivalent to specie. Especially is it an advantage at this time, when the banks are engaged in the laudable effort to resume specie payments; because, if any fluctuation of commercial affairs should take place, so as to make the exchanges play on the specie fund of the country, they will be enabled to resort, to a certain extent, to this paper, and, so far as the Treasury is concerned, to pay the dues, and thus have an easier and a speedier use of the specie resources of the country.

This mode, which ascertains as precisely and accurately as is within our power the precise rate of interest which will keep the note at a par with specie, commends itself to our consideration for two reasons: first, that it is the cheapest mode by which the Government can raise the money; that is, it raises it at the lowest rate of interest; and in the next place, while we thus benefit the Government, we afford incidentally the best aid we can afford to commerce, and to those banks which are attempting to resume specie payments; because, if you adopt such a rate of interest as will keep these notes at par with specie, they will circulate along with specie, having the same value. They will neither be hoarded for investment, nor paid, in preference to specie, into the Treasury of the United States, except in certain cases where it may be found to afford great relief. As I said before, if the exchanges shall play on the specie fund of this country, and cause its exportation, it will be then that these notes will be used in payment of the revenue. I learn that there have been at least three instances in which six per cent. Treasury notes have been paid into the Treasury in payment of Government revenue, showing the assistance and advantage which a measure like this afforded to commerce in times of trouble. I say, therefore, that, when the banks are engaged in a laudable effort to resume specie payment, this form of Treasury note is that which will be more likely to aid them, at the same time that it is best for the United States, looking only to the interest of the Treasury itself.

In regard to the rate of interest, I have thought it better to follow the old precedents. It is exactly the mode prescribed in all the Treasury note bills since 1837. I find, in reference to the practical operation of the law, that, since that period, double as many notes have been issued at six per cent. as at any other rate, and that they have been at par at all rates of interest from six per cent. down to a mill, at various times. It seems to me, then, that it is better, in this instance, to stand by the precedents—not that I believe it will be necessary to put on them a larger rate of interest than three per cent., nor that any larger rate will be put on the first $6,000,000; and in regard to the rest, the bill itself affords the best means of ascertaining the precise rate of interest which should be put on them, that is by advertising and putting them out to the lowest bidder.

Mr. SEWARD. I am very happy indeed to find that there is no substantial disagreement between the honorable Senator from Virginia and myself in regard to the questions which have been discussed between us, and that our views of the operation of the bill are precisely alike. Now, in regard to the question of time to which this issue of Treasury notes shall be limited, the honorable Senator certainly agrees that it ought to be limited to the exigency of the case. There is no reason for anticipating a necessity for the continued issue of these notes beyond the meeting of the next session of Congress. Some time must be limited, for it will not do, I think, to place on the statute-book an authority which the Secretary of the Treasury may use hereafter to issue Treasury notes at his pleasure, without the knowledge and consent of Congress. I will, therefore, adhere to the suggestion I made to limit the time for issuing notes until the next meeting of Congress.

Mr. HUNTER. Say the 1st of January, 1859.

Mr. SEWARD. Very well. We do not substantially differ in principle in regard to the amount, though the Senator thinks my suggestion of limiting the amount to $10,000,000 will be inexpedient. We shall certainly know during the present session of Congress whether we are to require an issue of $20,000,000, and I incline to think it is enough to limit the issue to the amount of $10,000,000, which will probably cover all the wants of the Treasury during the present session of Congress, about which, however, I am willing to be further advised.

In regard to the rate of interest, I think these Treasury notes might be sold at par in the market, if they bear an interest of four per cent. The honorable Senator thinks (and his information is more likely to be accurate than mine) that they will sell at par with an interest of only three per cent. I still think, with deference to him, that placing them at an interest so much above what is probable will be the rate at which they can be sold, will have a tendency to increase the rate of interest which will be exacted by the purchaser. I therefore incline to think that it will be as well to limit the rate of interest to four per cent., and to give notice to the financiers of the country, and to the public at large, that the United States will not pay more than four per cent. per annum for money which is to be repayable in notes of fifty dollars each, and within one year from the date of issue.

To all these amendments the honorable Senator interposes a general objection that this is a departure from the bills which have been previously passed on similar occasions; but then the honorable Senator will agree at once that there has never been a time when the Government of the United States has resorted to these measures under circumstances so peculiar as this. It has resorted to the measure heretofore as a measure of revenue.

Mr. HUNTER. Will the Senator allow me to give him the fact? I adverted to the history of the issue of Treasury notes. I have here a list of all the Treasury note issues made since 1837, and the rate of interest. I find that since that time the amount of Treasury notes at six per cent. is upwards of fifty million dollars. Of the issue of five per cent. Treasury notes, the amount has been $5,000,000. Next to that are the notes issued at an interest of one mill. I find, therefore, that, in point of fact, experience has shown that much the larger quantity of notes issued have borne the rate of six per cent. For that reason it seems to me safe to keep within the limit heretofore prescribed, although I do not believe that there will be a note issued now for more than three per cent.

Mr. SEWARD. I do not think, on reflection, that there will be a note issued at three per cent. It is my impression that the notes will go off at the rate of one or two per cent. interest, and I should not be surprised if they were to go at half of one per cent.

But why shall we conform our practice now to precedents set on former occasions? Those were times when the whole commercial business of the country, as well as the revenues of the Government were disordered and deranged, and these measures were resorted to, not to anticipate collections expected to bring money immediately into the Treasury, but for the purposes of revenue; they were in fact, if not in form, permanent loans. But this is a convulsion in the commercial business of the country that is without precedent. Here we have had the banks within the United States suspend specie payment, according to the general conviction of this country and of Europe, without any necessity whatever, except the occurrence of a panic, unreasonable and blind. We have had, during the time of the entire period of the suspension of specie payments, not a day when specie was worth more than one half of one per cent. above the depreciated and dishonored notes of the suspended banks themselves, and we have had that suspension of specie payment limited and wound up and payments resumed again within sixty days from the time of the suspension. This is but a temporary interruption in the business of the Government. It is but a temporary shock to the credit of the country. Let us frame our bill, then, according to the actual exigencies of the case. I do not know that it will be very material on this occasion, but what we do to-day will be referred to as a precedent on future occasions, just as we are to-day consulting the forms in which the same relief was given on former occasions.

Since, then, we agree in the first place, that there is no necessity for anticipating a continuance of this system beyond the next session of Congress, I will adhere to my motion to limit the time for the issue of Treasury notes to the 1st day of January, 1859; and in the second place to the proposition to reduce the amount to $10,000,000; and in the third place to reduce the highest rate of interest payable, to four per cent. I am of opinion that the honorable Senator will find that with these amendments his bill will more readily pass, and that it will answer all the exigencies of the Treasury, and satisfy the public mind. I make the motion, in the first place, on the proposition as to time. My amendment is to add to the first section:

Provided, That no such Treasury notes shall be issued after the 1st day of January, 1859.

Mr. HUNTER. It ought to contain a further provision, "that nothing herein contained shall prevent the reissue of those notes already issued."

Mr. SEWARD. I accept that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope the Senator from New York will not accept that amendment, because it will defeat the very object which I understand him to have in view. If there is power remaining to issue the Treasury notes as fast as may be found convenient by the Government, they may keep the $20,000,000 out for an indefinite period of time. I take it for granted that the object of the Senator from New York in moving the amendment, about which we conversed early this morning, was to prevent both the issue and the reissue after a given length of time. If in fact this measure is to meet a temporary want of the Government, and if it is true that the necessity is to cease by the ordinary course of revenue, in a certain period, there can surely be no necessity for retaining in the bill a power to reissue these notes for an indefinite time.

The Senator from Virginia, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, will observe that in the bill which was passed in 1847, and which was strictly a loan bill to meet the then exigencies of the Government, the power of the President to issue the notes was limited to six months after the close of the Mexican war. That met my attention after this bill was read; and I saw at once, as I thought, that unless it was designed to make this a permanent system, and to give power to the Government to have a permanent loan of $20,000,000, and keep it out just as long as might suit its convenience and to meet all contingencies, it would be necessary to fix some limitation. The only question in my mind was, what ought that limitation to be? That depends upon the necessity of the case, on the principle assumed. The Secretary of the Treasury calls for the power to issue these notes on the ground that this is a temporary expedient, and he says the revenues of the Government will be sufficient to meet all the wants of the Government in a very short time.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not wish a permanent authority given; I am willing to limit it. I will agree that it shall be limited to the 1st of January, provided the reissue of the notes is not to be prevented within that time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection to that. I prepared an amendment to meet this object, and wished to add it to the tenth section of the bill. That section now reads:

That in place of such Treasury notes as may have been paid and redeemed, other Treasury notes to the same amount may be issued: Provided, That the aggregate sum outstanding, under the authority of this act, shall at no time exceed $20,000,000.

My amendment is to add the words:

And provided further, That the power to issue Treasury notes, conferred on the President of the United States by this act, shall cease and determine on the 1st day of January, 1859.

The first section provides for the redemption within the year, and this section, the tenth, gives express power to reissue; and, consequently, as the amendment only provides against the power to issue them after a given period, the power to reissue exists during that period, and there will be no need of the modification which the Senator from Virginia suggests.

Mr. HUNTER. I think that would be the best place to put it.

Mr. SEWARD. Very well; I withdraw my amendment, and accept the substitute offered by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. SIMMONS. Before the question is taken on the amendment, I should like, as I intimated yesterday, to state some of the objections I have to this form of relieving the Treasury. I said yesterday, that I felt great reluctance in addressing the Senate on a subject of this importance without preparation. It necessarily involves a review of the suggestions and recommendations of the President's message, and of the Treasury report—two documents prepared with great care, written in an admirable spirit, and for which I hold both parties in profound respect. But I think they contain provisions and recommendations unsound in their nature, and ill adapted to the business of this country; recommendations that I believe will lead to further complications and embarrassments instead of relief; and therefore I propose, and am obliged to examine these recommendations, in order to present to the Senate any tolerable view of my own opinions upon them.

I know of no questions that can be presented to the consideration of a body like this more delicate in their nature and more extensive in their consequences than the relations of men as debtor and creditor. These relations extend throughout civilized society, and they are various in their character, and require extreme caution in their examination. The President of the United States has suggested with great propriety, and brought our attention to the consideration of, the state of the times; he laments, as we all do, the embarrassments of business, the prostration of labor in the departments of mechanics and manufactures, and their utter destitution and want; and he says, for the first time that I have ever heard so great a catastrophe attributed to such a cause, that it is solely occasioned by our vicious system of paper currency. Well, now, sir, I have lived in the walks of business, in an humble sphere, for a great many years; I have seen many revulsions; but I have seen none so wide sweeping and destructive as that through which we are now passing. In this I entirely disagree with the honorable Senator from New York. This results from no foolish, unfounded notion—it lies at the foundation of wealth and prosperity among men. I know that the English journals attribute the disaster and distress in this country to a mere idle panic; I know they considered themselves altogether beyond its reach and influence; and they said the Americans would soon be over it; but in a very few days I found that our "cousins" abroad began to share of the same cup of which we had been drinking.

Mr. President, as I understand the condition of our Government, it is similar to the condition of individuals and States and communities. We have bought more than we have been able to pay for. Now, I am going to examine with the utmost attention that I am able to bestow in the short space of time allowed me, the foundations on which the President of the United States has, in his message, based the opinion that the present disastrous revulsion has been caused by the vicious expansion and contraction of the currency of this country by the banks. If he has been misled or mistaken as to the cause of the evil, we are bound to believe that he would not have suggested the remedy which is proposed. If we find that the causes are to be found in elements entirely opposite to those suggested by him, we are bound in fairness to conclude that an entirely opposite remedy from that which he has proposed should be applied. I shall not now examine the immediate operation of this bill; for I will say to the Senator from Virginia that I do not believe in holding public officers too strictly to their estimates. If the state of the Treasury, no matter from what cause, requires something of this kind, and if the Senator will so arrange the bill as to make it a temporary measure, to carry us over a hard place, I have no objection to it; but if it is to be made part and parcel of a system of measures, such as have been suggested, ignoring all the means of improvement and redress to which, during the whole history of this Government, we have been in the habit of looking, I must object to it at the outset.

I have adverted to the great importance of the relation of debtor and creditor. I shall say nothing as to the delicate relations of debtor and creditor existing between private individuals, and I suppose the President did not mean to allude to them. There are other instances of this relation which it is for us to consider—the relation of debtor and creditor between communities, between States, and between nations. I would here suggest to Senators an old, unanswered maxim, said to have been given by the wisest man of our race, that the borrower is always the servant of the lender. In my experience, having generally been the servant of the capitalist in this respect, so far as I know, a creditor is a hard master. I believe that this nation is now suffering under the lash of such a master by reason of a vicious policy. We have bought more than we have sold, and the action of the Government has tended to produce this result.

When we come to consider the sources of wealth, the means of extricating ourselves from difficulty, every statesman looks to labor—productive labor. No ingenuity in framing Treasury notes or bank notes will liquidate our debts. We must look to that exhaustless source of wealth, the labor of the people, extracting it from the bowels of the earth, and fabricating it into forms essential for society. What we save over and above that which is consumed by this labor is aggregated from century to century, and forms the wealth of the world. There is no other means of wealth. Commerce is not a source of wealth. It is an instrument to transmit the productions of one country to others, for consumption. Trade is not a source of wealth. Look at our society, and you find that three fourths of the population of the United States is engaged in productive labor. The other fourth is engaged in exchanging the products of this labor, in keeping the accounts of these exchanges, and in foreign commerce, which, so far as navigation is concerned, adds to our wealth by the freights earned, by carrying the productions to the consumer. The statistics show, in the aggregate, that three fourths of our people are engaged in agriculture, manufactures, and the mechanic arts—in fact, in providing food and clothing and shelter for man. These are necessities, and these are all the employments that make a man's labor more productive to himself and to the world. The others are employed in exchanges, in keeping accounts, and instructing men in the ordinary branches of education and in piety and morals—all useful. You must, however, look for your source of wealth only to those engaged in productive labor. The others promote the comfort and happiness of the world in matters not necessary. I do not mean to exclude them from the benefits they enjoy, but I wish to speak in behalf of the laboring men of this country. In a time like this I dislike to see these expedients about paper resorted to for the purpose of relieving us from a calamity that makes honest, willing labor seek your tables for bread. I have a right to ask Senators to consider the condition of this labor, and to consider what it has done for the other classes of society, and what it would now do if the opportunity were afforded. If you look to the consumption of all that is produced by the efforts of men in the United States of America, I venture to assert that the one fourth of the people engaged in active pursuits, who do not produce anything for the sustenance of society, consume more annually than the whole three fourths of the people engaged in producing the means of subsistence.

I think, then, that the people who do the labor of the country have a right to claim our deliberate attention when we are providing measures to escape from the present condition of things; and I am sure they will have this attention on the part of the Senate. I make no appeal to what is called the popular current of public sentiment. I mean to speak candidly and frankly what I believe; and whether it be popular or unpopular, I care not the weight of one feather; but I wish to have imputed to me nothing but an honest purpose in what I say.

Sir, I do not believe there is any great mystery in political economy. I never did believe there was any great mystery in the affairs of human government. I have been in the habit of reading from one of the fathers of the Republic, Mr. Jefferson. In the first movements of this people to be rid of the dominion of the British Crown, an address was drawn up by Mr. Jefferson to be presented to George III., and in the body of that petition, as it was called, this sentence was found:

"The true art of governing is the art of being honest, and to acquire that does not need the advice of many counselors."

That is my notion. I do not wish to read a great many books about government, or to take much counsel as to how men shall get their living. I have been in the habit of getting my living by the plow, which is as honest a way as any I know; and I have done something in other pursuits.

The President of the United States, as I have said, attributes the present financial distress to the action of the banks. I have before me the bank returns so far as they are to be found in the archives of the Senate, and I ask the attention of Senators to what these returns disclose; for I suppose they are precisely those on which the President has formed his opinion. I am astonished that, on such data, any officer of the United States Government should propose to change the policy of the country, and to overturn a system of measures which I regard as more essential to our advancement to wealth and distinction now, than at any period of our history. The President has also alluded to the operation of the Bank of England in 1825, to illustrate his position that national banks cannot regulate the currency. When I come to that point I shall call attention to a little piece of English history to show how England acted when she undertook to review her system; but I wish now to see whether there has, within the last year, been any alarming increase of the paper currency of our fourteen hundred "irresponsible" banks, as they are called by the President.

He tells us that this calamity has come upon us because the currency of the country is in the control of fourteen hundred "irresponsible" banks. I should like to know in what sense the President uses this term. If he means that the banks chartered by the States are "irresponsible" to this Government, I admit it; for they were not created by this Government, and have nothing to do with it. If he means that the fourteen thousand persons who control them—there being, on an average, ten directors to each bank—are irresponsible men, I take issue with him. In my deliberate judgment, these fourteen thousand directors, controlling the affairs of these fourteen hundred institutions, are as responsible and reliable as any fourteen thousand men who can be found in the country, so far as their pecuniary condition or their position in society is concerned.

In the first place, I desire the Senate to understand what I suppose to be the relation of the banks to society. So far as they are banks of issue, they are responsible to the public; they are public institutions affecting the interests and business of the country. Every Legislature in the land holds them to a strict account for the manner in which they exercise this public function of furnishing a currency for the community in which they are located, and I believe they generally exercise this power with a view to the general good of the community for whose benefit they have been created. The aggregate number of banks in the several States, according to the returns before us, was, in 1856, thirteen hundred and ninety-eight—near enough, for all practical purposes, to the President's fourteen hundred. The aggregate circulation of our banks in 1854, was $204,689,207; in 1855, $186,952,223; in 1856, $195,747,950. The circulation last year was less than it was three years ago. Surely there is no inflation here. The circulation in each of these years was so nearly uniform that it can hardly be considered that any change has taken place since 1854. A deduction, however, must be made from the figures that I have given, for bank notes held by the banks themselves. This leaves the actual amount of currency furnished by the banks to the people in 1854, $182,030,141; in 1855, $163,522,705; in 1856, $170,968,903. This was the actual amount of currency furnished by these fourteen hundred institutions for the transfer of the products of labor from the producer to the consumer. The President suggests that the banks should be required to have in their vaults specie to the amount of one third their circulation to make the currency reliable. The returns show that the actual coin held by the banks was, in 1854, $59,410,253; in 1855, $53,944,546; in 1856, $59,314,063. Add to these sums the amount of specie funds held by the banks, consisting of drafts on the sub-Treasury and other assets equivalent to specie, and we have the actual quantity of specie and specie funds held by the banks to be, in 1854, $84,989,506; in 1855, $75,880,984; in 1856, $79,250,773; showing that they had specie to the amount of nearly half their currency all the time on hand for the redemption of their bills.

I know that it is an easy matter to excite a feeling of aversion to the banking institutions, because, as banks of issue, they sustain the relation of debtors to the community; they owe the people more than they have the immediate means of paying, but their operations in another capacity—as banks of discount, where the community is debtor to them—present another aspect.

The amount due to the banks, by their individual debtors, including the stocks held by them, was, in 1854, $601,748,109; in 1855, $628,871,840; in 1856, $683,668,495. During the same period, all the indebtedness of the banks, including their deposits and the remainder of their circulation, amounted, in 1854, to $285,229,379; in 1855, to $278,042,763; in 1856, to $304,422,790. This shows that the community owe to the banks more than the banks owe to them. In considering the conduct of the banks, the question is, whether they have pursued their debtors far enough to make their circulation sound? They can only redeem their circulation by calling in their debts, and this they have done. By calling in their debts, and thus contracting their accommodations, they create ill feeling among those who are their debtors. It is easy for any one operating on public sentiment, to give force to this ill feeling towards these institutions. The President speaks of them only as banks of issue; but he must know, and every man must know, that they can only pay coin for the demands on them by further contracting their accommodations to the community.

But I shall not dwell longer on this point. I know that there is nothing in the figures which will justify anybody in concluding that the banks have improperly inflated or contracted the currency, except, perhaps, during the present troubles, and in regard to them we have no returns. Then this particular feature, to which the President has attributed the present revulsion, fails him.

It is a question which has much exercised the attention of men, how far the issues of banks and the currency of a country affect its general business and the prices of productions. In 1832, the charter of the Bank of England being about to expire, a committee of secrecy was appointed to examine the affairs of that institution, with a view of making any new provisions that might be necessary in the constitution of the bank. The committee consisted of Lord Viscount Althorp, Sir Robert Peel, Baronet, Lord John Russell, Mr. Goulburn, Sir James Graham, Baronet, Mr. Herries, Mr. Poulett Thomson, Mr. Courtenay, Colonel Maberly, Sir Henry Parnell, Baronet, Mr. Vernon Smith, Mr. John Smith, Mr. Roberts, Sir Matthew Ridley, Baronet, Mr. Attwood, Sir John Newport, Baronet, Mr. Baring, Mr. Irving, Mr. Warburton, Mr. George Phillips, Mr. James Morrison, Lord Viscount Morpeth, Mr. Lawley, Sir John Wrottesley, Baronet, Lord Cavendish, Mr. Alderman Wood, Mr. Strutt, Mr. Bonham Carter, Mr. Edward John Stanley, and Mr. Alderman Thompson. The committee examined the officers of the Bank of England, and the presidents of the local banks, and the private bankers, and the whole examination is contained in a folio volume of six hundred and seventy pages. This volume contains information as to the effect of the currency on the prices of every leading article of produce, and the effect of the Bank of England on all the relations of society, so far as could be ascertained. The result was the recharter of the bank, without any material alteration in its former constitution or charter, I believe.

The President tells us that a national bank can do nothing towards regulating the currency and keeping it uniform, because we had two such national institutions and they did not do it. Everybody must recollect, however, that for the forty years we had a national institution, with a view of regulating the currency, we had no suspension of specie payments. He further says, that the Bank of England, in 1825, in its effort to contract the paper circulation of the country banks, utterly failed, and that as fast as the Bank of England contracted its own issues, the country banks issued their own notes to supply the vacuum. When this part of the message was read, it struck me as one of the most singular statements I had ever heard. I happened to be in business that year, and profess to be acquainted with some of the causes which led to the revulsion in England then, and they are precisely the causes which have led to the present revulsion here. The difference between the cases is, that England was then our debtor, now we are debtors to her. The English speculated to a large extent in our great staples. I recollect that at that time I bought on speculation, the only cotton which I ever bought to sell. Knowing that I was engaged in purchasing sea island cotton for my own use, a cautious merchant, knowing the effect of appearing in the market as a speculator, offered me half the profits of the transaction if I would go into the market in Providence, and buy all the sea island cotton there. I bought in the month of December, 1824, on his statement to me that it was lower than he had ever known it to be, in comparison with the short cotton, and there was news that the sea island crop was cut off by storms. I paid twenty-seven cents a pound for the best of that cotton, and it was sold to a Savannah cotton factor to go back to Savannah, at seventy cents a pound, and he resold it to English speculators. We made more than one hundred and thirty dollars a bale on it, and it went to England with a further profit added to that. If anybody can find wilder speculation than this, I should like to see the instance. England then bought more than she could pay for, and was in debt to us, but we did not experience any great trouble from that revulsion. There is no trouble in any revulsion, except that you may lose part of your profits, if you are yourself out of debt.

I have examined the condition of the Bank of England in 1825, to see whether the President was not misled as to the efforts of that bank during those troubles. I was surprised to hear the assertion that an institution like the Bank of England, under a charter, and with powers from the English nation from the foundation of their constitutional Government, was not able to regulate the currency. The constitutional privileges and powers of the British Government were embodied into form in the reign of William III., in 1688, and the charter of the Bank of England was granted in 1693. I suppose that to be one of the reasons why our forefathers, being descended from England, soon after making our Constitution, established a national bank, in conformity with the usages of their ancestors. That is my notion; but, whatever may be its origin, every man who has read the history of the last sixty or seventy years knows, that in the struggle through which England went from 1797 (when she ordered the issue of pound notes, passed a restriction act to prevent her bank from paying coin, and resolved on a paper currency to carry on her internal trade and sustain her finances, in conjunction with her policy of protection for her national industry—a system of measures which excited the jealousy of nearly all Europe) to 1815—the end of this struggle—her system of banking and currency, and her system of protection to labor, carried her successfully through a war with an embattled continent, an achievement the world had never seen for magnitude. He will not talk about the Bank of England being unable, in time of peace, to control the circulation of the country banks. With a system of currency, and finance, and protection, such as no other nation had then enjoyed, England triumphed, although her enemies were led by a captain such as the world had never seen. I do not say he was the greatest general, for I believe we have had one greater, but, as a captain, the world never witnessed a man like Napoleon Bonaparte; yet the British, from their little island—but a speck, as it were, in the ocean—went through this war, against the combined Powers of the continent, and carried their commercial system as triumphantly as they did their arms. It appears to me singular that a man who has read her history can say that an institution which has accomplished wonders like these was not able to control the issues of the country banks of England.

Mr. President, I have no great partiality for England, but if there is anything that makes me proud of being descended from Englishmen, it is the spirit they manifested in this apparently unequal contest. Sir, I glory in being descended from Old England. Those who fought at Agincourt and Cressy, at Trafalgar and the Nile—not this modern kind of England, not this shop-keeping, cent-per-cent kind of England, that they have now-a-days. Look at the recent orders of the First Lord of the Treasury—Lord Palmerston. He says to the Bank of England, “you may transcend the law, you may issue more than you have a right to do under the charter, and we will bring in an act of indemnity; but do not issue at less than ten per cent., and the Government and bank will agree on a division of the spoils.” That is the kind of England that I do not like—not-shaving England. I shall not, however, comment on England. I suppose we are no way concerned about them, except to pay what we owe them and avoid getting in their debt again. That is my doctrine.

If I am not mistaken, any man who will read the book to which I have alluded, containing the testimony obtained by the English committee of secrecy, will have an utter detestation of these little modern notions about regulating currency and trade by exacting usurious rates of interest. The Bank of England year commences on the 1st of March, and ends on the 28th of February. The returns are made up semi-annually, on the 28th of February and 31st of August; but in 1825, there being an unusual condition of things, there were three returns during the year. On the 28th of February, 1825, the circulation of the bank was £20,753,760, and the deposits £10,168,780. The securities held by the bank, or, as we call them, the loans and discounts, were, to the Government, £19,447,588; and to individuals, £5,503,742; and the amount of coin, £8,779,100. Multiply these figures by five and you reduce them to our currency. The bank had about forty million dollars of coin and over one hundred million of notes in circulation, and it held the paper of private individuals to the amount of $25,000,000, and of Government to the amount of $100,000,000. The President, on another point, has fallen into as great an error in regard to the present law as he has in regard to the conduct of the bank in 1825; but, perhaps, it is of no consequence for me to advert to it. He says there is a prevailing sentiment in England that the bank must have coin to the amount at least of one third its immediate liabilities, including deposits. That is a mistake. There never was any such restriction on banking institutions that I ever heard of, except those in Louisiana, and I never heard of that until the President alluded to it in his message.

On the 31st of August, 1825, the circulation of the Bank of England was £19,398,840, very nearly the same as it was six months before. The loans were to the Government, £17,414,566; and to individuals, £7,691,464. The Bank of England disposed of its government stock and loaned the money to the people. That is the way they help the people.

In December, 1825, the revulsion had almost attained its culminating point. In the beginning of the year, the immediate liabilities of the bank were £30,922,540, and the coin on hand to meet them was £8,779,100. In August, the immediate liabilities were £25,809,400, and the coin on hand £3,634,320. These figures are plain enough, and they show how the bank was acting. You will see by examining this book that the country banks were pressed for coin, and the Bank of England sent it to them, and asked them to send the bills home, and they would pay them with coin. By and by, a severer pressure came. In August, as I have said, the liabilities were over £25,000,000, and the coin between £3,000,000 and £4,000,000. In December, 1825, the liabilities increased to £32,403,000, and the coin had been reduced to £1,027,000. Thus, instead of having one pound in specie for three pounds in liabilities, they had but one pound for thirty-two pounds.

When the crisis came to such a pass that England was experiencing pretty much the revulsion which we have had for the last three months, the Government interposed. At no period during that revulsion did the Bank of England ask more than five per cent.; but the Government interposed because credit had become so prostrated that the people could find no merchants to give them acceptances on their produce. You will see how the Government applied to the bank to relieve the public, and you will see the replies of the directors when the Secretary reads from the appendix of this book what I have marked.

The Secretary read:

APPENDIX No. 4.

The following are the only communications received from Government in 1825-6, proposing any guarantee for advances made by the bank upon any securities whatever:

AT A COURT OF DIRECTORS AT THE BANK,
Tuesday, December 13, 1825.

The Governor laid before the court the following note from the First Lord of the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, viz:

In order to relieve the present distress in the money market, the First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer are prepared to give immediate directions for the purchase of £300,000 Exchequer bills, in addition to the £200,000 which, they understand, the bank directed to be purchased yesterday.

If it should be thought, however, more advisable that the whole £500,000 should be purchased by the bank on their own account, the First Lord of the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be prepared, if the bank should require it, immediately to redeem the same.

LIVERPOOL,
FREDERICK JOHN ROBINSON.

TREASURY CHAMBERS, December 13, 1825.

Resolved, That the Governor be authorized to order the purchase of Exchequer bills to the amount of £500,000 upon the conditions specified therein.

AT A COURT OF DIRECTORS AT THE BANK,
Thursday, February 16, 1826.

The Governor laid before the court the following letter from the First Lord of the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, viz:

FIVE HOUSE, February 14, 1826.

GENTLEMEN: Under all the circumstances of the present distress in the city and country, it appears to us that it would be advantageous, with a view to public and private credit, if the bank were to give directions for the purchase of Exchequer bills to the amount of £2,000,000.

If the bank shall agree to this proposal, we engage to submit to Parliament the necessary measures for the repayment of the same between this period and the 14th of June next.

We have the honor to be, gentlemen, your most obedient servants,
LIVERPOOL,
FREDERICK JOHN ROBINSON.
To the GOVERNOR and DEPUTY GOVERNOR of the Bank of England.

Resolved, That the Governor be authorized to purchase Exchequer bills to an amount not exceeding £2,000,000, on condition that the repayment be made within four months.

At a COURT OF DIRECTORS AT THE BANK,
Tuesday, February 28, 1826.

The Governor laid before the court the following letter and memorandum from Lord Liverpool and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, viz:

FIFE HOUSE, February 28, 1826.

GENTLEMEN: In order to prevent any misapprehension upon the subject of our discussion yesterday, we think it right to transmit to you the inclosed memorandum, explanatory of the several points which we then brought under your consideration.

We have the honor to be, gentlemen, your most obedient, humble servants,
LIVERPOOL,
F. J. ROBINSON.

The GOVERNOR and DEPUTY GOVERNOR of the Bank.

MEMORANDUM.

1. In the event of the bank consenting to advance money upon the security of goods, under the present circumstances of the country, it is understood that these advances should not exceed the sum of three millions in the whole.

2. That, assimilating the principle of these advances to advances made in the ordinary course of discount upon bills of exchange, they shall be subject to repayment in three months.

3. The Government to propose to Parliament that the provisions of the act respecting merchant and factor, which will be in force in October next, shall be brought into immediate operation, in respect to any goods which may be pledged to the bank under the proposed arrangement.

4. If the bank should think proper to make advances in conformity to these suggestions, the Government engage to submit to Parliament the necessary measures for enabling them to reduce the present amount of the advances of the bank to the Government, by a repayment of six millions; such repayment to be made as soon as may be practicable, and, at all events, before the close of the present session of Parliament.

Resolved, That this court, having distinctly understood the determination of his Majesty's Government not to make any advances for the relief of the commercial distress now prevailing, reluctantly consent to undertake the measure proposed, to an extent not exceeding three millions, upon the terms and conditions expressed in the communication of the First Lord of the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

NOTE.—All other advances made by the bank, either upon purchase of Exchequer bills, or by discount of commercial bills, were exclusively upon the responsibility of the bank.
JOHN KNIGHT, Secretary.

BANK OF ENGLAND, June 9, 1832.

Mr. SIMMONS. During the whole time when the President says the Bank of England was trying to contract the issues of the country banks, and was not able to do it, you will find that the issues of the country banks did not exceed their circulation in 1818—seven years before this time—by the amount of more than two per cent. It will thus be seen that the only effort of the Bank of England was to relieve the community from impending distress. The returns show that on the 28th of February, 1826, the loans by the bank to the Government were £20,573,258, and to private individuals, £12,345,322; while a year before that time the loans to the public were £19,447,588, and to private individuals, £5,503,742. Here, during that year, was an increase to private borrowers of nearly £7,000,000, or $35,000,000 for their relief during this pressure, and at the end of that year their coin was only £2,459,510, while their whole liabilities were £32,403,850.

I say that the President has been misled in supposing that any such effort as that of which he speaks was made by the Bank of England. He has been misled, also, in supposing that the catastrophe here has been caused by any expansion or contraction of our banks. It is as clear as the noonday sun, if the papers which I have presented prove anything, that a national bank is entirely efficient to correct those disasters and get over them in the best possible manner. I am bound to believe, that if the President of the United States had supposed the cause of the present revulsion was not a diseased condition of the monetary system of the country, he would have looked somewhere else for it.

Let me ask the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] what change has taken place in our relations to foreign countries within the past year, except the change in the tariff made in March last? Did we not then take off on an average one fourth of the duties that operated as a barrier against excessive importations? It was believed then, and urged in the debates at the time, that if we did not reduce the duties, the accumulations in the sub-Treasury would be so great as to produce a monetary revulsion. When a proposition is presented to me for action I desire to know what is intended to be relieved by it, and what is intended to be produced by it, and then, if I find it adapted to the purpose, I most cordially approve it. This is no party question; no platform is interfered with by regulating the business and exchanges of the country, to get them into the best shape we can. I say, that on the plea of preventing a monetary revulsion, the Government of the United States changed its commercial system in a night. The change was hurried through without examination. The consequences were not considered. That was the addition of the last feather which breaks the camel's back. To avoid a revulsion, we opened the flood-gates to importations, and in sixty or ninety days afterwards we were bankrupt, and now the Treasury is bankrupt, according to its own showing. I thought yesterday the Secretary of the Treasury had made out a pretty good showing, but it seems that he is not going to come out right, and I shall not criticise his figures.

Mr. President, the only way to correct the evils under which we are laboring, so far as this Government is concerned, is to put your commercial system on such a basis that it shall be reciprocal between this and other countries. I am so much a free trader as to agree to any system that will produce reciprocal commerce and exchanges of products, but when we import a hundred millions a year more than we export we are in a bad condition. You may, by issuing Treasury notes and railroad bonds and State bonds and Government stocks, postpone the day of payment, but the result is inevitable, and it is your destruction, and subservience to the power to which you are indebted.

England has given up the notion of obtaining an ascendancy over us by arms. She tried that for some time, but we have some trophies at the navy-yard here, which I looked at twenty-five years ago, that satisfied me then that she would change her course. The British lion, with his paw on the globe, is a trophy to the frigate United States and to the Government and people of the United States. I thought, when I first saw this, England would take some other course than fighting with us. She means to have the commercial ascendancy in the world, and every effort we have made since she has undertaken that policy has been playing into her hands so as to give her the advantage over us. I hope we are not to persist forever in this fatal course.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in a letter which was read yesterday, says, as a sort of excuse for this issuing of Treasury notes, that he has funds in abeyance, duties to be received from goods now in warehouse. Twenty-six or thirty million dollars' worth of goods are now in warehouse, on which six millions or more of duties ought to be paid. Then why not say at once, in a joint resolution, that foreign goods in warehouse shall be entered and the duties paid, or else the goods shall be shipped abroad within sixty days. Is not that the simple way of meeting the case? Why should we go to borrow money in order to give credit to those foreign producers? When the tariff was altered last March, you were very careful to insert a provision, that although goods might have been imported and warehoused under the former tariff, they could be entered at the reduced rates after July 1.

Every provision you have made during the last ten years has had the effect of throwing your gates wide open for the sale of foreign goods to embarrass your own producers. I have not seen one of your tariff bills passed in that time which has not contained such provisions. You value the goods abroad; you will not value them at home. There is some constitutional difficulty in the way of valuing them where you can see them; and in order to value them you must go where you cannot see them. [Laughter.] That is the doctrine preached here as if it were holy writ. How do you value the goods abroad? For that purpose you fix the legal value of the pound sterling at $4 80. If you look at any of the prices current for years past you will find that an eagle brings in England thirty-nine shillings and six pence, or about that.

In England a half eagle will bring within three pence, or six cents, of a pound sterling. Why not say that the goods shall be valued at what they cost in American coin? Your valuation is five or six per cent. below that, but it would not be altered if it were forty per cent. below; but if it were made one per cent. too high, you would have all the German Jews in the country memorializing you to interpose and alter it.

During the last ten years, you have made no effort to counteract the policy of England, which is, to obtain the commercial ascendancy of the world. People think now that we are going to get coin from England, and they withhold their crops. England has been distressed the last three years about staples for textile fabrics. They have tried to colonize Africa, and have been looking for cotton all over the world. It is my judgment that a portion of this effort on their part has been with a view of commanding that great staple cotton, for it had got too high, as everybody knows. Our planters have become rich, and have held their cotton, and they are holding it now, for coin to come from England to buy it; but you cannot get a remittance of gold from England to this country, but they will turn the screws, and take twice as much back within three weeks. I venture to say there is not an American merchant doing business in London or Liverpool who can negotiate a bill at their banks, if there is a probability, or even a possibility, of coin being sent to the United States. Every return says there is no difficulty in getting money, except, perhaps, for the purpose of sending it to America. France has had more wisdom than the United States, and she has been reaping a harvest the last five years. She has not gone into free trade; and if there were no other recommendation for Louis Napoleon, this would go far towards covering up some defects that I do not think it proper to mention in the Senate.

Now, Mr. President, I say, in all soberness and earnestness, that I think we ought to make a temporary measure of this bill. I dislike the manner in which it has originated. If it be a loan, it ought to contain a provision for the redemption of the loan. If I were now to offer an amendment that would look first to raising a sinking fund for the redemption of these notes, and next to keeping out some of these gewgaws that have got us into debt, gentlemen would say that it was unconstitutional, for such a measure could not originate in the Senate. You cannot amend this bill as it ought to be amended, if it originates here. This is another objection.

Then I have doubts as to the propriety of issuing Government paper as a currency. I do not pretend to say that it is clearly unconstitutional; but, if any faith is to be placed in the reasoning of the President, it is one of the most objectionable forms of providing a currency—much more objectionable than that which he proposes to correct, and which he intimates is not constitutional, on account of that provision which prohibits a State from emitting bills of credit. I think anybody who has read the history of our country may know what the fathers of the Republic meant when they prohibited the States from issuing bills of credit, or making anything but gold and silver coin a tender for the payment of debts. We know that during the revolutionary war, and the period anterior to the formation of the Constitution, this country was cursed with an irredeemable paper currency, issued by the States and by Congress, called continental money, and made a tender for the payment of debts. Why did the framers of the Constitution mean to prevent this? They did not mean that anything should circulate as money, the payment of which could not be enforced by the individual holding it in the legal tribunals of the country. Can you enforce the payment of one of these Treasury notes? No more than you could enforce the payment of a bond from this Government. You cannot enforce the payment of a note issued by a State. You cannot sue a State. Rhode Island, which was one of the last States to adopt the Constitution, and one of the most lavish in paper money, because she used it to pay her soldiers, and had more soldiers, in proportion to territory, than any other State, adopted the Constitution in 1790 or 1791; and one of the first acts of the General Assembly, immediately afterwards, was to create a bank to issue paper money. That bank is in existence to-day. It is one of those "irresponsible" institutions of which the President speaks.

its first board of directors contained three or four men who spilled the first blood of the Revolution; for, say what you will, the beginning of the Revolution was the capture and burning of the Gaspee, and the contest in which Lieutenant Dudgeon was wounded.

What do we mean when we say anything is unconstitutional? We construe the Constitution in two ways. We do not say that this Government must be prohibited from doing a thing in order to make it unconstitutional, because we construe the Constitution as a delegation of power, and we are bound by what it delegates to us. If it does not delegate the power to issue paper money, we have not that power. The Constitution restricts the States because they act in an independent capacity. It is clear to me that this measure is hardly constitutional. But suppose it is not so; what then?

The President and Secretary of the Treasury tell us they are going to correct this paper money evil by having a bankrupt law applied to these corporations. I should like to see them frame such an act, consistently with the Constitution of the United States. I agree you have a general power to make a uniform system of bankruptcy; but I desire to know whether gentlemen here, who construe the Constitution as I have been in the habit of hearing it construed in this Chamber by those who profess to understand it, mean to put institutions created by your State and by my State within the power and under the control of this General Government. I believe that when the head of this Government addresses Kentucky on that subject, and says, "take care, Kentucky!" she will say, in the quaint language of her early settler, "Let those take care who are afraid." If she should rise, as I believe old Daniel Boone is represented, with a rifle on his arm, and if this Government should say, "lay down your arms," she would reply, "come and take them." Much of a Union man as I am, I would sympathize with the States that had thus replied to such menacing orders, and not with those who gave them.

Mr. President, you may talk as you choose about new fashioned modes of construing the Constitution and the doctrines which it contains; but I think the old rule, laid down by that brilliant light in the judiciary, Judge Marshall, will never be bettered. He says that "the jurisdiction of a State" (meaning the jurisdiction of individual States, and of the United States, as a nation,) "extends over everything within its limits, that exists by its authority, or is introduced by its permission." Whether this be controverted in the Dred Scott decision or in a bank decision, I say that whatever exists within the limits of the United States, from the Arrostook to the Rio Grande, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific, if it exists by the authority of the United States, under the Constitution of the United States, it is under the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States, and I do not care whether it be slavery or a bank. In my deliberate judgment, when you undertake to say that slavery goes anywhere by virtue of this Government or its Constitution, you inevitably place it within the jurisdiction of this Government. My notion is, that slavery exists, wherever it exists at all, not by the authority of the Constitution or Government of the United States, and that it is not introduced, wherever it exists, by permission of that Constitution; and for that reason I can conscientiously say to those States who do establish it, and within whose jurisdiction it is, "Take care of it yourselves. If you do anything else you will complicate the question, and it will get to be worse than the web which Penelope undertook to unravel every night, and nobody will know where or when it will end."

When the President undertakes to put any of the institutions of South Carolina under his order of bankruptcy, he will find himself brought up with a short turn. A bankrupt law has no more to do with an institution of a State than it has to do with anything in Venice. It can act upon persons, and it may possibly act upon legal persons; but it cannot be made special; it must be uniform in its operation. I believe that I read in 1841 the sentence of Judge Marshall to which I have referred, and I have never seen the book since. It occurred in a decision on a conflict of jurisdiction between the State of Maryland and the Bank of the United States. All I read of it was that single sentence, and I shall never forget it. That is the only decision, or part of one, that I ever read in my life, except the recent Dred Scott decision. I satisfied myself how the case was decided, without reading the whole opinion of Judge Marshall. I knew the result would be that the Bank of the United States, established in Maryland, did not exist there by the authority of Maryland; was not introduced there by the permission of Maryland; and that, therefore, Maryland had nothing to do with it. So it ought to be in regard to the complicated questions we are discussing at this time. If slavery exists in Kansas, or anywhere else, by virtue of the Constitution of the United States, we can control it; but I say it does not exist anywhere by the proper vigor of that instrument. It existed in some of the States when that instrument was made, and it has been extended under the jurisdiction of different States, and we have nothing to do with it.

I say that the bankrupt law suggested by the President, and the other measures which he has intimated as the means of extricating us from our present difficulties, are entirely inadequate, and rather calculated to do evil than good. I have no kind of doubt that a bank funded as the Bank of England is, and as many banks in this country are—a national institution, with Government securities as the basis of the circulation, to a certain extent, and coin for the remainder—could be made without any constitutional objection, and without affecting anybody's feelings, or his past opinions.

As reference has been made to the new charter of the Bank of England, it may not be improper for me to say that the new feature of that charter, requiring a certain proportion of coin, came from a distinguished American statesman who has often graced the halls of the Senate, and who prepared a plan of currency while he was in another department of the Government.

When I was told this feature would be ingrafted, I expressed the opinion, and it has turned out since to be true, that the first time England lacked corn the bank would break, for hunger will go through a stone wall; no matter how many regulations you may have in bank charters, you cannot stop it. That was the cause of the bank suspension here in 1837. It is a remarkable fact, which I suppose will hardly be believed twenty years hence, that in 1837 our wheat crop failed, and we imported ten million dollars worth of wheat to feed us. That, with other causes of drain on the bank vaults, produced the suspension. There were other reasons for it. The Government that year had forty-five or fifty million dollars deposited in the deposit banks. After allowing any bank to take the deposits on giving a little interest for them, a law was passed distributing the money of the Treasury among the States. Both these measures were operating together; and just before, we were importing grain. If this was not enough to break the banks, I do not know what could do it. It was not the tariff, as my friend from New York might suppose; but the cause was over importation. I know that the compromise tariff of 1833 created great division of sentiment among friends; but from the time of its inception and passage here until it expired, I was always its advocate. I never believed we wanted very high rates of duty. The revulsion which took place in 1834 had no more to do with the tariff of 1832 than the Doge has to do with what is going on in Venice to-day. That revulsion was produced by a quarrel between the Bank of the United States and the Government. The adjustment created by the compromise tariff of 1833 did not take effect till January 1, 1834, and it did not cause the revulsion of 1834. I have known a great many of the tariff presses and speakers of the country attribute all our disasters to that abominable bill which reduced the duties so low; but I have never yet seen the man who could tell me what were the duties on the leading articles of imports protected by the tariff of 1832 and reduced by the compromise in the years when we had the revulsions.

I know that the Senator from New York will not imagine that I am saying anything against him, for I do not believe there is any man living who has done more than he to exalt the just fame of the author of that tariff, [Henry Clay.] He loved him as I did. When this Administration shall have wasted all these husks of party, which can give no relief to the country, I hope they will do as the prodigal did of old when he had spent all—return to the house of their fathers. Let them do this, and we will welcome them. Let us go back to the point whence we started when we commenced the contest for the preservation of our own industry against the pauper labor of Europe. I do not ask that you shall do this by high duties. I will say to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, (if the distinguished Senator from Virginia is entitled to that appellation here,) that, if he will ascertain the probable amount of exports and imports of the United States for the next five or six years, and tell us the amount of revenue he desires to raise, and if he will spread the duties uniformly over such articles as compete with our own productions, I will go for such a bill, provided it has a clause in it to prevent frauds on the revenue. I believe that since the author of the tariff of 1846 left the Treasury Department, no man has filled it who has not called the attention of Congress to the almost invariable practice of fraud in the importations. Mr. Guthrie, in every report of his, I believe, called the attention of Congress to the necessity of some measure to prevent fraudulent undervaluations of imports. This is an important matter for honest merchants, and every patriotic man ought to desire some improvement for the sake of the morals of the country. Do we not know that the business of importing textile fabrics, in the valuation of which the most fraud can be practiced upon the Government, is now in the hands of foreigners, who have driven from the trade the honest American importer?

If the Senator from Virginia had, two years ago, devoted as much industry to the perfection of measures to protect this Government from fraud, as he devotes now to getting us over this hard place in the finances, he would never have had any revulsion; there would have been no suspension of specie payment; he would have had no cause to call on us to resort to this doubtful mode of replenishing the Treasury. I am told that the last Secretary of the Treasury said that the English and German manufacturers of the fooleries which our people buy to such an extent, import them at about half the legal rate of duties. We now export about $300,000,000 worth of produce, and import $400,000,000. They get $300,000,000 worth of raw materials from us, such as they want. They send us $400,000,000 worth of goods, and we must pay them the difference. They take $50,000,000 in gold and silver, the products of our mines. They take $25,000,000 in pretty good State stocks, and they take the further $25,000,000 in anything we may have to offer—railroad bonds, mortgages, or anything else. For they defraud the Government to about the amount of this last $25,000,000. I lament this condition of things.

If I had time I would illustrate my views as to the relation of debtor and creditor, to which I have already alluded. The principal importing city in the country is the center of its monetary system. That is the place where the exchanges are carried on between this country and foreign countries. Necessarily, in its ambition to be the sole point for exchanges, it is always tending to increase the facilities for importation and exportation. Railroads are built, from New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Boston, as rivals for the foreign trade. The people of these cities pay a good deal of money towards making the roads, the western people pay a little, and the rest is obtained by making a parcel of paper kites for Wall street to buffet about and make money out of. There are fifty-eight banks in New York city, and they are called upon to furnish the means necessary to carry on the importations. If I were a manufacturer in England or Germany, and shipped $1,000,000 worth of goods to New York in the year, I would take in return $750,000 in produce, as much as I could get in coin, which would be about one eighth, as much as I could get in State stocks, and then I would take the balance in shinplasters. I would not break down the market, because I should wish to make a profit. The only reason why an honest man cannot be an importer now is, that he will be cut under in the valuation by the German Jews.

During this revulsion, I have seen some very patronizing letters from the President of the Bank of Commerce, in New York, to a Boston banker, trying to get the Boston banks to shorten the time which the securities have to run on which they make their loans. The true secret of the ability of banks to meet their engagements, is to have everything which they hold as securities of a marketable value. If their loans are based on securities having a market value, they are sure to meet their engagements. Coin always has a market value. Railroad stocks and State bonds have a market value as remittances. If they loan to a broker $500,000 on call, with railroad stocks as collateral, as soon as a demand comes from England they give him notice that the stocks are to be sold if he does not pay, or the banks will make a bargain for them with the foreign merchant. This often results in the bank and the broker fixing a price, and letting them go across the water to pay for importations. These call loans are no loans at all for business. A man cannot sail a ship with them. They would not enable him to carry on any kind of business that required any considerable time in waiting for the return of his labor. This making call loans is one reason why the banks of New York city have had such great control over the entire currency of the country. They make a scarcity of money that puts everybody else tributary to them. It is their interest to do so. It is the interest of the city of New York to continue its commercial ascendancy in this country. If you want institutions to regulate your currency, you must have an institution under the government of men having no such local rivalry or jealousy, but would as soon discount in Wisconsin to get a crop to market, as in New York to pay for a cargo of British goods. It should be the purpose of a bank to aid in carrying the products of labor from the place of production to the place of consumption; and the banks would do that if they had no local interest to sustain, and there was no rivalry between different cities. I would prefer to have forty cities than one to do the commercial business of the country, because I believe it is a great vice to have very large cities.

I would make an institution into which I should allow the producing classes to put their small mites, and become mutual aiders and helpers of each, leaving your commercial men and traders to manage as they may. I would have what is now called in the States, a saving's institution, connected with the Treasury of the United States, and let the business of the Government be kept in the channel of the business of the producers, widening and deepening them, and increasing your facilities, and I would let anybody who pleased, deposit fifty dollars, and make the permanent depositors retire from the institution when they had been in fifteen years. I was familiar with the origin of the last Bank of the United States, and it was the most popular institution in the world, while it was open to everybody to subscribe. But when you have let in the present generation to an institution whose benefits are large, and shut the door against their successors, it will become unpopular from that day, and by the time it has run twenty years it will have no sympathies with the public, and the public will have no feeling for it but hatred. You should have an institution into which you would let people come, as they grow into active business life, and make their deposits and share in the benefits of the institution. Then you will have no monopolies. When a man has been there the period of his common business life, let him retire; he has no further use for a bank; he may as well put his money in stocks, as a permanent investment. The advantages of such an institution should be for the active business men engaged in the transport of the products of the country, and should be for the benefit of the producers, to enable them to wait for the distant return of the rewards of their labor.

Make such an institution as this, and in less than one year you will have $50,000,000, now in old stockings and pocket-books, doing nobody any good. Such an institution would furnish a good currency to the country, and could let money out at six per cent., and make large dividends. Your national finances would be conducted without producing these revulsions, without abstracting coin from the banks, and undermining the currency. Your people would know what they were about. There would be no risk in exchanges. The expenses of doing business would be lessened fourfold. I have read, within a week, an extract from the money article of a New Orleans paper, the Delta, I believe, which stated that the first week of this month was a week of promise, as compared with the former condition of the money market in that city—a week of ease and improvement. It said there was a considerable stir of merchandise, and money was comparatively easy. It was stated that some transactions had been made at one and a half per cent. a month, but the major part at two and a half per cent. Thirty per cent. a year was a relief to the money market! Sir, business cannot be carried on at such a rate of interest. A man had better put his securities in the fire, than to undertake to carry on business when paying such rates of interest.

It is wonderful how our people will bear a pressure. Extortion by usurers is one of the most powerful means of extracting the bread from the laborer's mouth and putting it where it will do no good to society. Some people talk about the natural instincts of men for money; but, sir, nature never formed a man with any instinct for extortion. Men never get such a feeling until the natural heart is gone, and a horse leech put in its stead, that cries "Give, give." That is the way with money lenders. I have known one of them carry it on until he would steal oats from his own horse. [Laughter.] I wish to take society away from the grasp of these men, let them be where they will, acting as individuals or in banks; and I am afraid some of our banks want a little castigation for bad practices. I have heard some rather bad stories in regard to a few of our banks. I have read the returns of the banks of the city of New York, which are the controlling banks of the country as to business. They have generally, in ordinary times, from twelve to seventeen million dollars of coin, and about six or eight millions of circulation. The business of the clearing house, which is a place for exchanging notes and checks, and paying balances, is, in ordinary times, more than twenty million dollars a day. All this great operation of business is to be performed on a currency in bills of $3,000,000 in those fifty-eight banks. They have more than two dollars of coin for one dollar of paper, and yet it is called inflation! It seems to me to be about the nearest approach to hard money I ever saw. This clearing house is a good thing for misers; but it clears out effectually every feature of legitimate banking. Banking is founded on confidence and credit. The clearing house system is founded on this idea: "we will go to bed, with an institution owing us a dollar." They settle their balances in coin every day. There is not a bank officer in New York who has gone to bed on any night during the last three years trusting another institution with a paper dollar. Everything is settled nightly. If you want anything faster than that you ought to pay coin in advance. If that is not hard money, what is? I want a bank that will trust not only the Government but the people.

The President says that the credit of the United States is so high that this is an admirable time for the Government to negotiate. I admit that the banks will jump at this offer. They will not trust anybody who labors; they have bled them so long that they are unworthy of credit. The banks in New York, since their suspension, have greatly increased their stock of coin. Nobody who produces a dollar's worth can go there and negotiate a bill of exchange so as to bring a cargo of wheat from Chicago. I saw in the Journal of Commerce, which is pretty good authority on some sides of this Chamber, a statement that it was remarkable that when there was a clear margin of thirty cents a bushel on wheat, there was not money enough to buy and ship a cargo. That was six weeks ago. I saw letters from merchants in England to merchants in Providence, asking them to unite with them in shipping wheat; and no doubt a large profit would be realized. I asked them why they did not engage in it. They said they had their money out, and that between breaking their neighbors and making twenty or thirty cents a bushel on wheat, they had no doubt which to choose; and they did not want to see anybody breaking. These men were bank directors; those "irresponsible" men who would not turn the screws on a debtor in order to make thirty cents a bushel by shipping wheat.

Mr. President, I think I have demonstrated the propriety of the request which I yesterday made to the Senator from Virginia, to wait before he pressed this bill, until I could have time to read it and concentrate my thoughts somewhat. I am ashamed to address a body like the Senate of the United States without first thinking over every question that I mean to present to them, and marshaling my points in my own mind by a little reflection. I was certain when the message was read, that the President was totally mistaken in regard to the Bank of England, although the subject had not been on my mind for thirty years; and I am sure of it now, when I have looked at the book to which I have already called the attention of the Senate. I know something about our own banks, and I have been in favor of granting banking facilities ever since I have been acquainted with private money-lenders and usurers. When I see a proposition to establish a bank coming from responsible men, who have been in the habit of lending under the modern free-trade notions about money, I am glad to take their capital, and put it together under a charter which will enable the Legislature to watch them and fix the rate of interest they shall charge, and have some control over them. I say that under the Magna Charta of this Government, you have no right to investigate the affairs of private individuals, and therefore you cannot put State banks under the operation of a bankrupt law which you may pass. But get money into a bank under the authority of a law of your own, and you can control its issues; you can control the rate of interest at which it shall make loans, and there will be some sort of a fair chance between debtor and creditor. The debtor will be enough of a servant any way, in the most benignant position you can place him.

I have alluded to the movement in England as to cotton. They expect to bring down the price of cotton. I have known that experiment to be tried in England before, and I never knew it tried that it did not succeed. Once, when cotton was very high, there was a current rumor, and I have no doubt a true one, that the banks of England would not discount paper for any man who dealt in cotton, and it was not many weeks before cotton was offered at a less price. There was a combination on this side to exact an enormous price; and a combination on the other side to prevent it. I do not believe in these combinations on either side. I believe in letting trade take a fair, natural, and honest course; and I desire to see the productions of labor, and the wages of labor, at a high price. If you undertake to give large wages, and to sell the products low, it is easy to see where the end will be.

Now, sir, I hope the Senator from Virginia will permit me, and those who think with me, to have this bill put in such a form as to enable us to make an amendment fixing some mode of redeeming this money, or that he will give us assurances that he himself will introduce a bill to prevent frauds on the revenue. If he will do that, I can guaranty him that as soon as we dispose of the goods in his warehouses, that stand between the producer and the market, as the great dragon in the Apocalypse, ready to devour the first dawns of a remunerative market, as soon as we can see a market in which to sell our own products, the industry of this country will shake off its lethargy and gloom, and you will see it bound forward in its ordinary march to success. It is impossible to get credit on such a market as we have now; and a man would be a fool to take it if he could get it, and produce for a market that is in the hands and under the control of foreigners. I tell our friends of the cotton-growing region that they will rue the day when they established this free-trade system, as it is called; but it is not truly so called. It is a one-sided system, that brings us in debt all the time, and prostrates the consumers of their staples within the limits of the United States, and gives them Europe as their only customer. The result will be the same to them as if they were in the hands of a private money lender. There is no end to their exactions. You want competitors in the market for purchasing your goods, and the best competitors are those nearest to you. I have never been in the Senate when a treaty came here that would take off a halfpenny a pound from tobacco, but persons were ready to overturn the Constitution and make a tariff under a treaty, though it was never designed that we should have a revenue law which did not originate in the other House. So it was when any new market was opened for cotton. Does not everybody hail the news when it comes, that Russia is beginning to manufacture, and make a market for our staples? Our own country, ten years ago, furnished a market for six hundred thousand bales of cotton annually, and it has not increased a bale since. If you had allowed a tariff which protected your revenues from fraud to stand, the consumption in this country, to-day, would have been one million two hundred thousand bales annually.

There is not an honest importer who can live by the side of these Germans. It is a national degradation to see the quotation of exchanges in this country. Three weeks ago, I saw it stated that there were in New York some bills on the market, drawn by a factor in Charleston, and indorsed by the Bank of Charleston or the Bank of the State of South Carolina, I forget which, with bills of lading annexed, predicated on a purchase of cotton at about twelve cents a pound, when cotton in England was quoted at eighteen cents, were offered at one hundred and two, and there were no buyers; but a bill drawn by a German on an English banker sold for one hundred and ten. A German drawing on an English banker has decided preference in our market over an American bank, whose draft is based on produce that will bring fifty per cent. advance on its cost.

A short time ago the English papers said we were laboring under a panic for which there was no reason, and that it would not reach England, for they were doing a profitable business. I admit they have done a business which has taken all the gold we got from California, and they boast that they have a hundred millions sterling in our State stocks and railroad bonds. When the tariff of 1846 went into operation we had taken from them near every dollar of stocks. Under the act which gave our industry protection they retained scarce any of our stocks but old Massachusetts fives, which was always above par there. Adopt a system that will make England ship coin, and they will send back our stocks which they hold. England is the hardest country to get coin out of, and the easiest to get it into, that I ever heard of.

I began by endeavoring to induce the members of the Senate to consider the condition of the labor of this country, of the active business men, and to try to do something at this session that shall give them relief and vigor. This Treasury note business is directly against them. If you want only a few millions of Treasury notes, I shall not object to their issue; but now the Senator from Virginia says they will be a good thing for the banks because they can be paid out in the place of coin. The Senator from Virginia told us that the law required six millions of coin to be in the Mint, and that it was impossible to carry on the Government without six millions in the sub-Treasury, making twelve millions required for these two purposes. He said the Government was now reduced to five millions, but still these notes would be used as a currency and would relieve the banks from paying coin. If there is a necessity for these notes, it is to supply this deficiency of coin, and it will all come from the vaults of the banks which are trying to resume.

I would not object to a limited issue, but see no reason for twenty millions.

I would prefer that this should take the form of a loan, and then I think it would get into the hands of the savings banks, or some where else, where it would not disturb the currency. Tell us just what you want, and I am willing to vote it. I only ask that you will not make a bank out of this. That is the worst and the most unconstitutional form of paper money ever devised by the wit of man; it will corrupt the Government and corrupt the people.

I do not believe we should have had any suspension this fall if there had not been a rivalry between New York and Boston, which should hold out the longest and be regarded in England as the best city for the foreign trade.

I hope the Senator from Virginia will let this matter lie over until we can think more about it. I will not detain the Senate longer. I am greatly obliged to Senators for having listened to these rambling remarks; and I promise, if they will give me reasonable time, never to trouble them again. I am opposed to borrowing money in order to enable importers to delay the payment of duties as a system of permanent relief.

Mr. HUNTER. It is not my purpose, Mr. President, to follow the Senator from Rhode Island into the field of inquiry to which he has invited us. These are interesting subjects, and he certainly manages them ably, and in an interesting manner; but the immediate necessities of the Government press us to action. He said, if I understood him, that if I would agree to make this a temporary measure he would go for it. I have agreed to accept the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. SIMMONS. But I want the whole issue reduced to about six or eight million dollars in amount.

Mr. HUNTER. I will go as far as I can to accommodate gentlemen. I have agreed to make it a temporary measure.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am willing to say ten million dollars.

Mr. HUNTER. I cannot agree to a reduction of the amount. I am willing to make some concession on the point of interest. The Senator from New York wishes it not to exceed four per cent. If he will say four and a half per cent., I will agree to it.

Mr. SEWARD. I agree to that.

Mr. HUNTER. I believe if we were to restrict the issue to $10,000,000, we should in January be called on for another bill. I think that is the impression of the Department; and under these circumstances I believe we had better give this authority now. I am no more in favor of a permanent issue of Treasury notes than the Senator from Rhode Island. I design only to provide for the present exigency—provide for the temporary wants of the Government until the times shall become easier, and the machinery of commerce shall be once more restored, and we shall be able to derive from the ordinary sources, as I believe we can, revenue enough to carry on this Government economically.

In the mean time there is a pressing necessity for money, and I believe (I confess I defer very much to the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to the amount) he will require the amount he has asked for; and I believe further, that if he does not require it, he will not issue one dollar's worth beyond what is necessary to carry on the Government. He can have no interest to do so. His reputation as a financier would induce him to carry on the Government with the emission of as small an amount of Treasury notes as possible. I think I can see how it is that he will require this amount. We all know that our surplus is diminishing not merely weekly, but daily. We know, as I said before—not that the law requires it, but that practice shows—that about $6,000,000 surplus is necessary to administer the affairs of the Treasury. We know, too, that about $6,000,000 has been considered necessary as a Mint fund—not so necessary, I admit, as the $6,000,000 surplus to carry on the affairs of the Treasury. I believe these two funds ought to be made good. I believe the additional $8,000,000 will not prove to be more than necessary to meet the temporary wants of the Government. It will be necessary, even though the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to our probable revenue turn out to be correct; because, no one supposes, even if there should be a revival of trade and business, that there will be a large increase on the present receipts into the Treasury from imposts until the month of April or May. It may be, and probably will be, that towards the close of the fiscal year, money will flow into the Treasury more rapidly; and, if it shall do so, in that way it may make good the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, which estimate, by the way, allow me to observe here, was not merely conjectural. He said he calculated for a diminution of one fourth on the dutiable imports for the remaining three quarters of a year. On reference to the leading port—New York, the only one from which we have returns—if you take the goods that went into warehouse and those which went into consumption together, the imports have diminished one fourth. But a larger proportion have gone into warehouse than have been entered for consumption. His presumption is legitimate, that when the times are easier the goods will come out of warehouse and enter into consumption; and should they do so, they may, in that way, make up his estimates; but that there will be a temporary deficiency which will have to be met in this way, I have no doubt. I believe he will want $6,000,000 by the 1st of January, or very soon after; and I think it very probable that the rest will be called for to make good the Mint and surplus funds by the 1st of March.

I have no idea that before that time we can draw much more from the Treasury than we are now drawing. I know that we are paying out more than we are receiving. I think, inasmuch as the appropriations have been made and requisitions have been issued, we ought to prepare and provide the means for meeting those requisitions, and not have to resort to the expedient of having them held up here and there until we can manage to get the means. It is better to provide the Secretary with what will be sufficient, with what will make it certain that he can administer this Department safely and creditably to the Government, than to cut him down so closely that it may be necessary to pass a bill in haste again in the month of January.

It will be observed, too, that if money shall be wanted by the 1st of March, and we require him to advertise and put the Treasury notes out on a notice of thirty days, the bill ought to be passed now. I believe it is a very important thing to advertise them in the manner proposed in this bill. I believe that it offers the best and most practicable method of putting them out for their par value in specie, which is the mode in which, in my opinion, they ought to be issued.

For these reasons, I hope very much that we may be able to get action on this bill to-day or to-morrow, at the pleasure of the Senate; but I hope that by to-morrow night we shall act on it in some way, for I believe there is a pressing necessity for part of it at any rate.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I do not rise to continue this debate. I shall vote, with whatever reluctance, for this bill. I think these expedients of such a character that they ought to be resorted to with the utmost degree of caution and jealousy on the part of Congress. It is so easy a mode of supplying necessities, it is so easy to make necessities, that it is an extremely dangerous mode of supplying the public Treasury. It has always been regarded so, I believe, in this Hall, and always ought to be so regarded. I suppose, however, in the present instance, we have no alternative. The pressing necessities and the exigencies of the moment are such as to leave us scarcely any option.

Whether the interest is not to exceed six per cent., or four and a half per cent., seems to me a matter of very little consequence. Of course, the Secretary of the Treasury will use these notes to the greatest advantage and greatest interest of the country; but I should not anticipate that any interest would be necessary to give a perfect currency to these notes. I am certain that one very great and large portion of this country—one whose trade is now suffering very much by the great inequality of exchange under which it is laboring—would give a premium for them. When I left home, a few weeks ago, I obtained exchange at one of our banks paying specie—now paying specie, always paying specie—upon a bank of New York that was not paying specie, and I had to pay two per cent. for the exchange. With such a currency as that now proposed distributed in that country, all this expense would have been saved. It should be worth a premium. My calculation is that the Secretary will not have to pay anything as interest. Indeed, it seems to me that, to incur these notes with any appreciable rate of interest will be to check, in some degree, their utility. What farmer, what man in the country, with a Treasury note for fifty or one hundred dollars, will stop to make a calculation of two or three months' interest at four and a half per cent.? It will go from his hands without such a calculation on his part, assimilated in his thoughts and dealings to bank notes; and the interest, when paid, will be paid to some more calculating man, into whose hands it has fallen, and who has hoarded it up for the purpose of presenting it in large sums and making money by it. I wish we were agreed that no interest is necessary. I do not believe that it will be necessary; but yet, as it seems to be contemplated that this money shall not be used by the Government as an immediate currency to the whole extent of it, but that they shall give it out as securities for gold and silver, and use that, then it may be necessary for them, when bargaining for money, for all I know, to give a little interest. I will say nothing at all, therefore, about the interest; but express my hope that the Secretary of the Treasury will put a mere nominal rate of interest, if any, on these notes.

As I said, I shall vote for this bill, and for the whole amount of it. We are told it may all be necessary. As I said before, I think it a very delusive and dangerous and tempting sort of supply. It presents a very singular spectacle, that after the great commercial and monetary crisis through which we have passed, just at the moment when the banks every where are resuming specie payment, the Government is suspending specie payment. But, sir, there is no arguing with the necessities of the case. The Government must go on, and we must supply the means. It is under this sense of obligation and necessity that I shall give my vote for this bill and for the whole amount asked. They will not use it if they have revenue derived from the regular sources sufficient to meet the expenses of the Government. It would be a criminal abuse of the confidence of the public to have money lying in the Treasury, and yet use Treasury notes in the place of the money. I do not fear the abuse of the trust, for there can be no motive and no inducement to abuse it. I therefore vote without question for the whole issue now proposed.

I give this vote in the further confidence—and I was prepared to offer an amendment to that effect to this bill, but of course the amendment would be objectionable, as originating measures for raising revenue in the Senate, and therefore I cannot offer it—that, at a suitable and proper time, this measure will be followed up by a proposition to increase the revenue so as to meet, under all contingencies, the demand these notes will create on the Government, and to supply a fund for their payment. When we go into debt, let us make, simultaneously, provision for the redemption of the debt. We can only excuse ourselves for not doing so upon the supposition that the ordinary revenue, when this little moment of obstruction is passed, will supply ample means. I do not believe any such thing; it is a dream. Nothing can recall the past; and in the past, according to your showing, millions have been lost by the diminution of the revenue. Does anybody promise himself that, in the balance of the present fiscal year, or from March next, more than enough will be received, or even that enough will be received, to pay all the expenses of the year ending the 30th of June? I think it will be an over-sanguine calculation altogether; and provision will have to be made for the payment of these notes hereafter by some increase of revenue, or by a loan, or funding this debt, as certain as we sit here; at least, such is my anticipation. It is a safe course; it guards against the accumulation of debt, that we should now at once impose whatever duties or taxes are necessary in order to supply the fund for the extinction of this paper currency which we are to issue.

It seems to me the time is altogether propitious for it. One of the circumstances which invite, at this time, to the issue of a paper currency by the Government, is the ease and alleviation it may give to the commercial and pecuniary distresses and wants of the country. I confess that that has its reconciling effect on me. If, at the same time, you can provide for the payment of it by a measure that will press on no American citizen, but, by a proper adjustment of the increased duties on articles of foreign commerce which enter into competition with the industry of our own country, we not only can aid the man who wants money, but aid the man who wants labor, then indeed we shall be doing something that is benignant, and something that is to alleviate the condition of the country. I desire to see both. While I supply the Government with money, I want, at the same time, by a corresponding measure, to pay that money, by a duty which shall give the laborer labor. That, as the Senator from Rhode Island has said, is the source of all wealth; but now, in the present condition of the country, we are not required so much to look at it as a source of wealth; we are obliged to bring down our calculations; we are obliged to calculate what is a necessary provision for the poor, now out of employment by thousands?—a fact which we know.

If these laborers can be brought to work and made comfortable during this long winter, or made comfortable more permanently than they have been, and the means of subsistence supplied, will not that be a great recommendation to a measure which shall afford them some protection and some encouragement to their labor? We want it for revenue. It would not be a measure for protection, but a measure essentially for revenue. No gentleman here, on any constitutional ground, can have any objection so to apply and adjust the duties, as to afford to the suffering manufacturers and mechanics of our country all the protection which a proper adjustment of the tariff on the articles that ought to be protected, would give them.

These are my views, Mr. President. I mean to vote for the bill, and shall not protract the debate further.

Mr. BELL. Mr. President, if I had the confidence of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, in what he supposes will, almost as a matter of course, follow after the granting of this relief, I would express the same sentiment he has done, and give my support cheerfully to this bill; but I have not the smallest confidence that, if we pass this bill, allowing this amount of notes to be issued by the Treasury, any such thing will follow. As far as I can gather anything from the expression of the Executive, (and I fear very much that it is responded to fully by a majority in this body,) there is no other measure of relief to be proposed except that adverted to by the honorable Senator from Rhode Island—an act of bankruptcy to operate on the fourteen hundred banks of the various States. No, sir; it is not contemplated by those in whose power we are, to relieve the people. If I could anticipate or suppose that, when we authorize the issue of these $20,000,000 of Treasury notes, they will be thrown into circulation and afford a temporary relief to the distresses in every section of the country, and particularly in that section which is now most suffering perhaps, that would be an inducement to me to support this bill, and I should be willing to forego, to some extent, my apprehensions as to the policy of the Executive, backed, as I presume it to be, by a majority in both Houses of Congress. I am not as well versed in these subjects as the Senator from Rhode Island, and have scarcely a tittle of the knowledge he has on these questions; but I fear very much that very little relief to the country will come from authority to issue these $20,000,000 of Treasury notes, now, or in the course of a year.

I have already heard it suggested (and it had struck my mind) that one of the means by which the Treasury is to be aided in its ordinary, natural, legitimate way, is by obtaining the duties on the $26,000,000 or $28,000,000 worth of foreign goods now in warehouse at New York. These notes, however, are to go in some direction to facilitate the operation of keeping them in warehouse until a rise in the market takes place. These Treasury notes, as I understand and anticipate, from what I have heard from both sides of the Chamber, as to the rate of interest, will go into the New York city banks, which have had no sympathy with the condition of the country. I am sure they have not had any for the condition of the interior and West. The major part of these notes, I apprehend, will find their lodgment there. Some small modicum of relief may find its way to the West. In regard to the state of exchanges which is now grinding down the South and Southwest, I, too, could tell a tale, as well as my honorable friend from Kentucky; but I will not detain the Senate by doing so. I apprehend there will be very little relief on that point.

What is the proposition? To relieve the Government from bankruptcy; to provide for the Government in the true spirit, and according to the original theory of that sublime invention, the sub-Treasury! It is to take care of the Government at all hazards. In the execution of that policy, and the favorite doctrine of free trade avowed by the honorable Senator from Virginia on the night of the passage of the last tariff bill, that bill was pressed through this House when we scarcely had time, and, indeed, did not have time, to comprehend fully the nature of the amendments which were adopted. That bill was not wholly to the taste of the honorable Senator from Virginia, even in the shape in which it finally passed and received the sanction of a majority of both Houses. It was not satisfactory to him; but he said that he took it because it was the furthest advance to free trade that he hoped to get on that occasion. I consider that that idea lies at the bottom of the policy of the Government on this occasion, in asking for $20,000,000 of Treasury notes.

The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] supposes he has sufficiently limited the bill in its extent to prevent a deleterious operation on interests that he would desire, and perhaps does desire, to maintain and advocate. He has got a provision inserted that this bill shall be limited in its operation to the 1st of January, 1859, when Congress will be again in session, and can then act upon the subject. Perhaps I misunderstand the effect of that provision, and I should like the honorable Senator from Virginia to instruct me if I am in error on that point; but as I construe the provision, the bill, as proposed to be amended, will authorize an issue of $20,000,000 within the closing month of next year, so that there will be $20,000,000 of debt redeemable, according to the other provisions of this bill, in twelve months from that time. The Government will thus be able to get along smoothly, easily, and without any embarrassment, until the 1st of January, 1859, and then it will be in the power of the Government to apply to Congress, and state an exigency in the future, precisely like the present, as a reason for giving them further authority to issue notes, or to continue the $20,000,000 outstanding for another twelve months, extending to the 1st January, 1860.

I state these facts to show that even with that limitation, up to the 1st of January, 1859, the Government will be in a condition to meet all its responsibilities, whatever may be the income derived from the ordinary revenues between this and that time, even if they should fall short one third or one half of what they are now estimated at. The Government is making provision, in asking for these $20,000,000, that will leave them perfectly free from all embarrassment, or apprehension of embarrassment, for one year; and they will smile at the application of that portion of Congress who think that something more permanent ought to be done for the relief of the industry of the country, or for providing a legitimate and proper revenue for the support of the Government. They can smile and disregard, as they will disregard, in my opinion, the applications of those gentlemen, who, like my friend from Kentucky, anticipate, with confidence, that they surely will not fail within that time to offer some provision for the permanent relief of the country.

Sir, the honorable Senator from Rhode Island has given us information on another point; and the statement comes from a source for which I think no member of the Senate can fail to have due respect who has heard his sentiments, and who has noticed the experience and the knowledge evinced by that Senator to-day on all questions connected with this subject. Every Senator must have due respect for the probable truth of the announcement of that Senator on that point. What is it? That the Government is defrauded out of one half the amount of revenue provided by the existing tariff, by foreign traders and their agents in this country, on all textile fabrics. As that honorable Senator stated, Congress have been advised, since 1846, again and again, by each successive Secretary of the Treasury, that these frauds were enormous, and called for correction. Has the honorable Senator from Virginia, or any gentleman holding his opinions on the subject of free trade, ever made a proposition for the correction of these abuses, that promised to be adequate, or to have any decided effect, one way or the other? Not one of them. They have gone unheeded from session to session, and from Congress to Congress, to this day. The honorable Senator from Rhode Island announces to you that not more than one half of the revenue provided for by that act has ever been collected; the Government has been defrauded of it. That honorable Senator also tells you that every honest American importer has been driven out of the trade by these frauds, and that it is in the hands of foreigners, or the factors and agents of foreigners. I have had no reason to doubt it.

Some three or four years ago (I do not know upon what impulse, or how it was brought about) a committee was appointed to go to the principal cities and investigate the truth or falsehood of the allegations made on this subject, for the protection of the honest American importing merchant, and as a means of affording information on which these abuses could be corrected. The Senate saw proper to appoint me—certainly I had nothing to do with it—as one member of that committee. I was deputed, by a sub-committee of that committee, to go to New Orleans. I did go there, and gave as much time to the investigation of the subject as I could. I found the fact there to be, that some men, who were reputed to be honest, engaged in the foreign trade, had been driven from it by the grossness of the frauds practiced by the importers in that city. By comparing notes with gentlemen who went to other cities, I was informed of, and I believe I have the papers yet in my possession showing, enormous frauds of a similar description. I ascertained that a very extraordinary state of things existed in New York, and that it became its interest, or was supposed to be its interest, to encourage the frauds that were practiced on the custom-house in that city, for the purpose of concentrating the foreign trade of the country there. I found the astonishing fact to exist, that some few of the honest importing merchants of New Orleans continued in the trade who were unwilling to make the sacrifice of personal honor and character by making importations under circumstances which would justify them in fair and honorable competition, and they found it cheaper and more reconcilable to their conscience to import their goods into New York, have them valued there, and then reshipped to New Orleans, at the additional cost of transportation and insurance and commissions to New York, rather than import them into the city of New Orleans directly, where they would have to give a statement of the true invoice price abroad. Even such a fact as that came within my knowledge by the statements of others, but it had no effect here.

The honorable Senator from Rhode Island thinks that, at all events, we ought to have a pledge that such gross enormity, such a slur, such a stain on the national honor, or, at least, on the character of our importing merchants, ought to be wiped out. He thinks that something of that kind ought to be provided for by this bill. I do not think it would be very incongruous; but I do not suppose it is practicable to have such a thing effected under the present state of the sentiment which exists on this subject. I shall not, therefore, offer any such proposition. I have no hope, no expectation, that any such effort will be made, because I have seen attempts to make this correction before; I have seen too many sessions pass without any attention being given to it on the part of those who had the power in the Senate and in the Executive Department. Then, sir, I cannot, on any ground that has been alleged here, vote with the honorable Senator from Kentucky for this bill as it stands, and I will not. I think no sufficient pretext has been urged why we should give authority to issue the entire $20,000,000. I am willing to vote whatever amount is supposed to be necessary at the present moment to answer the present exigency. It is said by the honorable Senator from Virginia that we must have six or eight million dollars to make our payments in January. Give it. And he wants this bill passed to-day, or to-morrow. Pass it for that sum to-day, or to-morrow if you please. I will vote for it this moment. Or, if you choose to say that $10,000,000 may be required in January, let it be $10,000,000.

As for the argument that we ought to have a surplus in the Treasury, I admit, as a general rule, and as a measure of general policy, it is proper; but we can suffer one or two months to elapse before we resort to keeping that much surplus in the Treasury. In regard to the $6,000,000 kept for the use of the Mint, according to our policy, we can wait a month or two before we return that to the Mint. What I mean to say is, let us pass what is necessary for the present moment. We cannot wait another week; we cannot wait two weeks before we ought to have the means of paying the debts of the Government, or what may be demanded of the Government within the present month. Let us vote it at once, freely; but let us keep a hold on the Government for the benefit of the country, not for ourselves. Let us keep some hold on the Government until we can see whether they mean to make any permanent change for deriving the revenue legitimately and safely for the country. Then, when they come in the middle or end of the month of January, for example, and say, "those $8,000,000 or $10,000,000 you have given are about to be exhausted; we want authority to issue $20,000,000, or any other amount in addition," we may have more time to consider the subject. I do not object so much to the amount as to the avoidance of responsibility for doing that for the permanent relief and benefit of the country which they ought to do now.

I think we ought to limit them to the amount they now need. If they say it is necessary to have $10,000,000, I will vote it at four and a half, or six, or seven per cent., or whatever rate may be necessary. But I do not wish the Government to escape from the necessity of applying again to Congress during the present session, when the necessity will not be so exigent or so pressing, but that a few days may be allowed to provide for the correction of the abuse to which I have alluded, if nothing further, so that we may extend that protection to the domestic interests of this country which the law now prescribes, by collecting duties honestly and fairly; and protect the character and employment of the American importer against the fraudulent conduct of foreign manufacturers, and the agents and brokers of foreign houses.

I cannot vote for this bill as it now stands, and for the simple reason I have stated. I do not deny that this is a proper means to support the Government. It has been resorted to heretofore. We should resort to it with caution; but we are sufficiently advised that there is a necessity for something to be done at present. We have a knowledge of the causes which have led to this state of affairs, in some part. Let us go now to the extent that is necessary, and no further; and when they want more, let us apply some remedy that will provide effectually for a sufficient supply to the Treasury of the means of carrying on the Government—not by Treasury notes or bills of credit, but by a revenue derived in the ordinary way, by duties, or direct taxes, if you please. Let us know how it is to be raised.

I shall not detain the Senate longer. I meant merely to express the grounds on which I could not give my vote for the issue of $20,000,000 of Treasury notes now, though I may go even further, if it be found to be necessary, hereafter. But now, in this hurried manner, when we have no opportunity of attaching any provision to this bill that might be constitutionally in our power, to produce some permanent relief to the country, I want to go no further than to do just what is expedient at the present moment; and when the Administration come to make an application for more, let them come under circumstances which will enable us to devote more time to the subject.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope it will be with the understanding that to-morrow we shall finish the bill. ["Certainly."]

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 18, 1857.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. F. SWENTZEL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

APPOINTMENT OF A COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER announced as the committee under the resolution of the House of Wednesday last to provide accommodations in the new Hall for the press generally, as well as other accommodations that may be necessary, Messrs. FAULKNER, JONES of Tennessee, HASKIN, HARLAN, and UNDERWOOD.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an account of the receipts and expenditures for the fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1857; which was laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

Also, a letter from the Secretary of State transmitting extracts from a letter of John C. Rives, and other letters, on the subject of an appropriation for the purchase of five hundred copies of the stereotyped edition of the Diplomatic Correspondence; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Also, the report of the late Clerk of the House of Representatives, of his disbursement of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives during the last year.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the reference of that report to the Committee on Accounts, with the following resolution, which I think is germane to its subject-matter:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be instructed to examine the stationery provided for the use of members of the House, to report as to its real value, and also what it has cost, and to make such recommendations as may be proper in the premises.

Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to say—and I think that the experience of other gentlemen will bear me out in the remark—that the stationery provided at the beginning of the last Congress I found to be very inferior in quality, and that, on complaining to the Postmaster, he said that it was purchased by the Clerk of the House, and he was obliged to receive it. The result was that, during the last session, I had to go down into the city and obtain such stationery as I was in the habit of using. At the present session, I went into the House post office to get some things, and I found them altogether inferior to what has been furnished to members of Congress in former times.

But what I desire to know is this: If the stationery is a cheap article, and any money is to be saved to the Government thereby, I have no objection to it. I am perfectly willing, as the times are a little hard, that we members shall feel it. If, on the other hand, the price paid is such as used to be paid, then there is a great mistake somewhere or other. I do not know whether it is the fault of the Clerk, or whether these articles have risen in the market or not. I think it is worth while to make the investigation.

I have been induced to do this, in part, because at an early period of the session charges of a serious character were made against individuals concerning their investments of the public money. I do not say that there is any truth in them, but I do say that, if there is no law now to prevent these things, there ought to be an efficient one provided. I say that, if any officer of this House is in combination with outsiders to manage in that way to get money improperly—buying articles at a low rate and charging the Government a high rate—it ought to be a penitentiary offense. I hope, therefore, that the Committee on Accounts, or some other, will look into it. It may be that great injustice is done to the Clerk in these publications to which I have referred. I make no allegation that they are true or not, but I am satisfied that the present stationery is not such as we have been in the habit of using. Therefore, it is worthy of the consideration of the House, and I hope that we will have such a law as will prevent any officer of the House, in future, doing anything of this kind, (supposing the charges to be true,) unless at the risk of a location in the penitentiary for a reasonable period of time. This matter has got to be a crying evil. I know nothing against the conduct of the late Clerk. He may be a very meritorious and exemplary man. This subject needs investigation, and I hope this committee will look into it at once.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I think that the Committee on Accounts, if I understand the duties they have to perform, have as much to do, without this examination, as they can very well get along with. If the gentleman desires an investigation of the character to which he has alluded, it ought to be done through the instrumentality of a select committee, appointed to look into that matter and nothing else. I do not know what has been the custom when one Clerk goes out and another comes in. I do not know whether inventories properly left by an outgoing Clerk are taken by an incoming one. If such a course has not been pursued heretofore it ought to be pursued now, and a law should be enacted requiring a thorough and rigid examination into the condition of the Clerk's office when a new Clerk comes in.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the gentleman will allow me to say a word.

Mr. SEWARD. Is the resolution in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it is.

Mr. SEWARD. Has it not reference to the expenditures of the last session under the Clerk?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, is to refer the report to the Committee on Accounts, with instructions.

Mr. SEWARD. It is an investigation about money already expended.

The SPEAKER. The resolution contemplates money already spent.

Mr. SEWARD. What action does the House propose under the resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is not for the Chair to say. The gentleman from North Carolina proposes to refer the subject to the Committee on Accounts, with instructions.

Mr. CLINGMAN. With the permission of my friend, I will answer his question by saying that I was informed that the late Clerk had made the purchases for the incoming year. If that be true, it is important for us to ascertain whether they have been made properly and judiciously. If he has acted in the wrong, there ought to be a remedy provided; and if in the right, we, of course, must submit. So far as the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama is concerned, if he thinks proper to move the raising of a select committee, I shall make no objection to it. It struck me, however, that the Committee on Accounts would properly look into this subject. If anybody moves for a select committee, I hope that the committee will also be instructed to look into the book business, of which we have heard so much. If that is done, I shall vote for the motion.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not propose myself to move for the appointment of a select committee, but as the gentleman from North Carolina has moved in this matter, it seems to me that it devolves upon him, to some extent, to do so. I only proposed, when I rose, to second the investigation which he seemed to believe ought to be made, and in which opinion I concur with him most heartily, and to add a few suggestions to those which he has submitted to our consideration.

We cannot be ignorant of the fact, Mr. Speaker, that grave charges have been made against the outgoing Clerk of this House, in connection with the administration of the duties of his office; and that being so, it seems to me that the committee that is to take charge of this subject, so far as stationery is concerned, ought also to be required to examine into the matter of the books for distribution, and of all the books that have been distributed; how the books have been purchased; at what price; what has been paid for them by the Clerk, and what has been paid for them by the Government; so that we may have the entire subject before the House, and may examine into it, and see whether the thousand rumors that are afloat are true, or whether they are false. I think that it is the duty of the House to provide for such an investigation; that we owe it to the outgoing Clerk; and I am only astonished that his friends upon this floor have allowed so much of the present session to elapse without calling for an investigation when these charges have been made in the public newspapers of the city, over responsible signatures. I say I confess that I am astonished that the friends of the outgoing Clerk have not seen fit to ask, themselves, for a committee to examine into and investigate these matters.

Now, I do not propose to make a motion for a committee of investigation. I do not desire to serve on a committee connected with that subject. I desire to ask my friend from North Carolina—for I wish to be informed upon that point—whether it is usual for the outgoing Clerk to supply stationery for a Congress that is to come after him?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I was told in the post office that it has been the custom, or, at all events, that it has been done in this instance.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not know whether it has been the custom or not, but it seems to me to be a subject which requires to be looked into, and to undergo scrutiny and rigid examination; and I hope my friend from North Carolina will prosecute the matter until it produces its proper result.

Mr. SAVAGE. Mr. Speaker, my peculiar position imposes upon me a duty in regard to this matter. A question has been raised before the people of Tennessee, and before my immediate constituents, in regard to the charges which have been adverted to by the gentleman from North Carolina. It was, to some extent, a matter discussed in the canvass between my competitor and myself, but it was more largely discussed in the canvass for representative in the Legislature from the county of Jackson, owing to the fact that one of the candidates, Mr. Stanton, now a member of the Tennessee Legislature, a particular friend of the outgoing Clerk, and one of his appointees—one of his pets, so to speak—made charges before his constituency of the grossest enormities on the part of the outgoing Clerk, in relation to actual frauds perpetrated against the Government, and others, more dangerous and alarming, intended to be perpetrated, but frustrated and defeated, as was claimed, by the now Know Nothing member of the Legislature of Tennessee, a particular friend of the outgoing Clerk, who was elected to the Legislature by the people of the county of Jackson, as it is supposed, principally because he made these charges against his particular political friend, Mr. Cullom. The matter came up, also, between my competitor and myself during the canvass. I was very solicitous to know of my competitor whether, if he should be elected, he would vote for the outgoing Clerk to be Clerk of the present House of Representatives. My competitor avoided any declaration upon that subject. He evaded it. I frequently pressed it upon him, both in view of the charges which had gone abroad in the country, and also of the peculiar political record of the outgoing Clerk, in regard to Kansas, and other matters. My competitor said, one day, that he was very glad that Mr. Cullom had been elected Clerk by the Black Republicans, and glad that he had got about $40,000. I told my competitor that if it was true that the outgoing Clerk had got that much money, and if he would convince me of it, I should feel it to be my duty, if elected, to bring the matter before the House of Representatives.

After the election was over, Mr. Stanton, the friend of Mr. Cullom, and now a Know-Nothing member of the Tennessee Legislature, came to me and exhibited to me a variety of documents, saying that he thought I was pledged to introduce a resolution into the House of Representatives to examine into Mr. Cullom's conduct. I told him what had occurred between my competitor and myself, and that I did not consider myself as pledged to introduce such a resolution. I told him further, that the peculiar relations existing between myself and Mr. Cullom, it being known throughout the State that we were not friends—(perhaps that is a strong enough term to use on the present occasion)—I did not feel that I was the proper man to introduce such a resolution, because it might look like malice or persecution against one whom I had defeated in a political contest, and that while I would not shrink from the duty, if it was necessary for me to assume it, I would prefer that it should devolve upon another; but that, if he would satisfy me that he could substantiate the charges made in the documents he presented, however unpleasant the duty might be, I would not shrink from it. He then showed me a large number of documents, and promised to return again and show me others, saying, at the same time, that he could prove, by members upon this floor, political friends of Mr. Cullom, that he had stated to them that he had made these large sums of money. In the last interview I had with Mr. Stanton, he told me that he had considered my suggestion, and believed it to be weighty; and would, therefore, get some one of Mr. Cullom's political friends upon this floor to offer a resolution to investigate his conduct. I told him I thought that was the best and fairest course. I have not spoken to any of Mr. Cullom's political friends on this subject, because it is a delicate matter, and I considered myself released from any obligation to move in it, and should, perhaps, be an intruder if I stepped between him and his friends here. But, if nothing is done by them, I shall, after waiting a reasonable time, take what course I may think proper in the matter.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Committee on Accounts, to which it is proposed to refer this subject, it will perhaps be proper for me to give the House such information as I am in possession of upon this subject. The Committee on Accounts have been in session for two or three hours every day since their appointment. There is a good deal of labor involved in the performance of their duties. I agree with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] that if these charges of corruption against the outgoing Clerk are to be investigated, a special committee should be raised for that purpose.

With regard to the contract for stationery, which seems to be a grievance, I do not know what that contract is. It seems, however, either to have been a bad contract, or that it was made for an inferior quality of material. The Committee on Accounts has not gone into that matter.

For myself, sir, I have no personal hostility to the late Clerk of the House. I do not wish to figure in the prosecution of any of the late, or of any of the present, officers of the House. I do not know that there has been anything improper in the conduct of the late Clerk. So far as any examination has been made by the Committee on Accounts into the business of the late Clerk, we have found no corruption, or no improper conduct as yet, and I hope we may not.

I may cite to the House one single instance in reference to the contingent fund. The Committee on Accounts had before them, this morning, a bill for a quarter of a million dollars for engraving. It had passed the Clerk, and the Committee on Accounts indorsed it; and yet we find that by law this work is received by the superintendent of the particular branch of business, who, under the law of Congress, is the sole person to receive it. It is a mere nominal duty for the Committee on Accounts to examine the accounts. They are examined at the Treasury. The Clerk has no right to add to or diminish the bill one cent; and yet this quarter of a million dollars is paid out of the contingent fund of the House, no one having anything to do with it except this individual, Mr. Seaman, who receives the work. The House orders all these pictorial illustrations to be executed, and it is the duty of the Clerk to have the work executed, but he cannot save anything to himself or to the House. If it is a costly and a useful work for which these illustrations are ordered, then the action of the House in ordering them is proper enough. But if these books are useless lumber, as most of them appear to be, (for there are three or four hundred thousand dollars' worth lying in the library,) then it is the House and not the Clerk that is responsible for the extravagance. I am not the defender nor the accuser of Mr. Cullom, but the Committee on Accounts has performed a good deal of labor in examining his accounts, and, thus far, have found nothing wrong.

Now there is another thing—the furnishing of this Hall. The superintendent of construction here, as I understand, claims the right of furnishing the Hall; and the Clerk, also, as I understand, claims the same right, under the regular resolution of the House of Representatives. I believe the Clerk and the superintendent have compromised the matter, and that one supplies the upholstery and the other the furniture.

Mr. LETCHER. What was the cost of the furniture?

Mr. MASON. I have heard what it cost, but I do not now recollect. The matter belongs to the War Department. The Superintendent of Public Buildings here is appointed by that Department; and I am disposed to turn all the accounts for the building over to the Secretary of War.

There is another large item—for furnishing the new committee rooms in this wing of the Capitol. The superintendent of construction claims that he has the right to furnish them. Some members are of opinion that his ideas are rather extravagant. It is a matter for the House to determine whether they will furnish these rooms themselves or allow the Secretary of War to have them furnished in an elegant style by the superintendent.

The Speaker very well recollects that in years gone by I made frequent attempts to arrest this state of things; but it has grown worse and worse. I trust that the suggestion of the President in regard to the financial revulsion in the country will have the effect of turning members' attention to the subject, to see whether they cannot economize and reduce greatly the expenses of the House. Millions are placed in the appropriation bills at the last hour; and it is the House, and not the Clerk, that is responsible.

I merely got up to second the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Housron,] and to say that, if the House wish to investigate this matter further than lies within the province of the Committee on Accounts, a resolution should be adopted appointing a special committee for that special purpose. Perhaps some friend of the late Clerk will offer such a resolution. The Committee on Accounts has no charge to make against him. We have discharged our duty, and given evidence of punctuality and attendance to it. I would like to have a resolution before the House in relation to the charges for upholstering and furnishing this Hall, and to other such matters. Perhaps I may offer such a resolution at the proper time. But at present I am disposed to let all these accounts be settled by the Secretary of War, as he has commenced the business. It is the same thing, after all, whether the Hall and the committee rooms be furnished by the House or under the superintendence of the Secretary of War.

Mr. MAYNARD. I believe the question before the House at this time—if I understand the reading of the resolution—is on an inquiry into the character and cost of the stationery purchased for the use of the House. The discussion upon that resolution seems to have taken a wider range, and to have gone into the general conduct of the outgoing Clerk. Although a personal friend of that gentleman, I shall not, here in my place or elsewhere, by any word or vote or act of mine, attempt to screen him from any full, thorough, sifting investigation into his conduct, if any member of this House believes that such an investigation will prove either proper or profitable. I am now instructed by the outgoing Clerk to say that he demands it. Thus instructed, I shall—contrary to what was my original intention when I rose, to leave to some one else to move the investigation—before concluding my remarks, move, myself, that the investigation shall be made by a special and select committee of the House.

I know nothing of the accusations that are made against that officer. I have not taken the trouble even to wade through the pages of matter that have been piled up here. I do not deem it necessary to go out into the columns of the newspaper press to see whether their utterance is for or against this or that particular officer in the discharge of his official duty; for, if that were to be done, it would leave us but little else to do. It is time enough, I suppose, for us to inquire into the conduct of any particular officer of this House when that conduct has been made the subject of remark in the House. I supposed that he would be called upon, at the proper time, by the proper committee, to present his vouchers, and account for the funds which have come into his hands. I supposed they would make a full investigation, and report to us whether there was anything wrong in his official conduct. But it seems—I know not for what reason, I know not what may be the facts in the case—that, in justice to ourselves and in justice to the outgoing Clerk, this work should be performed by a special committee upon the subject. I am perfectly willing that it should be done; and if the honorable member from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] will so modify his motion as to provide for the appointment of a special committee, with powers to extend their investigation to the extent which I have intimated, I shall be very much obliged to him for so doing.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will make the motion himself. I have my own reasons for wishing not to serve upon any such committee. I prefer that the matter should originate with him; and if he will make the motion I will vote for it very cheerfully. I beg leave to say, that not being politically of the same party with the late Clerk, I do not wish to initiate any movement against him, but I will cheerfully join any movement the gentleman thinks proper to undertake.

Mr. MAYNARD. I beg to say that I hope this will not be made a political matter.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Certainly not. I have not intended to say anything impugning the conduct of the outgoing Clerk. I should much prefer to follow the lead of some other member upon that side in the matter. I made the motion originally very reluctantly. I threatened to do it in the last Congress; but I failed to do it because I know that it is a thankless thing for gentlemen to make these motions which create ill feeling in certain quarters. I preferred not to do it; but I thought it was necessary that the attention of the House should be called to the subject.

Mr. MAYNARD. For reasons personal to myself, I ask, as an especial favor, that the honorable member from North Carolina will so modify his motion as to adopt my suggestion, for the reason that, being a new member of the House, and entirely inexperienced in its usages—being entirely unacquainted with its practices—I prefer that a gentleman who is known to be, if not the oldest, the noblest "Roman of them all," should occupy that position. I again make the request. I ask it as a personal favor, that the gentleman from North Carolina will modify his resolution so as to meet the suggestions I have advanced.

Mr. CLINGMAN. If the gentleman will move such a proposition as suits him, I will accept it as a modification of my own motion with pleasure.

Mr. MAYNARD. I had not submitted my proposition in writing. It was, that a special committee shall be appointed, to whom the accounts of the outgoing Clerk shall be submitted for investigation, with instructions to report upon them to the House, and that they have leave to report at any time.

And, Mr. Speaker, as we sometimes hear of cleansing these Augean stables, it may be possible—I know not how it is—that it would be profitable to extend our inquiry beyond the action of the outgoing incumbent. I would, therefore, leave them at liberty to inquire into and report the practice and conduct of his predecessors in office.

Mr. CLINGMAN. If the gentleman will allow me, a gentleman has handed me a resolution which I suppose will answer his purpose. I have added to it a clause to meet the suggestion last made by him, giving the committee authority to investigate the conduct of previous Clerks. I propose, therefore, if it shall meet the views of the gentleman to submit the resolution in this form:

Resolved, That the accounts of William Cullom, the late Clerk, be referred to a select committee of five, with instructions to inquire into the various items of his accounts, and report thereon at any time; and shall have power to send for persons and papers; and that they shall likewise have authority to look into the conduct of any previous Clerk.

If the gentleman from Tennessee will move that resolution as an amendment to my motion, I shall vote for it, and I have no doubt the House will adopt it. I think it is proper that they should do it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will accept the resolution, asking that the committee shall have authority to inquire into the accounts as well as conduct of previous Clerks.

I was about to remark when interrupted, that this was not the time nor was I prepared to discuss the conduct of the outgoing Clerk or any officer of this House; but I have this confidence in the character and in the integrity of that gentleman, that I express here a feeling, amounting to a conviction, that when the investigation is made he will have no occasion to regret it or to be ashamed of the result, as it may affect him or any of his subordinates. I propose the following amendment:

Resolved, That the accounts of William Cullom, the late Clerk, be referred to a select committee of five, with instructions to inquire into the various items of his accounts, and to report thereon at any time; and shall have power to send for persons and papers; and that they likewise have authority to look into the accounts and conduct of any previous clerk, and to report thereon.

Mr. NICHOLS. I ask that the 152d rule of the House be read.

The rule was read, as follows:

"152. The following resolution was passed by the House of Representatives, January 30, 1846.—(Journal of the House of Representatives, first session Twenty-Ninth Congress, page 323:—)

"Whereas the Clerk of this House is by law made the responsible officer for the proper disbursement of the contingent fund, and is required to give bond for the faithful disbursement thereof: Therefore,

"Resolved, That from and after the passage of this resolution, all contracts, bargains, or agreements, relative to the furnishing any matter or thing, or for the performance of any labor for the House of Representatives, be made with the Clerk, or approved by him, before any allowance shall be made therefor by the Committee on Accounts."

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I have only to say in regard to the question before us that I hope that the investigation asked for the Clerk may take place. If I understand the rules of the House, the accounts of the Clerk are referred directly to the Committee on Accounts, which is one of our regular standing committees. I submit, then, that the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee cannot take the duty of auditing these accounts from a regular committee of the House; that it requires a vote of two thirds before that can be accomplished, because it suspends one of the regular rules of the House. I make that point of order. Let his accounts take their regular course of reference to one of the standing committees.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that the resolution proposes to take these accounts from the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. MAYNARD. It does not. It merely proposes to inquire with reference to his accounts, and to extend the inquiry to an investigation of the accounts of previous officers.

Mr. NICHOLS. I do not think that I misapprehend the terms of the gentleman's resolution. I understand it to propose a reference of the accounts and the conduct of the Clerk for investigation to a select committee. I have confidence in the Committee on Accounts. I want the accounts of the Clerk to take their natural course, and to let the select committee only have in charge the conduct of the Clerk. I hope that investigation will be had.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. Speaker, I am anxious that the greatest and widest latitude should be given to an investigation into the doings and accounts of every officer of this House and of the General Government, whenever an intimation is made that such a course is necessary. When a Clerk of this House demands an investigation into his accounts, it is wholly immaterial to me whether he be of my political faith or not. I will vote for it in a resolution embracing the greatest and the most liberal power, merely to know, sir, whether there has been anything wrong in the execution of the duties of his office, and his deportment as an officer of this House. Personally, I would prefer that the resolution should not be made in the language in which it is, for I would not screen this Clerk under the action of any other Clerk of this House, whether his immediate predecessor or not. If gentlemen desire an investigation into the doings of a prior Clerk, let a resolution for that purpose be moved in ample and proper form.

I will vote for this resolution with a view to the rights, and to sustain the honor and dignity of the outgoing Clerk, if he is worthy to be sustained. There is no way, in my opinion, that we can more fully and properly get at the conduct and the manner of the discharge of the duties of an officer, than by this kind of direct investigation—this calling upon the committee, and making it imperative upon them to investigate it. I favor investigation in any matter, if there be cause for it; and I will favor it whether the party involved be of my faith in politics or opposed to me. When it shall become necessary to cover his case by a comparison with the acts of his predecessors, then it may be time to move that too; but if the party were a personal friend of mine, I would rather, for his own honor and position, that he stood alone in the investigation, that his case might be fully and completely known to the House and to the country. This is the reason why I will vote now, and at any time where a motion is made, for an investigation into the doings of an officer of this House, or of any officer of the General Government. I shall vote for the resolution in its present shape; but I hope that the gentleman from Tennessee will withdraw the latter portion of it, or couch it in such terms as shall make it imperative upon the committee to go into a full and complete investigation. I would prefer that the gentleman should either omit that part of his resolution, or so modify it as to make it imperative upon the committee to investigate the accounts of the predecessors of the outgoing Clerk as fully and perfectly as his own.

Mr. MAYNARD. Since this view of the case has been taken, and in order to prevent any misconstruction or misinterpretation here or elsewhere, I will withdraw the latter part of my amendment, and let it refer to the late Clerk only, and let him stand or fall by himself.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then, sir, I shall most cordially vote for the resolution as it now stands before the House.

Mr. BURNETT. There seems to be a general feeling upon the part of the House that we should order this investigation; and I think it is due to the outgoing Clerk, as there have been charges made against him of a grave and serious character over responsible signatures, that we should do so. I suppose the House fully understands the subject, and that there is no necessity for any further debate. I therefore now move the previous question.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to propose a modification of the amendment which will obviate the objection of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Nichols,] if the gentleman from Kentucky will allow me to do so, and then the previous question can be called. I understood the objection of the gentleman from Ohio to be that the effect of the adoption of this resolution, as amended, would be to withdraw from the Committee on Accounts their proper duty of auditing and settling the accounts of the Clerk. I would suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that he add the following proviso to his amendment:

Provided, That this shall not withdraw from the Committee on Accounts their legitimate jurisdiction in the auditing and settling the accounts of the Clerk.

If the gentleman from Kentucky will withdraw the demand for the previous question, I will myself propose that modification, and I suppose it will obviate the difficulty of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BURNETT. I do not feel disposed to withdraw the previous question, for I do not understand that this resolution confers upon the special committee any authority to settle the accounts of the Clerk. The object is to provide for an investigation of the conduct of the outgoing Clerk, to ascertain whether his action has been in accordance with law, or whether he has violated his duty and his responsibility to the House; I insist on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. STANTON. I wish to inquire whether the gentleman from Tennessee has withdrawn his amendment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has not withdrawn his amendment. He modified it by striking out the latter clause.

Mr. STANTON. I desire, with the consent of the gentleman from Kentucky, to make a single suggestion.

Mr. BURNETT. I insist on the demand for the previous question, and debate is not in order.

Mr. MASON. I hope my colleague will allow me to make a single remark.

Mr. BURNETT. The appeal of my colleague places me in an embarrassing position. If it be the pleasure of the House that I should withdraw the demand for the previous question, I will do so if my colleague will renew it. [Loud cries of "No, no!"] Well, then, sir, I insist upon the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire whether, under that resolution, the committee will have authority to examine witnesses under oath?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot answer that question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I believe they will not.

Mr. CLINGMAN. They can do it under the law of the last Congress.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. MAYNARD's amendment was agreed to. The resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES obtained the floor.

Mr. GROW. I desire to appeal to my colleague to allow me to offer a resolution of inquiry. I desire to do it now, in order to give the Executive Departments time to furnish the information.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I insist upon the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. Reports are in order from the Committee of Ways and Means.

BILLS REPORTED AND REFERRED.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to authorize the issue of Treasury notes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES, from the same committee, reported bills of the following titles; which were severally read twice, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed:

A bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1859; and

A bill making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government, for the year ending June 30, 1859.

On motion of Mr. J. GLANCY JONES, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

OHIO CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I rise to a question of privilege. The memorial of Clement L. Vandaligham, contesting the right of Lewis D. CAMPBELL to his seat as Representative from the third congressional district of Ohio in this Congress, was presented under the rule, and referred to the Committee of Elections. An order to print it was not taken at the time it was presented, and I now move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask leave to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee, composed of thirteen members, be appointed by the Speaker, to which shall be referred so much of the President's annual message as relates to a railroad from the valley of the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to that.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has not yet expired.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. Reports are in order from the Committee of Claims.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. GIDDINGS, it was Ordered, That leave be given for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of the heirs of Dr. Frederick Seigle, and that they be referred to the Court of Claims.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia, also asked and obtained leave for the withdrawal of certain papers for reference—some to the Committee on Pensions, and some to the Committee of Claims.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask that a communication from the War Department, received the other day, relating to an omission in the Army appropriation bill, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

It was so ordered.

CLERKS TO COMMITTEES.

Mr. QUITMAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be authorized to employ a clerk at a compensation of four dollars a day during his service.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will consent to modify his resolution so as to embrace the employment of clerks for other committees.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it is hardly in order for the gentleman to amend his resolution so as to include other committees, inasmuch as this resolution comes as a report from his committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It has invariably been the practice to do so.

Mr. QUITMAN. The Committee on Military Affairs would not, of course, report a general resolution, although I should like to favor one giving clerks to those committees that have usually had them. But I can only, at present, report this resolution as adopted by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. That question of order was made two years ago, when it was ruled that it was in order to amend a resolution authorizing the employment of a clerk to one committee, by authorizing the employment of clerks to other committees. The question was raised, discussed, and decided by the Chair and acquiesced in by the House.

Mr. QUITMAN. I await with pleasure the decision of the Chair on the subject. I desire, however, that this resolution should not be prejudiced by an amendment. If a general resolution of the House be ruled to be in order by the Speaker I shall not resist it.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I do not know why any gentleman should insist on amending the resolution of the gentleman from Mississippi. That gentleman is instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to ask for the employment of a clerk. That committee occupies a peculiar position. It has its business to do. Other committees of the House may occupy a different position. They may have more business or less business. If the gentleman from Mississippi permits his resolution to be amended by the propositions of other gentlemen who wish to move for clerks to committees, of course his committee must take common fate with all other committees that want clerks. Why do not gentlemen submit independent provisions? The committees will all soon be called, and the chairman, or some member of each that wants a clerk, may submit a resolution to that effect, and the House will vote then on the claim of each committee by itself and for itself. I suggest that the gentleman from Mississippi call the previous question on his resolution, and let it stand or fall on its own merits.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I have before me the Journal of two years ago. A motion was made at that time by the honorable member from Mississippi, precisely as it is made now, and an honorable gentleman from Kentucky then moved an amendment, to insert:

"That the Committees on Elections, Foreign Affairs, Judiciary, Territories, Commerce, Post Office and Post Roads, and Public Lands, be each authorized to employ the services of clerks to said committees respectively, at a per diem compensation of four dollars, so long as said committees deem their services necessary."

That amendment was adopted on a motion then made, as it is made now, by the honorable gentleman from Mississippi. If it be in order, I move now the same amendment that was moved then. It will save a variety of motions, and the consumption of the time of the House.

The SPEAKER. Following the precedent, the Chair will receive the amendment. The Chair doubts very much whether the amendment is strictly in order. But the precedent is established, and the Chair will follow it.

The amendment was reported as above.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I would have preferred that each committee should move for a clerk for itself, and to let the House consider the claim of each committee by itself. But gentlemen have chosen to pursue another course, and therefore, as I have been charged by the Naval Committee to ask a clerk for them, I rise for the purpose of moving an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS,] by inserting the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I accept that amendment, and ask the previous question.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to lay the resolution and amendment on the table.

The motion was not agreed to; there being, on division—ayes 22, noes 112.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered to be put.

The question being now upon the adoption of the amendment,

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. SEWARD asked for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, and BOCKOCK were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 35, noes 91.

So the yeas and nays were ordered, one fifth of the members having voted therefor.

Mr. FLORENCE. I will suggest that this proposition before us is not full. In justice to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I ask that the amendment may be amended so as to include the Committee on Invalid Pensions. That committee was allowed a clerk during the last Congress. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to amend the amendment as I have suggested.

Mr. SEWARD. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. SEWARD. Then I object to it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 115, nays 84; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Banks, Barksdale, Bennett, Bishop, Bococek, Bowie, Branch, Brayton, Bryan, Burlingame, Campbell, Case, Caskie, Chaffee, Ezia Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Conins, Cox, James Craig, Curry, Curtis, Dammell, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dewart, Dick, Dimmick, Dodd, Dowdell, Durfee, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Fenton, Florence, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Goodwin, Granger, Greenwood, Grow, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Horton, Howard, Jewett, Keitt, Kellogg, Kelly, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Landy, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Milson, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Niblack, Purviance, Quitman, Reagan, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Sandidge, Savage, Scott, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Ward, Warren, Cadwalader C. Washburne, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Watkins, Wilson, Augustus R. Wright, and Zollieoffer—115.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Anderson, Andrews, Billingshurst, Blair, Boyce, Buffinton, Burnett, Burns, Burroughs, Cobb, Covode, Cragin, Crawford, Davis of Indiana, Dean, Foley, Foster, Garnett, Gartrell, Goode, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Hoard, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kilgore, Leach, Leiter, Letcher, Lovjoy, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Montgomery, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Mott, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Peyton, Phelps, Pike, Potter, Powell, Ready, Reilly, Ricard, Ruffin, Russell, Scales, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Stanton, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Tappan, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Waldron, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—84.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays on the resolution as amended.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The resolution, as amended, was then agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

APPROPRIATION FOR NATIONAL ARMORIES.

Mr. FAULKNER. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the communication recently received from the Secretary of War calling the attention of the House to a clerical error, by which the appropriation for the support of the national armories was omitted in enrolling the last Army appropriation bill, which was laid on the table, be taken up, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The resolution was adopted.

TEXAS RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. REAGAN, by unanimous consent, presented certain joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Texas, in relation to the raising of a regiment of mounted volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ARMORY APPROPRIATION—AGAIN.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted in reference to the Army appropriation bill. I want it reconsidered with a view of amending the resolution so as to make the Committee on Military Affairs call upon the President for the special account, which is required by law, for the appropriations which he has used for this purpose.

I understand that, by the law of 1809, transfers from one source of appropriation to another, in the same Department, during the recess of Congress, can, in this Government, alone be made by the application of the head of that Department to the President, and that then the President, upon his own responsibility, makes the transfer. In such case, too, the President is required, by the law, to send his special account to Congress, within the first week of the session. I desire that the President shall be called upon for a statement of the means by which he has supplied what was neglected to be appropriated at the last session, through a clerical error, with a view that we may legislate understandingly on the subject. I hope the House will indulge me by a reconsideration of the vote already taken, so that the call upon the President, which I indicate, may be attached to the resolution already adopted. I think it is proper that this should be done.

I trust that I am understood. It is asserted that our Clerk, in enrolling the Army appropriation bill near the close of the last Congress, omitted an appropriation of $370,000, intended for the manufacture of arms. The national armory, it is said, would have stopped if the President of the United States had not exerted the power which was in his hands to draw, for its use, money from other sources within the reach of the War Department. We are now asked, as Congress has met, to reimburse to this appropriation that which was intended for it last year. Now, the law under which the President acted requires him to send a special account to us, during the first week of the session, of the moneys that he has drawn, from what source, and how he has applied them. I am particular upon this point, Mr. Speaker, for the reason that I am one of that class of men who have occupied seats upon this floor, who have attempted to hold Executive action to its proper responsibility in these matters. I have so acted when my political friends have been in power, and when those to whom I have been opposed have been in power; and if any head of the War Department, or the head of any other Department of this Government, has, without calling on the President, undertaken to appropriate to different objects what Congress has appropriated for other and specific objects, then I want to have the President's attention called to his duty in regard to it, and that he shall be compelled, under the law, to make his account to the representatives of the people within the time fixed.

I do not say anything at all about the matter which has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; I only want this other matter to go with it. We cannot legislate intelligently without the information which I seek to obtain; for if we were to appropriate $370,000 again, for the same object for which we intended the appropriation last year, it must be plain, inasmuch as the President has drawn $200,000 from other sources, that we will appropriate $200,000 of a surplus, to that particular object, while we leave the sources from which the President has drawn without a proper supply. Therefore, the President ought to be called upon to render the account which the law requires, within a fixed time. We will then be enabled to see whether the Secretary of War, or those under him, have been applying the public money without the authority of law. I ask, then, that the vote by which the resolution was adopted may be reconsidered, in order that I may move the amendment which I have indicated.

Mr. CURTIS. It seems to me that this matter will go before the Committee on Military Affairs in a rather informal way. It appears that the appropriation for the distribution of arms to the different States was applied to the manufacture of arms in order to supply an omission occasioned, as gentlemen have it, by a clerical error at the last session. The proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, as I understand it, is made with a view of ascertaining how much money has been thus supplied. The excuse for the misapplication—for it is one in point of fact—is, that it was necessary to keep the manufacture of arms going on. This excuse may have been sufficient. Of course, too, it is coupled with the idea of a clerical error. I do not know that this Congress has the right to correct clerical errors of the last Congress. It would be just as easy, and a great deal more regular, to pass an original bill making an appropriation. I see no reason, therefore, why it should be made a matter of reference to the Committee on Military Affairs, although, when the resolution was up, I voted for it. It seems to me, however, that the President should be called on directly for all the facts, and that the better way for the gentleman from Kentucky to accomplish his purpose, would be to introduce a resolution making such a direct call. I will vote, however, for the reconsideration, if he adheres to that motion, in order that my friend may have an opportunity to ascertain how much of the fund referred to has been misapplied.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. As it has been suggested to me that it would be more respectful to make a direct call on the President by a resolution of the House, I withdraw my motion to reconsider, with the view of offering the resolution, on the first opportunity, in proper form.

ISSUE OF TREASURY NOTES.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, a bill of great importance was reported from the Committee of Ways and Means this morning, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It is known to all of us that the Treasury is almost on the verge of bankruptcy, and it is of the utmost consequence that that bill should be taken up and considered at as early a period as possible. I therefore move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. GROW. I hope the gentleman will yield until I present a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman can present his resolution when we come out of committee.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PHELPS in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated that the first business in order before the committee was the consideration of the annual message of the President of the United States.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I move to postpone the consideration of the message, in order that we may reach the bill to authorize the issue of Treasury notes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. Has the bill referred to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] been printed?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill was reported this morning from the Committee of Ways and Means, and has not been printed. A bill, of which it is substantially a copy, has, however, been reported in the other branch of Congress, and has been printed.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am very anxious that we should act speedily upon this bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move to dispense with the first reading of the bill, so that it may be read by clauses.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is not yet before the committee. Certain appropriation bills precede it upon the Calendar.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move to postpone the consideration of all bills which precede the one to authorize the issue of Treasury notes.

The motion was agreed to; and the committee proceeded to the consideration of the bill to authorize the issue of Treasury notes.

The bill was read in extenso; and is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to cause Treasury notes for such sum or sums as the exigencies of the public service may require, but not to exceed, at any time, the amount of twenty millions of dollars, and of denominations not less than fifty dollars for any such note, to be prepared, signed, and issued, in the manner hereinafter provided.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That such Treasury notes shall be paid and redeemed by the United States at the Treasury thereof after the expiration of one year from the dates of said notes; from which dates, until they shall be respectively paid and redeemed, they shall bear such rate of interest as shall be expressed in said notes, which rate of interest upon the first issue, which shall not exceed six millions of dollars of such notes, shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, but shall in no case exceed the rate of six per centum per annum. The residue shall be raised in whole or in part, after public advertisement of not less than thirty days, as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct, by exchanging them at their par value for specie to the bidder or bidders who shall agree to make such exchange at the lowest rate of interest, not exceeding six per centum, upon the said notes: Provided, That after the maturity of any of said notes, interest thereon shall cease at the expiration of sixty days' notice of readiness to pay and redeem the same, which may at any time or times be given by the Secretary of the Treasury in one or more newspapers published at the seat of Government. The payment or redemption of said notes herein provided shall be made to the lawful holders thereof, respectively, upon presentation at the Treasury, and shall include the principal of each note and the interest which shall be due thereon. And for such payment and redemption, at the time or times herein specified, the faith of the United States is hereby solemnly pledged.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That such Treasury notes shall be prepared under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall be signed in behalf of the United States by the Treasurer thereof, and countersigned by the Register of the Treasury. Each of these officers shall keep, in a book or books provided for that purpose, separate, full, and accurate accounts, showing the number, date, amount, and rate of interest, of each Treasury note signed and countersigned by them, respectively; and also, similar accounts showing all such notes as may be paid, redeemed, and canceled, as the same may be returned; all which accounts shall be carefully preserved in the Treasury Department. And the Treasurer shall account quarterly for all such Treasury notes as shall have been countersigned by the Register and delivered to the Treasurer for issue.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, with the approbation of the President, to borrow, from time to time, such sums of money upon the credit of such notes as the President may deem expedient: Provided, That no Treasury notes shall be pledged, hypothecated, sold, or disposed of in any way, for any purpose whatever, either directly or indirectly, for any sum less than the amount of such notes, including the principal and interest thereof.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That said Treasury notes shall be transferable, by assignment indorsed thereon by the person to whose order the same shall be made payable, accompanied together with the delivery of the notes so assigned.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That said Treasury notes shall be received by the proper officers in payment of all duties and taxes laid by the authority of the United States, of all public lands sold by said authority, and of all debts to the United States of any character whatever, which may be due and payable at the time when said Treasury notes may be offered in payment thereof; and upon every such payment credit shall be given for the amount of principal and interest due on the note or notes received in payment on the day when the same shall have been received by such officer.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That every collector of the customs, receiver of public moneys, or other officer or agent of the United States, who shall receive any Treasury note or notes in payment on account of the United States, shall take from the holder of such note or notes a receipt, upon the back of each, stating distinctly the date of such payment and the amount allowed upon such note; and every such officer or agent shall keep regular and specific entries of all Treasury notes received in payment, showing the person from whom received, the number, date, and amount of principal and interest allowed on each and every Treasury note received in payment; which entries shall be delivered to the Treasury with the Treasury note or notes mentioned therein, and if found correct, such officer or agent shall receive credit for the amount, as provided in the last section of this act.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized to make and issue, from time to time, such instructions, rules, and regulations to the several collectors, receivers, depositaries, and all others who may be required to receive such Treasury notes in behalf of, and as agent in any capacity for, the United States, as to the custody, disposal, canceling, and return of any such notes as may be paid to and received by them, respectively, and as to the accounts and returns to be made to the Treasury Department of such receipts, as he shall deem best calculated to promote the public convenience and security, and to protect the United States as well as individuals from fraud and loss.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to cause to be paid the principal and interest of such Treasury notes as may be issued under this act at the time and times when, according to its provisions, the same should be paid. And the said Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized to purchase said notes at par for the amount of principal and interest due at the time of the purchase on such notes. And so much of any unappropriated money in the Treasury as may be necessary for the purpose is hereby appropriated to the payment of the principal and interest of said notes.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That in place of such Treasury notes as may have been paid and redeemed, other Treasury notes to the same amount may be issued: Provided, That the aggregate sum outstanding, under the authority of this act, shall at no time exceed twenty millions of dollars.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That to defray the expenses of engraving, printing, preparing, and issuing the Treasury notes herein authorized, the sum of twenty thousand dollars is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any unappropriated money in the Treasury: Provided, That no compensation shall be made to any officer whose salary is fixed by law for preparing, signing, or issuing Treasury notes.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall falsely make, forge, or counterfeit, or cause or procure to be falsely made, forged, or counterfeited, or willfully aid or assist in falsely making, forging, or counterfeiting, any note in imitation of, or purporting to be, a Treasury note, issued as aforesaid, or shall pass, utter, or publish, or attempt to pass, utter, or publish as true, any false, forged, or counterfeited note, purporting to be a Treasury note as aforesaid, knowing the same to be falsely forged or counterfeited, or shall pass, utter, or publish as true, any falsely altered Treasury note, issued as aforesaid, knowing the same to be falsely altered, every such person shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of felony; and being thereof convicted by due course of law, shall be sentenced to be imprisoned and kept at hard labor for a period not less than three years, nor more than ten years, and to be fined in a sum not exceeding five thousand dollars.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall make or engrave, or cause or procure to be made or engraved, or shall have in his custody and possession any metallic plate engraved after the similitude of any plate from which any notes issued as aforesaid shall have been printed, with intent to use such plate, or cause or suffer the same to be used in forging or counterfeiting any of the notes issued as aforesaid, or shall have in his custody or possession any blank note or notes engraved and printed after the similitude of any notes issued as aforesaid, with intent to use such blanks, or cause or suffer the same to be used in forging or counterfeiting any of the notes issued as aforesaid, or shall have in his custody or possession any paper adapted to the making of such notes, and similar to the paper upon which any such notes shall have been issued, with intent to use such paper, or cause or suffer the same to be used, in forging or counterfeiting any of the notes issued as aforesaid, every such person, being thereof convicted by due course of law, shall be sentenced to be imprisoned and kept at hard labor for a term not less than three nor more than ten years, and fined in a sum not exceeding five thousand dollars.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause a statement to be published monthly of the amount of Treasury notes issued, and paid and redeemed, under the provisions of this act, showing the balance outstanding each month.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill having been read in extenso, it will now be read by sections.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I did not intend to press this bill to-day in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (and it was not on my motion that the House went into committee) in consequence of the bill not having been printed; but if it be the pleasure of the committee, I will go on with the bill and make my explanation now.

Mr. BANKS. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me to say that, inasmuch as the bill is not printed, I hope its consideration will not be pressed at this time. The House does not understand its provisions.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to ask a question of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. True, the bill has not been printed, and it is an unusual course to ask the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to vote on a bill involving important considerations before it has been put in a condition for the members of the committee to examine it. But, from the reading of the bill, I am myself satisfied that it conforms, in all its substantial parts, to the bills of like character that have heretofore been passed and executed. In that view of the case, and in view of the great exigency of the public service, we may possibly obviate the difficulties ordinarily arising in case of bills not being printed, and act upon it at once. I paid particular attention to the reading of the bill; and I desire to know of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether I am not correct in saying that this bill conforms in every important and essential particular to the Treasury note bills that have been heretofore passed by Congress, and under which notes have been heretofore issued?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The exigencies of the Government require as prompt and speedy action on this bill as is practicable. The bill was not placed in my hands till this morning, when it was brought before the Committee of Ways and Means. I was instructed to report the bill, and did this morning report it. But inasmuch as it was not printed, and could not possibly be printed in time, I did not intend to ask the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union with a view to take up this or any appropriation bill that was not printed so that members could refer to it. I am as anxious for as much expedition as possible. But still, I would be unwilling to ask to have this bill taken up now unless the members have, in some way or other, informed themselves sufficiently as to its merits to allow me to proceed without any objection on the ground of its not being printed and ready for their use. It was not on my motion, therefore, that the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and it is proper that I should give this explanation.

In answer to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Houston,] I would say that the bill is very simple in its provisions, and is quite in conformity with, and very similar to, all the bills of the same character that have been heretofore passed; but still, I will not press it upon the committee unless members are, with a great degree of unanimity, prepared for it. I intend to ask for the privilege of bringing it forward on Monday, by which time it will be printed.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I had understood from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, as well as from other sources, that the Government desired to have this measure acted upon speedily. It was intimated by the honorable chairman that on Monday next he would make an effort to suspend the rules in order to put this measure upon its passage; and in that view of the matter, I ventured to move that the House should resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, believing, notwithstanding the bill had not been printed, that its general merits might be discussed; that, in the mean time, the bill might be printed, and that thus the proposition which the chairman intimated he would make on Monday might be facilitated by some discussion; for I apprehend that this House is not yet fully prepared to vote on so important a measure as that of issuing $20,000,000 of Treasury notes, without some discussion. I beg to make my apology to the honorable chairman if I have committed an error in submitting my motion. If he is not prepared, on this occasion, to defend the merits of the bill, if he is not prepared to explain to the committee its provisions, I will, with very great pleasure, move that the committee rise.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] that the very last inference he should draw from my remarks, is that I am not as well prepared now as I shall be at any time to explain and defend the provisions of this bill. He certainly labors under a misapprehension as to the intention of my remarks.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I meant to insinuate nothing of the kind.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I hardly consider my colleague upon the committee under any necessity of making an apology, because I did not regard his action in any other light than that of kindness upon his part; but I felt it my duty to state to the committee that, while the exigencies of the Government required expedition, I did not wish the committee to suppose that I would precipitate a measure of such importance as issuing $20,000,000 of Treasury notes, without giving them an opportunity to read the bill. If it is the pleasure of the committee, however, with a tolerable degree of unanimity, to proceed with the consideration and discussion of the bill now, I am ready to do so.

Mr. BANKS. I have no doubt at all that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is ready to proceed now. He has had a better opportunity of examining its provisions, and of satisfying himself of their correctness, than the rest of us. But, sir, this is an important measure; one which should not be pressed upon us for consideration or discussion in any form until we have had the time and opportunity to examine its provisions in some manner other than from its mere reading at the Clerk's desk. I think this bill for the issuing of Treasury notes is not like the Treasury loan bills which have been heretofore passed by Congress, with perhaps one or two exceptions. If we consider the times in which this measure is asked to be adopted, and the circumstances under which the Government is placed, I think there will be found no precedent—I am not perfectly certain on this point, but I think there will be found no precedent—for the passage of a bill like this. Certainly, sir, there is no such exigency of the Government at the present time as to require the passage of a bill of this important character at once without giving time to understand its provisions and ascertain its merits. The Government are not now, as heretofore when such loans have been negotiated, engaged in war. If there was an immediate demand for money, which could not be obtained by the Government in the regular manner, I certainly would be the last man to interpose objection to the immediate consideration of the bill. I trust, however, that, under the circumstances, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] will not insist upon the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. RITCHIE. If my colleague will allow me, I will suggest another reason why the consideration of this bill should be postponed for some days, until we can have an opportunity of examining it. It has not been more than six weeks since the Secretary of the Treasury was in the market purchasing up claims against the United States, and paying $130 for every $100 of debt. Sir, for one, I want some opportunity of examining the facts presented, and ascertaining the reason why we are now called upon to issue Treasury notes within six weeks of the time that debts, not due yet for some years, have been purchased by the Treasury Department at thirty per cent. premium. Some gentleman suggests that the Treasury paid only sixteen per cent. premium. Be that as it may, I know they have paid a large premium. I repeat, that this has been done within six weeks, or two months at furthest, and I can see nothing which has occurred which should precipitate upon us the necessity of the adoption of so extraordinary a measure at this time—on Friday afternoon, at the close of the second week of the session. We have had no such indication in the House previously, during these two weeks of the session which have already elapsed. The President scarcely alluded to the subject in his annual message, and I repeat, again, that it seems most extraordinary to me, that the Secretary of the Treasury should find himself under the necessity of pressing this important measure upon us within six or eight weeks after the purchase of claims against the Government to a large amount, which, under the law, he was not required to redeem for years; and especially when that measure of relief is the issue of paper money, which I had supposed was the horror of the Democratic party.

Mr. GROW. I concur in opinion with my colleague, [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES,] if I understood him correctly in the impropriety of pressing this bill upon the consideration of the committee at this time unless by unanimous consent. I do not regard it as a bill of so little consequence as to warrant us in going on to legislate upon it without knowing what is in it. It is a bill which proposes, in the exigency in which the country is now placed, to issue $20,000,000 of Treasury notes—of paper currency—the effect of which will be to keep the coin in the vaults of the misers who have hoarded it there, and which have brought these troubles upon the country. Sir, this crisis has not been precipitated upon us because there was not gold and silver enough in the country. It is because the coin has been hoarded up in the vaults of misers, and the country compelled to use paper currency as its circulating medium. Sir, for one I am not prepared further to embarrass the trade of the country by adding to the cause which has produced it, by increasing the circulation of paper currency, and thereby keeping the coin which has been hoarded from general circulation.

Now, sir, I hope my colleague will not press this bill to-day, not even for discussion, for, as suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] how are we to discuss it without understanding its contents?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to ask my colleague who is upon the floor, as well as my colleague who spoke before him, [Mr. RITCHIE,] whether it is their intention to discuss the merits of the bill, upon a question to postpone its consideration? I do not desire to consider the bill at this time, and have so announced to the committee; but I would suggest to gentlemen, if they desire that the committee shall rise, and that the subject be postponed until some future day for consideration, whether it is fair upon that question to go into a discussion upon the merits of the bill?

Mr. GROW. I will say in answer to my colleague, that it is not my desire to discuss the bill at the present time. My only object was to call the attention of the committee to the importance of the subject before us. I hope my colleague will move that the committee rise, and that we shall not proceed to the consideration of this subject until we have had time and opportunity of examining and of understanding it.

Mr. LETCHER. I am glad to see any evidence of improvement in the way of legislation; and nothing has afforded me more satisfaction than the remarks of the gentleman who has just taken his seat. I recollect that at the last Congress that gentleman was in the habit of reporting bills, and then, by calling the previous question, forcing us to vote upon them without any opportunity of explanation or debate, even bills of great importance, relating to the organization and general management of the Territories of the United States.

Mr. GROW. Will the gentleman allow me one word?

Mr. LETCHER. Oh certainly, anything the gentleman pleases.

Mr. GROW. The gentleman from Virginia will recollect that I reported no bill during the last Congress, upon which I called upon the House to act, until it had been printed and before us for at least ten days.

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will recollect, that while he reported his bills and had them printed, he took particular pains to call the previous question, and cut off all opportunity of examination by debate. Now, sir, what was the use of printing a bill if you had no opportunity of expressing an opinion about what was printed? What was the use of printing a bill of twenty sections and then excluding every member from all debate upon every one of those twenty sections? It seems to me that the gentleman over the way is making considerable progress, and I congratulate him, and congratulate the House upon it.

Mr. GROW. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to allow me just a single word, to relieve myself from the charge of inconsistency which he seems disposed to make in reference to my conduct. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to point to a single bill reported by me upon which the House was called to act without discussion, unless it related to a subject which had been discussed more or less in Congress and throughout the country for months. I suppose the gentleman refers to the Kansas bills?

Mr. LETCHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. GROW. Well, sir, the gentleman knows that the subject of those bills had been discussed in the House and in the country for the last four years.

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman will recollect another thing which occurred in the last Congress. There were bills reported by the Land Committee, at that session, which we were forced to vote upon without their ever having been printed. We had no opportunity to see them, either in manuscript or in print, and we were called upon here to vote upon them; and we actually did vote, under the gag of the previous question, some twenty million acres of the public land. It seems that we shall probably have nothing of this sort in the present Congress; that those gentlemen will unite with us; that we will not only have our bills printed, but we will have them referred to the Committee of the Whole, and that he, and all others who are disposed to assail those bills, will have abundant opportunity to do so, before they are called upon to pass judgment, in the shape of ay or no, upon them. With this view, I move that the committee rise.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PHELPS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 4, to authorize the issue of Treasury notes, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask leave to submit a resolution.

Mr. BANKS. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. RITCHIE moved that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The question was taken; and the motion was disagreed to, there being on a division—ayes 75, noes 115.

Mr. SAVAGE. I ask leave to introduce a bill granting pensions to the officers and soldiers of the war with Great Britain, in 1812, and those engaged in Indian wars during that period, of which previous notice has been given; that it may be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. BANKS. I insist on the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. Reports from committees are in order.

CLERKS TO COMMITTEES.

Mr. KEITT. I am instructed, sir, by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be authorized to employ a clerk during the session, or during such portion of it as they may deem his services necessary, at the usual rate of compensation.

I wish to state in this connection, Mr. Speaker, that I have been on that committee for years. We had no clerk; but the increase of business before that committee renders it necessary that we should now have one. I understand from the officers of the Capitol extension that the steps of the new building will be thrown to some considerable distance into the square in the rear of the Capitol, and that it will be necessary for us, in consequence, to enlarge the grounds very considerably. The late chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, in the Senate, informed me that he had given an order, which I believe has not yet been executed, to make proper surveys and explorations for that purpose. We have before us, also, the question of the necessity of new buildings for the Department of State, for the War and for the Navy Departments. We desire to put the House in possession of all the facts. We desire that not only all the estimates shall be spread before the House, but also all the information which can be procured to enable the House to judge properly to what extent it will go. This will throw upon the committee, which consists only of five members, and is one of the smallest of the standing committees, a great deal of work. We want the clerk only for the time that his services may be necessary to facilitate the business before us.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. In regard to this committee, for which my friend is so anxious to procure a clerk, I will say that I had the pleasure of serving on it with him, for two years, and that, in my opinion, any clerk in five minutes can do all the business that will come before it during the session. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEITT. In reply, I have only to say, that if the gentleman is correct, the committee will not employ a clerk. I pledge myself that the clerk shall not be employed unless his services be necessary, and no longer than they are necessary.

Mr. FLORENCE. I do not desire to embarrass the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina, but a sense of duty, sir, to the committee of which I am a member, and indeed of duty to the country, compels me to ask that a clerk for the Committee on Invalid Pensions may also be provided for. It will be impossible for the members of that committee faithfully to discharge their duties unless a clerk is given to them. As a matter of economy it is better that the files of applications which incur the table and cases of that committee should be examined and disposed of at once. There are applications there which, if permitted to remain without investigation and report, will some day come here and draw out of the treasury millions of dollars. They ought all to be examined when the evidence is fresh. It is the desire of the committee that this shall be done, and that all the claims which are groundless shall be brought here promptly, and by the House immediately consigned to the "tomb of the Capulets." I wish that the table of the Committee on Invalid Pensions may be cleared, and kept cleared, and that the Treasury may be saved from the efforts made to plunder it. We want to perform our whole duty and nothing else. I hope to be an active member of that committee, and that in the discharge of our duties we may be assisted by the appointment of a clerk, whose services are necessary to us. Let this committee be treated as other committees are.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. If there is any prospect that this resolution will be adopted, I desire that it shall be amended so as to fix the compensation of these clerks. It provides, now, that they shall receive "the usual compensation." I move to strike that out, and insert, "at a compensation of four dollars per day."

Mr. FLORENCE. Well, that is the usual compensation. That is the compensation paid to all clerks of committees. They all get four dollars a day.

Mr. KEITT. I accept the modification.

Mr. FLORENCE. Certainly; there is no objection to it.

Mr. LETCHER. Mr. Speaker, I have been listening very patiently to see whether the Committee on Roads and Canals would not want a clerk also, and whether they would not be followed by the Committee on the Militia; and whether the Committee on Agriculture would not be in, in the course of time. I understand that the Agricultural Committee are ready, and that they desire to have an opportunity to offer a proposition for a clerk, too.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word just here?

Mr. LETCHER. Yes, sir, unless my friend is going to try to embarrass me. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. With the permission of the gentleman from Virginia, I would say to him, that I do not suppose the Committee on Roads and Canals will ask for a clerk. So far as I am concerned, I have been upon various committees in this House, and I have never been upon but one that required a clerk, and that was the Committee of Ways and Means. My experience, unless business has greatly augmented, is that there are but two committees in this House which require permanent clerks, and those committees are the Ways and Means and Claims.

Mr. LETCHER. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLORENCE] says that this clerk will be a very important addition to this committee; that he applies for one, not only from a sense of duty to himself, but from a sense of duty to the Treasury, and to the country. Now, sir, it strikes me, to push his argument a little further, that if one clerk will save so much to the Treasury, and to the country, if we furnish each of the nine members of that committee with a clerk, they would possibly be enabled to save a good deal more. I am curious to know what this clerk is to do. When papers are referred to the committee, the Clerk of this House sends them to the committee room, and enters them upon a book which is kept there. What is the clerk, whom the gentleman proposes to appoint, to do under these circumstances? What business is he to perform? Is he to write out reports, to make examinations of the cases, and to prepare reports to be presented to this House? It strikes me that that cannot be legitimately the business of a clerk. It is a matter to be committed to the member himself, and he is to be responsible for his work, together with his committee, and for the information which may be presented to the House. Now, I desire to know from the gentleman from Pennsylvania what he proposes to do with his clerk, and how money is to be saved by the appointment of one; and I will give way to hear his answer.

Mr. FLORENCE. I cannot make any bargain for the floor with the gentleman from Virginia. I am just as determined against making bargains for the farming out of this floor as I am against being catechized. [Laughter.] I can only speak for myself. So far as other committees are concerned, I can say, in Bible language, "sufficient unto the hour is the evil thereof." [Renewed laughter.] The gentleman says I am not well versed in Scripture. I wish I was better versed in it; but I think that some gentlemen here are no better off in this respect than I am. I pity them, and can only say to them, that "While the lamp holds out to burn,

The vilest sinner may return."

[Much laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, that is not exactly from Scripture, but it is from the Methodist hymn book; and they quote it over in Ohio, Dr. Olds once said here, just as familiarly and frequently as they do the Bible, and I suppose it is pretty nearly as good authority.

But, sir, the gentleman from Virginia desires to know what we want a clerk to the Committee on Invalid Pensions for. If the gentleman had listened to my remarks when I was last up, he would have heard. I have no other purpose, as I said, than a desire to facilitate the business devolved upon that committee. I desire a clerk to assist the members of the committee in making such investigations as it is their duty to make, and as the occupation of their time forbids them to make. I occupy a position upon two committees, for which, perhaps, I am indebted to the Speaker, although I would have preferred to have been left off one of them. But having been assigned to this duty by the Chair, a desire to fulfill all my duties here prompts me to wish to be an active member of the committees; and in order to be an active member, it is necessary that I should be afforded such facilities as ought to be afforded to gentlemen occupying seats upon this floor. I, as an individual member of the committee, want the assistance of a clerk. The chairman of the committee wants the assistance of a clerk. It is necessary that we should have one to make examinations, and communicate to us such information as it is our duty to have, and without which we cannot perform our duties.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] says that he knows of but two committees of the House that ought to have clerks. Then why did not he and the gentleman from Virginia express their virtuous indignation this morning at the attempt made to rob the Treasury by appointing clerks to other committees?

I do not desire to institute comparisons. But I have served on other committees, and I must say that the Committee on Invalid Pensions—and I have had two years' experience upon it—requires a clerk very much more than did other committees on which I have served, to which the House allowed clerks. I believed at the time they required clerks, and voted to allow them to employ clerks in the performance of the same duty which now prompts me to ask the House to accord to the Committee on Invalid Pensions that to which they are entitled.

The gentleman from Virginia asks how it is going to save the Treasury? Now, he knows as well as I do, and better, that when bundles of papers become covered over with dust, and exhibit a moth-eaten appearance, they are just exactly like bottles of wine packed away in cellars and covered with cobwebs; they are considered to have a much better claim upon the tastes of the epicurean members of this House than if they were fresh with the sand yet thrown over them. I want to clean out these cobwebbed papers. I want to get some of them before the House, in order that they may receive fair and proper action. I desire that claimants upon the Treasury, who apply here for relief for services rendered their country, may not be turned away. There are hundreds of people knocking at the door of the Committee on Invalid Pensions—and there were last year—deserving people, who have performed their duty to the country, but who, because of some mere technical difficulties in the way, cannot get justice done them at the Department. I desire that relief may be given to them—that pity may be extended to "The sorrows of a poor old man Whose trembling limbs have borne him to your door."

[Great laughter.] Is the gentleman from Virginia answered?

Mr. LETCHER. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. FLORENCE. Well, then, if the gentleman is answered, I demand the previous question. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. LETCHER. I hope the gentleman does not want to deprive me of an opportunity of reply.

Mr. FLORENCE. Oh, no; I would do injustice to no man. I would throttle no man. I would stifle no debate. I do not desire to press the demand for the previous question.

Mr. LETCHER. My friend from Pennsylvania says he makes no bargains; but I see that, when he gets an opportunity, he appropriates everything he is entitled to, and then tries to cut off other people from what legitimately belongs to them. Now, I tell him, as he asks if I am answered, that I am not answered yet, and that I have no assurance how he proposes, under his plan, to save money. He has not undertaken to furnish any information that goes to prove that the House is to save one dollar by it. On the contrary, his own argument demonstrates that he is in the precise position which I assigned him before, and that it was under the influence of that position he had asked for his clerk. He comes out with that candor for which he is distinguished, and tells you that he wants a clerk to make the investigations—to furnish him with his authorities—and to prepare things to his hand, so that he may report them to the House. Well, if the gentleman cannot get the authorities himself, how does he expect the clerk to get them?

Mr. FLORENCE. I have not time.

Mr. LETCHER. How has it been with your predecessors on that committee? Have not they had time to discharge all their duties?

Mr. FLORENCE. I have been here so long that I know nothing about my predecessors. When I came here to Congress there were twenty millions of people in the United States; and now we have an increase of fifty per cent. on that, and with it a proportional increase of business in our committee.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, I believe there has been no war in this country within the last three years to increase the number of invalid pensioners, and yet it has been within the last two years that a clerk has been claimed for that committee. Now, has the business multiplied so much within the last two years as to make this clerk necessary, when he was not needed before? It strikes me that it has not.

A MEMBER. Many soldiers have got lame since.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, I have no doubt that many of them have got lame since, but others have died; and so it goes. But the gentleman says that many of these papers down in the office are covered with dust and cobwebs, and all that sort of thing, and that he wants these papers examined and reported. Has he ever taken the trouble to look and see how many of these cases, covered with dust and cobwebs, have been reported upon, and adversely reported upon? Has he ever examined to see whether they contain merit or not? If they have lain there covered with dust and cobwebs, and if nobody has called them to the attention of the House or of the committee, I take it that that is conclusive evidence that the cases are without merit, or those who knew them to possess merit would be here pressing them on the attention of Congress. It does not seem to me, then, that there is anything in this to operate on the House.

But I believe this is called a Democratic Congress. My friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE], who has been here for such a great length of time that the memory of man runneth not back to the contrary—[to Mr. FLORENCE]—how long have you been here?

Mr. FLORENCE. Six years.

Mr. LETCHER. He and I have been here the same length of time, according to his own account; and yet, in my six years' experience, I have never seen the evidence that was sufficient to satisfy me that it was important to have all these committees organized with clerks. Now, sir, it may be a very convenient matter for him to have a clerk—

Mr. GIDDINGS. I desire to put an interrogatory to the gentleman. Does the Committee on Invalid Pensions keep a record of its proceedings, its decisions, and its reports?

Mr. FLORENCE. I do not think they do.

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says he does not think they do.

Mr. FLORENCE. I will answer that. I do not think they do, for the reason that they have no clerk. [Laughter.]

Mr. LETCHER. Why, sir, did they keep no record for the two years that they have had a clerk?

Mr. FLORENCE. They did.

Mr. LETCHER. Then they have a record; and a very clean one, too. I suppose there is not a page of it stained even with a blot.

Now, all jesting aside, it seems to me that we are running this thing too far; and that those of us who come here as Democrats, and who profess to go in for an economical administration of Government, ought to practice some little of that economy in the administration of the House. It is not a week since we heard great talk about extravagance in regard to printing; and to-day we have had the subject of extravagance in regard to engraving, and extravagances of other kinds referred to; and yet, in the face of all this, the very first opportunity that presents itself, we go on here to multiply clerks, and to run through exactly the same grades of extravagance that we have been complaining of in the administration of the last Congress. Now, let us set an example. Let us try to reduce these expenditures, and then probably we will have less reason to complain of the officers of the House, of one grade or another, who are merely the agents of the House to carry out its will.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania, moved the previous question.

Mr. BISHOP. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BANKS. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion, so that the States may be called for resolutions. There are many members who want to present resolutions. The list can be called in less than twenty minutes.

The motion to adjourn was withdrawn.

Mr. BANKS. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER announced that the business in order was the call of committees.

The list of standing committees having been called,

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, (at two o'clock and fifty-five minutes.) I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I have a report to make from a select committee.

The SPEAKER. Reports are in order from select committees.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I am instructed to offer the following resolution for the consideration of the House:

Resolved, That the select committee of seven, "to inquire into the laws in relation to the printing for the House of Representatives, the prices paid therefor, and the duties of the Public Printer, and to report upon such changes or improvements therein as they may deem advisable," be also directed to inquire into the prices paid for the binding of Congress, and the laws regulating the same; and that they be also directed to make the same inquiries into the prices paid for engraving and paper for the printing of Congress, and also for the publication, binding, &c., of the Congressional Globe; and that the said committee be directed to report upon all of these subjects in the manner pointed out by the resolution of the House of December 9, 1857.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The resolution was then adopted.

ENABLING ACT FOR KANSAS.

Mr. BANKS, under the call of States for resolutions, &c., introduced, in pursuance to previous notice, a bill to authorize the people of the Territory of Kansas to form a constitution and State government preparatory to their admission into the Union with all the rights of the original States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote referring and ordering the bill to be printed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. LETCHER. Before the vote is taken on laying the motion to reconsider on the table, I want to know if this bill has been ordered to be printed?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. LETCHER. It seems to me that is very unusual.

Mr. BANKS. I ask that the vote may be taken upon the motion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will withdraw his objection to the printing of this bill. The committee want it printed for their own convenience. I see no objection to having it printed, and I hope the gentleman will withdraw all objection to it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It has never been the practice of the House, and I think it is wrong to do it. The proper time to order a bill to be printed is after the committee have examined it and reported it back to the House. If it is printed now, and the committee report it back with only one amendment, it will have to be printed again. I do not think it is a proper course to pursue, and I demand the yeas and nays upon laying the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The gentleman will recollect that, in the last Congress, several of the Kansas bills were ordered to be printed when they were originally introduced.

Mr. GROW. Every one of them.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That has not been the usual practice; and I think it is a very bad practice.

Mr. GROW. I recollect that at least two of those bills were printed when they were referred to the Committee on Territories during the last Congress; and I think that, where the bills are important, the practice is a good one. It facilitates the action of the committee, and the expense is a mere trifle.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If a single amendment is made, they will have to be printed again when they are reported back to the House.

Mr. BANKS. If the House will allow me a single word: it is perfectly true, as the gentleman says, that it is not customary to print bills at this stage of proceedings; but the House certainly has the power to order it to be printed. The bill is one of sufficient importance, in my judgment, to justify the House in the exercise of its discretion to give the order to print. I trust that the bill will be printed.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to reconsider was then laid on the table.

MASSACHUSETTS RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. CHAFFEE presented the joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, relative to the claims of that State against the General Government, for militia services during the last war with Great Britain.

Also, joint resolutions of the Legislature of the same State, respecting Hayti and Liberia; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, moved that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I rise to a question of order. That motion has been made and rejected once to-day, and I submit that it is not in order to renew it. The question was settled in the last Congress, on my appeal, by the House, that, where a motion had once been made to adjourn over and rejected, it was not in order to renew it during the same day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair believes the question has been settled both ways. He will entertain the motion.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The only decisions ever made by the House are such as I have referred to. Two decisions were made at the same Congress; one upon my motion, and the other, after the Kansas-Nebraska bill was passed, on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, who hoped that the House would reverse its former decision. But the House adhered to it. I think it is right. I know no decision of the House changing it, though the practice was different before.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the practice, so far as he remembers, has been uniform and consistent, with perhaps a single exception. The Chair entertains the motion of the gentleman from Maine, that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. KEIT demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KEIT and BUFFINTON were appointed.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative, the tellers having reported—ayes 73, noes 94.

So the House refused to adjourn over.

MEMBERS' COMPENSATION.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, introduced the following joint resolution, of which previous notice had been given:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the compensation allowed to members of Congress, by the act entitled "An act to regulate the compensation of members of Congress," approved August 16, 1856, be paid in the following manner, to wit: On the first day of the first session of each Congress, or as soon thereafter as he may apply, each Senator, Representative, and Delegate, shall receive his mileage as now provided by law, and all his compensation, from the beginning of his term, to be computed at the rate of $250 per month, and during the session compensation at the same rate. And on the first day of the second, or any subsequent session, he shall receive his mileage, as now allowed by law, and all compensation which has accrued during the adjournment, at the rate aforesaid, and during said session compensation per month at the same rate.

And be it further resolved, That so much of the said act approved August 16, 1856, as conflicts with this joint resolution, and postpones the payment of said compensation until the close of each session, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I call for the previous question on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Is it in order to move that this resolution be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means?

The SPEAKER. It is not, the previous question having been called.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the gentleman from New York to modify his resolution in one particular. It says that, "to each Senator, Representative, and Delegate, shall be paid, on the first day of the first session of each Congress, or as soon as they apply," and I am apprehensive that that would apply to a member who had not made his appearance and discharged his duties at the commencement of a session. Let it be, that members who are in attendance may draw their money.

Mr. TAYLOR. I accept the modification.

Mr. BURNETT. The members' compensation bill already provides for absentees, and this resolution does not interfere with it in that respect. The modification is, therefore, unnecessary.

The call for the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, demanded the yeas and nays on ordering the resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. GROW demanded the previous question on the passage of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. MORGAN called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The joint resolution was passed.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, moved that the vote by which the joint resolution was passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. BENNETT. I offer the following resolution, and demand the previous question upon it:

Resolved, That so much of the President's message and accompanying documents as refer to the subject of a national railroad from the Mississippi valley to the Pacific ocean, be referred to a select committee of —, to be appointed by the Speaker, and that it shall be the duty of said committee to take into consideration all such petitions and matters relating to the construction of roads, railroads, or telegraph lines to the Pacific ocean, as shall be referred to them by the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. That resolution cannot be in order, because the President's message is not in the possession of the House. The message has been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and there is no way in which we can now get at it, or any part of it, except by having it reported back, or by discharging the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from so much of it as relates to this subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the question of order is well taken by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BENNETT. I will then modify my resolution by striking out that part of it which relates to the President's message, and will simply provide for the appointment of a committee on this subject. My resolution will then read:

Resolved, That a select committee of — be appointed by the Speaker to take into consideration all such petitions and matters relating to the construction of roads, railroads, or telegraph lines to the Pacific ocean, as shall be referred to them by the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I thought the Chair decided the gentleman's resolution to be out of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has a right to modify his resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The rule is, that no gentleman shall offer more than one resolution on a call of the States for resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has not offered one, because the point of order of the gentleman from Tennessee prevented him from offering it.

Mr. BENNETT. Desiring only to test the sense of the House, I demand the previous question on my resolution.

Mr. COBB. I ask my colleague on the Committee on Public Lands to withdraw the demand for the previous question to enable me to submit a motion to refer this subject to the Committee on Public Lands, which I think is the proper committee. He can then call the previous question, and let the sense of the House be tested.

Mr. BENNETT. I decline to withdraw the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to another question of order. There have been no petitions presented here, that I am aware of, upon this subject. The resolution proposes to change the rules of the House by raising a committee not provided for by those rules, to take charge of a subject which is not before the House, and which has not been brought here by any petitions—there is nothing to refer to the committee. It requires one day's notice to change the rules so as to raise any such committee.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to offer an amendment which will obviate the difficulty which the gentleman suggests.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the resolution is in order, and calls the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to the phraseology of the resolution.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I move that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the Chair decides the resolution to be in order, I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. GROW. I appeal to the gentleman from Tennessee to allow me to offer a resolution calling for information merely, which is for the advantage of every member.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Pending the count,

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain a question of order while the House is dividing.

Mr. MORGAN. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn over.

The yeas and nays were ordered, thirty-six members seconding the call.

Mr. FLORENCE. I desire to withdraw my motion.

The motion was withdrawn.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, and it was agreed to; and thereupon, at half past three o'clock, p. m., the House adjourned till to-morrow, at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, December 19, 1857.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report from the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, an estimate of the necessary appropriation to erect a fort at New Inlet, North Carolina; which was, on motion of Mr. REID, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey, presented the petition of the heirs of Isaac and Sarah Blauvelt praying to be allowed a pension for the services of Isaac Blauvelt in the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of the heirs of Mary Hopper, widow of John A. Hopper, a revolutionary officer, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SEWARD presented the petition of Lucetta Bell, heir of Abram Van Buskirk, a soldier in the revolutionary war, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

He also presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying that the territory recently purchased from Mexico may be separated from the Territory of New Mexico, and erected into a new Territory, under the name of Arizona; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. MALLORY presented the petition of Fanny Tyler, widow of Lieutenant William H. Tyler, of the Army, praying to be allowed half pay for five years from the death of her husband; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the memorial of William Heine, praying for compensation for services as an artist in the Japan expedition; which, with the papers on file relative to the case, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented additional papers in relation to the claim of Miles Devine; which, with his petition on file, were referred to the Committee on Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, it was Ordered, That the petition of Ephraim Hunt, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Benjamin Alvord, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CONGRESSIONAL CHAPLAINS.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) in relation to the clergymen of the city of Washington who may officiate as Chaplains of the Senate and House of Representatives, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I submit the following resolutions:

Resolved by the Senate, That in consideration of the financial condition of the country and its industrial interests, as well as of the wants and embarrassments of the Treasury of the United States, the rates of duty levied under the tariff act of the 3d of March, 1857, ought to be materially increased.

Resolved, further, That experience having demonstrated that the present mode of ascertaining the dutiable value of imported goods is productive of monstrous frauds, injurious alike to the Government and the honest importer, a system of home valuation ought to be immediately substituted therefor.

Mr. President, yesterday I declared it to be my purpose to vote for the bill for the issue of Treasury notes to the amount of $20,000,000, in the confident expectation that the measure of incurring that debt would be accompanied by some provision for an increase of revenue. These resolutions propose that; and contain the further proposition, that, having experience of frauds practiced under the present system of ascertaining the dutiable value of the goods imported, we should now immediately substitute a home valuation for it. These are propositions of a financial character which have been long considered by this House; I shall therefore be content to have a vote of the Senate upon them now.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope they will lie over. They are important resolutions, and I am not willing to consider them to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolutions must lie over under the rule.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the resolutions be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. J. C. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 2) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the compensation of members of Congress," approved August 16, 1856; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

TREASURY NOTES.

On motion of Mr. HUNTER, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 13) to authorize the issue of Treasury notes; the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. FESSENDEN, to add to the tenth section of the bill:

And provided further, That the power to issue and reissue Treasury notes, conferred on the President of the United States by this act, shall cease and determine on the 1st day of January, 1859.

Mr. HUNTER. There is a verbal amendment which I should like to make, which can be done by general consent. It is in the eleventh line of the first section. The term "raised" is applied to Treasury notes. I move to strike out the word "raised," and insert "issued."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is now on the amendment of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN.]

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the closing hours of the Thirty-Fourth Congress were consumed by efforts to deplete an overflowing Treasury; the early days of the Thirty-Fifth Congress are consumed in efforts to fill an empty Treasury. Then, the Secretary of the Treasury invoked Congress to reduce the accumulating coin in the Treasury by a revision of the revenue laws; now, the Secretary of the Treasury asks Congress to fill an empty Treasury by the issue of $20,000,000 of Treasury notes. Then, the far-seeing business men of the country hoped to ward off the impending commercial revulsion by the depletion of the Treasury; now, that Treasury has been emptied by the most sweeping commercial revulsion which ever came upon the country.

The Finance Committee, in compliance with the recommendation of the executive department, proposes to issue $20,000,000 of Treasury notes, as a temporary expedient. The Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] proposes to restrict this issue to $10,000,000. I shall vote for this amendment, although I have no doubt we shall be called upon, within sixty days, to grant the entire amount. I regard the proposed mode of supplying the temporary wants of the Government preferable to a loan. These Treasury notes, if the interest is low enough, will not be taken or held by the capitalists, but will be used by the banks and the merchants, as remittances. They will be, in fact, equivalent to specie funds. I am willing to vote to supply the temporary wants of the Treasury by this mode, but I am not willing to begin, by this system, a national debt. I am opposed to increasing the national debt without providing the means to liquidate that debt at the earliest practicable moment, by increasing the duties on iron, cotton, and woolen manufactures. The issue of these notes is limited to the 1st of January, 1859. It is, so far, temporary, in its form; but I believe that, on the 1st of January, 1859, the Treasury will be more than $20,000,000 in debt. Sir, I make the prediction, and I am willing to put it upon record, that on the opening of the year 1859 we shall be from $20,000,000 to $30,000,000 short of the means to meet the current expenses of the Government.

On the 1st of July, the beginning of the fiscal year, the amount in the Treasury was nearly $18,000,000. The receipts of the first quarter, ending on 30th of September, amounted to nearly $21,000,000, making $39,000,000. The receipts of the present quarter, ending on the 1st of January next, of course are not yet known; they must, however, be somewhere between five and ten million dollars. The expenditures of the Government from the 1st of July last to the 1st of January next, must be somewhere about forty-five million dollars for the first half of the fiscal year.

Now, sir, we are to commence the year 1859 with an empty Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury comes here for $20,000,000 of Treasury notes. He estimates the receipts from the 30th of September last to the 1st of July next, at $33,000,000. Although it is a very difficult thing to speak with accuracy on a subject of this character—for if we turn back and read the debates from the foundation of the Government in regard to the working of the tariffs and the finances, we shall find that the most eminent men of the country have been greatly mistaken in their estimates of the operation of revenue laws—I believe that we shall commence one year from this time with the Treasury short by more than the $20,000,000 we now propose to issue in the shape of Treasury notes. I think that the Secretary of the Treasury has overestimated largely the receipts for the remainder of the current fiscal year. He makes a deduction of twenty-five per cent. for diminished importations into the country, but he makes no deduction whatever for the diminished value of the goods imported. Now, sir, I venture to say that the reduction of value of the importations of the country is at least thirty or thirty-three per cent. The Secretary of the Treasury makes no allowance whatever for this reduction in value of our importations. I do not believe that the importations, during the coming six months, in quantity, will be anything like the importations of the same months last year, and the reduction in the value of those importations will be from twenty-five to thirty-three per cent. I think the Secretary has overestimated the receipts for the last three quarters of this fiscal year by from eight to ten millions of dollars, and that we shall find this to be the case when Congress assembles in December next.

The President and the Secretary of the Treasury both commit themselves against any revision of the revenue laws of the country at the present session. They propose no mode to increase the revenues of the Government. They come here and say that the expenditures of the Government must be nearly seventy-five million dollars. They show us, on their own estimates, which I believe to be overdrawn by ten or twelve million dollars, that the Treasury will fall short by eighteen million dollars. I believe, therefore, that their own estimated expenditures will exceed the receipts of the Government by from twenty-five to thirty million dollars. They do not propose to reduce the expenditures of the Government, but they recommend an increase of expenditures. They estimate that, according to the standing laws, according to the requirements of the Departments, an expenditure of $75,000,000 will be required for the next fiscal year. The Secretary of the Treasury recommends the repeal of the law of 1849, limiting the expenditures for the collection of the revenue to $2,500,000 on the Atlantic coast. He tells us that the expenses of collection, instead of being limited as they now are to $2,500,000 on the Atlantic coast, and $500,000 on the Pacific coast, will be $4,000,000. No proposition is made to reduce the expenditures in the collection of the revenue. The Secretary tells us that the revenue has been largely diminished, while the expenses of collection have increased. The labor necessary in the collection of the revenue ought to be diminished; yet the Secretary asks us to repeal a law which restricts those expenditures; tells us that those expenditures will go up to $4,000,000 to collect $50,000,000 of revenue. We all know that there has been a pressure in all the offices for the collection of the revenues of the country to provide places for men who are warm and earnest supporters of the past and present Administrations. I believe that the force employed in the collection of the revenue of the country is larger than is necessary, and that that force ought to be reduced, and that the proposed increase of the expenditures ought not to receive the sanction of Congress.

Well, then, sir, we have the Secretary of War, backed by the President of the United States, proposing to raise four or five additional regiments, at an expense of four or five million dollars annually, so long as that force shall exist, for every regiment will cost $1,000,000 annually. Then the Secretary of the Navy, although we last year ordered five vessels to be built, asks us to build ten steam vessels this year, at an expense of $2,500,000; probably, if they are ordered to be built, they will cost from three to four millions. We are told that this additional naval force is wanted to go up the rivers of China; but I believe that instead of going up the rivers of China, it is intended to operate in the Gulf of Mexico, on the coast of the coveted Island of Cuba. Here is a proposed additional expenditure of $1,000,000 for the collection of the revenue; of from four to five millions for the Army; of from three to four millions for the Navy; being a recommendation to add a permanent expense of the Government of nearly ten million dollars annually. These propositions to increase the expenses of the country are recommended by the President, and by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy. They come here and ask for a loan of $20,000,000 in this shape. They overestimated, I believe—and I think I shall be borne out in this by the facts to be developed in future—their receipts for the next year eight or ten million dollars. By their own showing, their ordinary necessary expenses, without the additional ones recommended, will exceed their receipts eighteen or twenty million dollars; then we have a recommendation to increase the amount of expenditures some ten millions more annually. The expenditures of the last Administration exceeded, by about eighteen millions annually, the expenditures of the preceding Administration, and we seem now to be entering on another Administration with an increase of expenditures of the Government, over the last Administration, of from ten to twenty millions more.

Sir, I think that the President should have recommended—I think that Congress at any rate should enter upon—a revision of the tariff. In my opinion, the duties on iron, on cotton, on woolen goods, should be restored to what they were in the tariff of 1846. This will increase the revenues of the Government some few million dollars. I agree with the Senator from Rhode Island, and with the Senator from Kentucky who has just introduced a resolution bearing on this subject, that we should have a home valuation. That frauds exist in the collection of the revenues of the country has been proved, and is admitted by all who have any knowledge of the manner in which the revenue laws are executed. If we are to make a temporary loan to fill the exhausted Treasury, I prefer this issue of Treasury notes. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. SIMMONS] objected to this mode of replenishing the Treasury yesterday.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator will allow me to correct him. That objection of mine to this form of raising money was made when the bill permitted the notes to be reissued without limit; but when it was limited to a year, I had no such objection to it, but preferred it to the other mode.

Mr. WILSON. I now understand the position of the Senator. These Treasury notes will, if the interest is not too high, be used as specie funds by the banks and merchants. I shall vote, however, for the amendment suggested by the Senator from New York, to reduce the amount to $10,000,000. We shall be called upon, I doubt not, for $10,000,000 more within the course of sixty days; but by that time we can have an opportunity to reflect, to see if something cannot be done to increase the necessary revenue; for I believe that on the 1st of January, 1859, we shall find ourselves from twenty to twenty-five million dollars short of funds to pay the current expenses of the Government.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, it seems to me that the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts would go to show the necessity of voting the $20,000,000, instead of diminishing the sum, because he is of opinion that the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury as to the revenue likely to accrue during this year, are extravagant. I will not enter into that question now. All estimates are conjectural, and in times like these they must be exceedingly so; they can only be based on probabilities. I will merely say, however, as I said yesterday, that so far as we can form some approximate estimate from the receipts at the port of New York, the accounts would seem to show that the amount of dutiable imports received during the year will be reduced about one fourth, as the Secretary has estimated in his annual report. What is a little more remarkable, and what would seem to show that his estimate possibly may be correct, is that the whole amount of imports, if we add those that go into warehouse to those that enter into consumption through the custom-house, is not very much below the imports for the corresponding two months of last year at that port alone.

However, I do not propose to go into this matter. I confine myself simply to this issue of Treasury notes; to this money, which, as I said before, we must have; for I believe the Senator from Massachusetts is right in saying that if we confine the present issue to $10,000,000 we shall have to come forward, in January, with another demand for perhaps $10,000,000 more. If we are to issue $20,000,000 we had better provide for it all in one bill, for the reason that, by so doing, we can issue most of the Treasury notes, after advertisement, to the bidder who will agree to take them at par for specie at the lowest rate of interest. I believe that mode of issuing the Treasury notes is a great improvement on the past practice. I think we should lose the advantage of that mode of issue if we passed the bills authorizing the emission of Treasury notes at separate times, and in more limited amounts. If we wait till January we shall probably be then in the condition we are now in relation to the $6,000,000 proposed to be issued immediately; the wants of the Treasury may be so pressing that we may not be able to wait long enough to advertise for thirty days, in order to enable the lowest bidder to take them, and I see no other way to make the Treasury note precisely and exactly equal to specie, which is the great desideratum in regard to that form of credit.

The Senator from Massachusetts expresses his surprise and regret that we should be asking for Treasury notes, and that this demand should be accompanied with such extravagant estimates as are made by the Administration. I would call his attention to the fact that the Treasury notes are asked for to meet the demand created by the appropriations of the last session of Congress, not of this. In regard to the estimates, I will say to him that when the proper time comes, when the bills which relate to them are presented, if he will show me any one item wherein they can be lessened or diminished, I will not only go heart and hand with him, but I will thank him for doing so. "Sufficient," however, "unto the day is the evil thereof." I confine myself now to the demand for means to meet the existing appropriations, and I believe that demand is fully equal to the $20,000,000 which we propose to issue.

I will advert but for a moment to his criticism on the demand for $4,000,000 in order to pay the expenses for collecting the revenue. I say "but for a moment," because I do not wish, as I am anxious to get the bill through to-day, to enter into a debate on any subject not immediately connected with this issue of Treasury notes. As the law formerly stood, (and it was passed, I believe, during the administration of Mr. Polk, some ten years ago,) there was a permanent and indefinite appropriation for defraying the expenses of the collection of the revenue on the Atlantic coast, which were regulated by law, but the expenses of collecting the revenue on the Pacific coast were entirely undefined, and left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. He now asks that both services may be brought under one law, that his discretion may be taken away in regard to the collection of the revenue on the California coast, and that a fixed and limited amount may be appropriated for the purpose of paying those expenses. The amount which he has asked is based on past practice. It seems that when this appropriation was first made, it was rather more than enough, and balances accrued; but as we have gone on, the demand for money to defray the expenses of the collection of revenue has increased, and we have been paying that increased expenditure out of balances that accrued seven or eight years ago; so that the estimate which the Secretary has made for that object is not founded on any desire to increase the annual expenditures for the last two or three years, but is made with reference to those expenditures as they actually occurred. It is to be remembered, too, that he proposes to include within this expenditure of $4,000,000 the expenses of collection on the Pacific coast, which have heretofore been indefinite and left to his discretion merely.

But, sir, I pass away from that subject, and come to the point in regard to the $20,000,000 proposed to be issued. If the Senator from Massachusetts be right (and most of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber seem to agree with him) in supposing that the estimate of receipts made by the Secretary of the Treasury is excessive, then so much the more reason for agreeing to this application for the issue of $20,000,000 of Treasury notes. By passing a bill for the whole amount at this time, we shall be able to issue these notes on the best terms for the Government and the country. I believe I stated yesterday, that probably $6,000,000 would be required by the 1st of January. In addition to that, we have to provide a surplus, as we all know, to administer the affairs of the Treasury; and besides that, a Mint fund has been considered necessary heretofore.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I shall be obliged to the Senator if he will allow me to ask him a question for information, in reference to the point he is now discussing.

Mr. HUNTER. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have had no time to make any particular examination of the subject; but on looking to the law, I find that there is a provision that $1,000,000 shall be kept in the Mint for the purpose of making advances to depositors. I am not able to discover that there is any provision of law requiring any larger amount to be kept there at any time. If there is any such provision, the Senator from Virginia is undoubtedly familiar with it, and can inform the Senate how the facts. The Mints, both at Philadelphia and New Orleans, are made sub-Treasuries, and as sub-Treasuries they receive a certain amount of the public money. Now, I desire to know the idea on which the Senator predicates his statement that it is necessary to keep $6,000,000 in the Mint. Is any amount necessary to be kept there for the purposes of the Mint; and, if so, what amount? If it is not required for the Mint purposes, the amount kept there is a part of the general balance in the Treasury. I understand that $6,000,000 has been considered the surplus necessary to be kept in the Treasury. Is not the excess of coin at the Mint over and above the $1,000,000 required by law to be kept on hand there; in fact, an increase of the surplus deemed necessary for Treasury purposes? Is not that surplus thereby increased from $6,000,000 to $10,000,000 or $11,000,000? I should like, as one of the members of this body, an explanation on this point; because the two subjects were presented by the chairman of the Committee on Finance in different aspects—one as peculiarly relating to the balance proper to be kept in the Treasury, and the other as relating to the amount necessary to be held in the Mint, as I suppose, for the purposes of the Mint from year to year. I should like to know whether that is so or not?

Mr. HUNTER. In reply to the Senator from Maine, I will state that they are separate funds. I am not able to say whether it is by law or by Treasury regulation that $6,000,000 are kept in the Mint. I rather incline to think it is by law, and I think it was a measure introduced by a distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Webster.] I remember his moving in this subject. However, whether it be by statute or departmental regulation, that amount has usually been kept there.

Mr. BENJAMIN. There is a statute. I mean to say a few words in relation to the Mint fund in a few moments. I can inform the Senator that there is a statute on the subject.

Mr. HUNTER. This fund is kept for the purpose of exchanging coin with those who have bullion, in order to save the interest on it which would be lost by the delay in coining, for it frequently happens that the Mint cannot coin bullion as fast as it is presented. This was found to occasion inconvenience, not only to dealers in bullion, but to the merchants in the large cities—so much so that Mr. Webster's attention was called to it; and I recollect the time the provision was made: but whether that precise amount was provided for by law, I did not remember until the Senator from Louisiana reminded me of it. In practice, however, it is considered necessary to keep that amount in the Mint, besides the $6,000,000 surplus required to work the Treasury. It is doubtful whether $6,000,000 surplus are enough to work the Treasury, because, in a country so extensive as this, we cannot always know when drafts will be drawn on the Treasury. As I stated yesterday, we have already been obliged, where those who held these drafts were within reach, to have them held up, where it could be conveniently done, until means were provided for filling the Treasury. I hope, therefore, it will not be the pleasure of the Senator to reduce the amount which is proposed in this bill.

I do not propose to say anything more on this subject. I have stated what are said to be the necessities of the Government by the Secretary of the Treasury. They seem to be admitted by gentlemen on the other side. Indeed, they seem to think they will be even greater than the Secretary of the Treasury has supposed. If so, I hope they will join with me in keeping in this provision, and passing the bill to-day.

Mr. WILSON. A single word in reply to the Senator from Virginia. I have no doubt that we shall be called upon for these $20,000,000 during the session. I should not be surprised if, before the session closed, we should even have a call for more. By the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, our receipts will fall short nearly twenty million dollars beyond the expenditures of the current year; and I believed these were overestimates, and we shall fall short eight or ten million dollars more. The executive department of the Government recommend increased expenditures to the amount of eight or ten million dollars. All this is proposed without any proposition to increase the sources of revenue; but, on the contrary, a recommendation of the President and Secretary of the Treasury that the revenue laws shall not be revised by this Congress. When we meet in December next, I think we shall find the Treasury empty, and more than empty, by the amount of these $20,000,000 of Treasury notes.

I understand the feeling of Senators on this side of the Chamber to be this: that we shall supply the wants of the Government now; that we shall do nothing to embarrass the Government, but give them what they desire now, but that we shall limit this sum to $10,000,000, and then take a little time, and see if something cannot be done to furnish the means to meet and redeem these Treasury notes on the 1st of January, 1859. The business interests of the country require this. This is the part of wisdom, and I think the suggestions made on this side of the Chamber are reasonable and fair.

The Senator says that the receipts in New York for the months of October and November were nearly equal in amount to the receipts of the corresponding months last year.

Mr. HUNTER. Not the receipts at the custom-house. I said the receipts of goods were about twenty-five per cent. less.

Mr. WILSON. So I understood the Senator. There is no doubt of the truth of that statement; but the most of those goods were ordered before the revulsion, and at the high prices which existed before this commercial revulsion. I think he will find that, for the months of December, January, February, March, and April, the receipts will be greatly reduced in quantity from the receipts of last year, and that in value they will be reduced from twenty-five to thirty-three per cent., and that there will be an immense reduction for the next four or five months in the importations of the country.

I think we ought to take some means to provide for these expenditures which are recommended by the Government; for I tell the Senator from Virginia that I am opposed to the increase of a national debt, to a loan, or any permanent issue of Treasury notes, and I believe the people of the country are opposed to both. I readily consent to either as a temporary measure for the relief of the Government.

But, sir, in addition to the expenditures recommended by the different Secretaries of eight or ten million dollars, we have a claim coming in from Oregon and Washington Territories of nearly six million dollars, for the butchery of the Indians on the Pacific coast. We have removed two regiments from Florida to Kansas or Utah; but volunteers are hunting Billy Bowlegs, one or two squaws, and three or four papooses, through the everglades, and we shall have a large bill coming in from that quarter. We have, it is said, nearly half a million dollars of a claim on the Government for the property destroyed by the invasions of the Territory of Kansas. Then, sir, a portion of the army, with immense supplies, have been sent to Utah. These are now in the snows of the mountains. Their freight trains have been captured, many of them have been burned, and great losses of property have taken place. We may be involved in a war that may cost us during the coming year several million dollars. The army, instead of being sent last May or June to Utah, as it ought to have been, was kept in the Territory of Kansas, when no military force whatever was needed; and now the army on its way to the Great Salt Lake, is involved in the storms and snows of winter. This course of the Administration in regard to the Army may involve us in an expensive war. Therefore, sir, while we are willing to supply the immediate wants of the Government, I think we, on this side of the Chamber, have a right to ask that we shall not adopt a policy increasing the public debt; that we shall provide means by the revision of the laws, by an increase of duties that will be favorable to the laboring interest of this country now depressed—that great interest to which the Senator from Rhode Island so forcibly referred yesterday. We have a right to ask that Congress shall not regard the recommendation of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, but that we shall meet the demands of the country and the exigencies of the Treasury, and so legislate as to provide ample means to meet these $20,000,000 of Treasury notes, or any additional expenditures which we are called upon to incur.

I know, sir, that the expenditures of the past six months have been in accordance with the laws of the last session. I know that the Senator from Virginia stands almost alone on his side of the Chamber in his efforts to keep down the expenditures of the Government. I will bear that testimony to him here or elsewhere. But we have been increasing the expenditures of the Government. We increased them nearly eighteen million dollars annually during the last Administration over the preceding one. Now, I think, we are in a fair way of having the expenditures of this Administration exceed those of the last by fifteen or twenty millions annually. We shall, if we adopt the recommendations of the executive department, and pay the claims pressed on us. With these recommendations, with the necessities of the Treasury for immediate relief, with the claims that will be pressed upon us, I think we have a right to ask, I think the country has a right to ask, that, before we give all that is demanded, we shall take some measures to provide the money for the support of the Government, to pay its current expenses, and to meet all the legitimate demands on it. In making these suggestions, I do not think the Senator from Virginia, or any other Senator on that side of the Chamber, can complain of us, or say that we are disposed to be either captious or factious on the measure now pending.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. President, I do not wish to enter into any debate upon the general financial condition of the country. I suppose that this is not the time for so doing. The exigencies of the Treasury are represented to us as being so imperative, that the executive officers of the Government require immediate relief in order to enable them to sustain the credit of the Government by the payment of its debts incurred under appropriations made by us, not by them. The proposition now is to sustain the credit of the Government.

Upon some other occasion I think we may more appropriately enter into the cause of the financial distress, and into the question of the proper mode of providing a regular and established revenue for the Government. I propose to say a few words upon a single point. It has been suggested here by several Senators that the Mint fund, which has already been encroached upon for the daily needs of the Government, may continue to be so appropriated, and that it is not required for the business of the country. That impression I wish to dissipate, so far as it may be in my power to do so; and first, in relation to the law. I will satisfy the Senator from Maine, who made an inquiry on that subject, what the present exact state of the law is. He is right in stating that, upon one occasion, there was an express appropriation made for a bullion fund of $1,000,000. That, however, was found to be entirely inadequate, and, in the year 1850, a law was passed with a single section, which I will now read to him:

"That for the purpose of enabling the Mint and branch mints of the United States to make returns to depositors with as little delay as possible, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, when the State of the Treasury shall admit thereof, to direct transfers to be made from time to time, to the Mint and branch mints, of such sums of public money as he shall judge convenient and necessary, out of which those who bring bullion to the mints may be paid the value thereof as soon as practicable after this value ascertained."

Under this authority vested in the President in the year 1850, soon after heavy imports of gold began to come into the Atlantic States from California, sums of money have been from time to time transferred to the different mints, branch mints, and assay offices of the country, and the practical operation of the Treasury has demonstrated the necessity of a fund of about six million dollars for that purpose. Anything short of that creates distress and confusion. I desire to refer a little to the experience of the last six months on this subject of a bullion fund for branch mints. I will refer to the experience which we have had in my own State, and will relate to gentlemen what occurred there during the recent panic, on this subject of a bullion fund.

In the spring of last year, for the first time in the history of our Government, we deviated from a principle established at the very first Congress that ever assembled. We repealed all laws authorizing foreign gold and silver to be received at their values as a legal tender. Up to that period, foreign coin of gold and of silver was received at the different custom-houses of the United States at fixed rates, and was also received as a legal tender between man and man, under the acts of Congress, in payment of debts. Our Treasury was so full last spring, the bullion fund was so ample, that it was deemed by the Committee on Finance that they might, without imprudence, report a bill repealing all former laws on that subject, and making foreign coin in this country mere bullion—bullion which it was requisite to carry to the Mint, and have recoined into our currency in order to render it useful or serviceable in the business of the country.

I believe, sir, all writers on finance agree in relation to the exceeding importance of silver as a basis of national currency; and, indeed, up to a very recent period, several of the most important nations of the world had silver as the only legal tender, convinced as their Governments were of the absolute necessity of that metal as a basis of the currency. Its qualities are obvious. Its value is always about the same. Its bulk, somewhat larger than that of gold, enables that subdivision to be carried out which brings this silver coin into the pockets of the lower classes, spreads this currency throughout the entire country, and creates and sustains a metallic basis which is of itself a considerable check on the over inflation and over circulation of paper money by the banks. In the year 1853, our silver coin was depreciated—deliberately depreciated, and, in my judgment, wisely depreciated—just to a sufficient extent to make it more for the interest of those who held our silver coin to retain it in the country than to export it. It became a losing operation to export it. It remained in the country, and it has gradually increased, and now forms an important element in the metallic basis upon which our banks operate. It would be the part of wise legislation to encourage the increase of that metallic basis in the country.

Now, whence do we derive our supplies of bullion? The gold bullion from California, almost exclusively, and the silver bullion from Mexico. When in October and November last this financial crisis occurred, efforts were made in all parts of the country, by those who had control of our monetary institutions, to introduce into the country a sufficient quantity of metal to form a basis for the bank circulation, and to put our monetary institutions beyond the reach of a panic. The managers of the banks in New Orleans, in pursuance of this wise and judicious system, endeavored to provide and fortify themselves by the importation of heavy sums of money from Mexico and from Cuba, these being the nearest points from which we could receive any metal. We received millions of dollars in silver from Mexico; we received millions of dollars in doubloons from Cuba; and we received them in the best possible manner for the public interests—we received them in exchange for produce. The Mexicans sent their silver dollars, and the Spaniards sent their gold doubloons to New Orleans for the purchase of cotton and flour at the specie rates then prevalent. We had plenty of bullion therefore in the city; but what was the condition of the banks? In a moment of panic, exposed at every instant to a run on them for the redemption of their deposits and circulation, with millions of dollars of bullion in the city, it was impossible for the banks to afford the slightest relief to the commercial community, because that bullion was not a legal tender and there was no bullion fund in the Mint.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why could not the State pass a law making it a legal tender?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Pass a law of our State (and at a time when the Legislature was not in session) in contravention of the act of Congress of the last session! The gentleman's suggestion takes me by surprise. I have not examined into the power of the States to make foreign coin a legal tender. It may be that the States have that right; but at all events, no State, I think, has yet exercised it. That matter has been left to the exclusive legislation of Congress.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The suggestion I meant to make was this: The Constitution of the United States provides that "no State shall make anything but gold and silver a legal tender in payment of debts;" but it does not specify what kind of gold and silver.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I have not examined that question, and it does not now come into the line of argument. I do not know that there was a Legislature of a solitary State in session in October. It was not supposed, at the time, that it was possible to obviate this state of things at the moment. But I was going on to explain the necessity of a bullion fund in the Mint, under the legislation of Congress.

At that time, with this large quantity of bullion in our city, our banks were compelled to distress the commercial community by constant contraction. They were compelled to refuse the deposits of all Mexican dollars, worth $1 04 or $1 05, because they were not a legal tender. They knew that people would be willing to take them at a dollar, but they could not get them unless they bought them at $1 04 or $1 05. The Mint was paying $1 06 for them whenever there was a fund with which to do so; but there was then no fund in the Mint to buy them. The Mint was being repaired; we could not get this foreign bullion coined; and there, with millions of dollars in the hands of our people, and deposited in the vaults of the banks in special deposits, in boxes, the banks were compelled to press on the commercial community by a merciless contraction of their facilities, in order to save themselves from the penalties of the law, the Treasury of the United States being unable to give us any assistance by furnishing us the coin of the Federal Government in exchange for foreign coin, which had been converted, by your law of the last session, into bullion, and was no longer serviceable in the affairs of commerce. We applied again and again; I myself sent repeated telegraphic dispatches to the Secretary of the Treasury. He was very anxious to assist us. It was his duty to do so; it was his interest, and the interest of the Government to do so; but the Treasury had no means. The bullion fund had been appropriated to the general service of the Government. The President of the United States had been authorized to appropriate so much of it as the other necessities of the Treasury would admit, and only so much, to the service of the Mint. The result was that, for want of a proper Mint fund, all this bullion was there unserviceable for the demands of commerce at the moment when the greatest necessity existed for its application to these purposes.

Now, gentlemen say they are willing to allow an issue of Treasury notes at this time, when we are informed by the Department that they will be immediately absorbed by the necessities of the Treasury, and that it will have to come back next month for $10,000,000 more. The result will be that we shall be just where we are now; that the assay office in New York, the Mint in Philadelphia, the branch mint in New Orleans, will be unable to supply to the merchants of the country on the deposit of bullion, that current coin which is required to relieve them from their necessities. Under these circumstances, I can see no warrant for our declining to make an issue which we know will be wanted in a few days further. I see no propriety in refusing to the Government this aid, so as to allow it to furnish to the mints of the country the sum necessary for the redemption of bullion as it is deposited. The other day we had $2,500,000 of gold dust from San Francisco, sent to the assay office in New York. They have no means to buy it. Men send remittances of what we most desire for the relief of commercial distress—gold and silver; but by reason of the needs of the Treasury, they are kept out of public circulation, and the merchants of the country are to suffer for the want of it.

Sir, if we know that this money will be wanted; if, according to every argument that we have heard on this side of the Chamber, it is satisfactorily established that the Secretary of the Treasury, so far from having overestimated the wants of the Treasury, has underrated them, what motive can we have for going through this legislation and this discussion twice? If $20,000,000 must be wanted within the next thirty or forty days, why not vote them now? Why keep the commercial community in distress, by withholding that Mint fund which is essential for their convenience, and to relieve the pressure of the necessities which are now weighing them down? I do hope, as it is admitted on all sides that the entire sum will be wanted, that it will be voted now, and that the bullion fund will be kept separate for the service to which it was intended to be appropriated. I know that, at my own home, that fund is wanted; we have never had enough there. We have never been able to buy the Mexican dollars as fast as they came in; we have never been able to buy the Spanish doubloons as fast as they came in; but our merchants have been compelled to wait weeks, and sometimes months; for the return of their coin from deposits of bullion in the public mints. The money is required there; I am satisfied it is required in New York; and I trust the Senate will agree to provide the means which the public interests demonstrate are so urgently necessary to be now provided.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have but a single suggestion to make. I made an inquiry of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance in order to get the facts before the Senate, that it might be distinctly understood whether this Mint fund was required at the present time, and to what extent it was required. The honorable Senator from Louisiana has given us a statement, from which it is very easy to see that it may be convenient for the several communities where the Mint and branch mints are established that there should be a sum of money on hand, not for the purposes of the Government, but for the purpose of aiding the commercial community in obtaining specie. That may be a very good consideration to address to gentlemen who hold certain notions in regard to the powers and duties of the Government in relation to the currency; but it is hardly one that can be consistently urged by those who call for this bill.

I do not understand that it is urged by the chairman of the Committee on Finance that there must be a certain amount of money—$6,000,000—kept on hand for the purposes of the Mint, to accomplish the object which has been dwelt upon by my honorable friend from Louisiana. If the Government is now applying to us to authorize it to issue a certain amount of Treasury notes for the purpose of aiding and relieving the different commercial centers, the large commercial places, that is one thing, and we shall understand the argument. It does not meet the objection which has been suggested on this side of the Chamber at all, and it does not show that, for the purpose of the operations of the Mint, it is absolutely necessary that this Government should become a borrower of money, or put out its notes to such an amount as this.

I do not say that under no circumstances would I consent that the Government should aid, so far as it consistently could, the distresses which exist in the general commercial community of the country; but that is not the ground on which this proposition is brought before the Senate. The honorable Senator from Louisiana explains to us that when the Government withdraws its surplus, or a large portion of its surplus, from the several branch mints of the United States, it by that means takes away from itself the power of relieving the community by purchasing bullion under certain circumstances. If the object be to provide for that, the question arises whether the Senate is prepared to adopt that as a principle; whether it will permit the Government to issue a large amount of Treasury notes for the purpose of getting coin to aid the operations of the Mint—not the operations proper of the Mint—but the operations of the Mint in purchasing bullion to relieve the commercial community of distress brought on it under a certain state of things. That is presenting the question in altogether a new aspect; and I should like to know of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance if that be the aspect in which he presents this measure to the Senate?

Mr. HUNTER. The aspect in which that question presents itself to me, I think, is a very simple one. It is the exclusive business of this Government to coin money; and, in order that it may carry on that business to the greatest advantage to the public, it ought to be enabled to coin it rapidly. If it has not the necessary machinery to coin money as rapidly as the wants of the community require, the next best thing it can do is to keep on hand an amount of coin to exchange with the depositor, so as to save him from the loss of interest which would accrue if he had to await the tedious operation of coining the money. It is well known that since the discovery of California gold, our mints have not been adequate to the coinage of the money that has been demanded of them, with sufficient rapidity for the wants of the community. It is the business of this Government to furnish coin to the community as rapidly as its wants demand, if it can do so. The object of the Mint fund, as I understand it, is not for the relief of this or that class; but it is for the purpose of discharging a duty which the Constitution has devolved on this Government, and which no one but this Government can discharge—and that is to coin money with sufficient rapidity to meet the demands of the country for it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is the idea which I had, when the proposition was presented to have on hand a certain amount of money—$6,000,000—in the Mint; but the honorable Senator from Louisiana puts it on entirely different ground. Now, I revert to my original proposition when I put the question this morning to the chairman of the Committee on Finance, that there is no law which requires more than a single million dollars to be kept in the Mint. Under the powers conferred on the President in 1850, as read to us this morning, he may keep a certain other amount at the Mint for that purpose; but I do not know of any law requiring it to be done.

What I desired to have explained was simply this: how does it become necessary that at all times, under all circumstances, the large amount of $6,000,000 should be kept at the Mint? In times of distress, and great scarcity of money, especially when the Government is hard pushed, is it compelled, in order to meet the demands of the country for a circulating medium, to keep the whole $6,000,000 there? Is it not rather the design of this bill, that instead of $6,000,000 surplus, there shall be ten or eleven million dollars surplus for the purposes of the Treasury itself? If that amount is necessary, if a surplus of $6,000,000 is not large enough for the operations of the Government, and if the honorable chairman will make that evident to my mind, I shall withdraw my objection; because I am free to say that, in the exigency presented, I am for giving the Government power to move, to pay the requisitions on it. If $6,000,000 surplus is not large enough, I am willing to grant power to raise a surplus that is large enough to meet the necessary expenditures at the present time, in advance of any arrangements which may be made by law to raise revenue enough to meet the ordinary demands of the Government with relation to its expenditures. But I wish it to be put on a proper basis in order that Senators may understand that this really provides a larger surplus than is required. Instead of so large an amount being necessary for mint purposes, I believe that surplus can be dispensed with without any great injury to the public service, for a short period of time.

Mr. SEWARD. I should not think it necessary to say a word more in this debate if it were not to correct an impression which may be made by some of the remarks made yesterday by the honorable and venerable Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. SIMMONS.] He seemed to labor under the idea that I had advanced the proposition that the commercial revulsion through which we are passing is causeless. The honorable Senator quite misunderstood me. What I said, or what I intended to say, was that the suspension of specie payments was, in my belief and according to the general conviction of this country and of Europe, not necessary, and might have been avoided. The honorable Senator, in the course of his very able and interesting speech, finally arrived at the same conclusion with myself in this respect, because he maintained that the suspension of specie payments resulted from a rivalry between the banks of the city of New York and banks of the city of Boston to see which could hold out the longest. I think this is true. In that rivalry they attempted to press the depositors, who were the owners of their capital, and the depositors in retaliation drew out their deposits, and that broke the banks.

Now, that there was a cause, and a sufficient cause, for a commercial revulsion, I have always known, and always said. I do not consider the causes for it altogether the same with those to which the honorable Senator alluded, though I agree with him in part, and indeed to a very considerable extent. I think that the opening of California and the Pacific coast to cultivation so rapidly, the establishing of mining operations, commercial operations, and agricultural operations there, together with the opening of the great mediterranean country lying between us and the Rocky Mountains, tended to cause a rapid and sudden diversion of capital from the eastern to the western portions of the continent; and that the policy of constructing railroads, fostered and stimulated by the laws of the States, which relieved them from the penalties of usury, caused a diversion of capital from the centers of manufactures and commerce to the great western regions, where those roads were being constructed; and that all this was accompanied by an existing unreasonable preference for the manufactures of other countries to the manufactures of our own, producing excessive importations; and that the excessive importations thus incurred here, were causes enough to produce a commercial revulsion, which I am sure did not take me by surprise. My only wonder was that it took anybody by surprise. That it came, was only what ought to have been anticipated. When it should come, it was also foreseen that it would be modified by the very extraordinary circumstances of the development of the mineral wealth of California and the mineral wealth of Australia, just at the proper moment to supply such an excessive mass of bullion as the world had never before seen, contributed to sustain the commercial currency of the world. It came, and it was modified by these causes. This is my explanation, in reply to the honorable Senator, on that point.

I wish now barely to state the position I take in regard to this bill. I see nothing extraordinary, I see nothing peculiar, I see nothing singular in the condition to which the Government is brought to need this measure of relief—the issuing of some amount of Treasury notes. There is no secrecy in it, there is no mystery about it. What is it? The farmer produced last year more than he has produced in a great many years before. The agriculture of the country has contributed more to its wealth than in any previous year; but the products of the farmer, although thus increased and accumulated, remain in his barn, in his granaries, for the want of purchasers; so that the agriculturist is unable to pay his debts, and he gives a note where he was to pay the cash, and if you consider him to have a treasury he begins with giving a treasury note as a matter of temporary relief. The farmer failing to bring his produce to the merchant, the merchant is unable to pay the bank the discounts he has heretofore obtained; and to obtain new discounts in order to carry on exchanges, the merchant gives the bank his note out of his treasury. He gives a treasury note. Finding that the merchants fail to pay their debts in cash, but pay them in treasury notes, the banks, instead of being able to pay in cash resort to the same measure temporarily and pay in their treasury notes. The operation went on up to the State governments. The State of New York, which is certainly a very independent and strong and rich one—one of the richest communities in the world, and one of the best administered governments in the world—suspended, but gave its promise to pay in thirty, sixty, or ninety days, until this derangement should cease. We come to Washington, and we find that not only the agriculturist, the manufacturer, the merchant, the banks, and the States have suspended, but the Federal Government, richer than them all, richer than any other Government on earth, scarcely owing a dollar except what is necessary to pay its average daily expenses, is without funds, and it also proposes to pay temporarily in Treasury notes.

That is the long and short of the whole case. This condition of things is inevitable. What struck me with surprise, when I came here, was that the Administration, instead of admitting this to be a mere temporary derangement—a derangement resulting in the way I have described—an accidental one—took occasion to lecture us and the country on the demoralization of the banks; as if the banks were to blame; exclusively or chiefly, for the universal derangement, and threatened to denounce bankrupt laws, for the purpose of winding up banks for issuing treasury notes, at the very same moment that they come to Congress and ask us to enable the Administration to commit the same crime against the commercial morals of the country. Still I did not think this was an occasion on which it was necessary to reply to these suggestions, because I considered this a mere practical question. The Government must pay its debts. If it has not the money to-day, it must borrow money until to-morrow. Then there are two questions, how shall it borrow and how much shall it borrow? We all agree that it is to borrow in that way which will meet the occasion and leave no evil consequences beyond it; that is, to make these Treasury notes for just the amount which is necessary, if we can ascertain it, and payable at the shortest possible day and not again be reissued. The issue of Treasury notes for an unnecessary amount is indefensible, for that would be to constitute the Government of the United States a national bank.

Then the question is, how much shall it borrow? We differ in our estimates about the amount, because we differ about the operation of the revenue laws. My honorable friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] thinks the revenues will be much less than is anticipated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and therefore he thinks and expects that there will be need for a repetition of this loan. His admission that the revenues will thus be deficient is taken on the other side of the Chamber as an admission against those of us here who desire to limit the amount to $10,000,000. In that, it is my misfortune to differ from my honorable friend from Massachusetts, and from those who take his view of the subject. This has been a sudden prostration—a prostration of unexampled suddenness and severity. Forty days—so many days and nights as constitute the season of Lent—constituted the whole period of the pressure in the country, and produced the crisis. There was no panic or pressure before the 1st of September, and the banks had suspended specie payments; and so the country found relief on the 16th or 17th of October, and on the 15th of December the banks were again paying specie.

Now, a large amount (nearly all) of the produce of the country is on its passage to the commercial centers for exchange. A large amount of the fabrics which are to be paid in exchange for them are already in the Government storehouses, and deposited there waiting for the exchange to be made. In my judgment, the acceleration of business is going to be rapid just in proportion to the rapidity with which business has declined; and I expect to see every day, and every hour of every day, marked by a rise in the prosperity of the country, graduated just exactly by the suddenness of the depression. The causes of the disaster are gone. I think there is nothing before us but a great revival of business and plethora of money to revive it in all departments. I may be mistaken in this, but I am willing to stand by it. I do not, therefore, agree with those who think that there is to be, for a long period, a deficiency of the importations, and that the duties must necessarily be revived for this purpose. My objection to the last tariff act which we passed was, that the duties were so low that it would increase importations to such an amount as to produce a needless and injurious surplus of revenue. I expect to see a surplus in the Treasury of the United States within the next two or three years, because I think the tariff is too low instead of too high.

Having these opinions, my simple object is to have this measure made substantially in its forms and in all its features just what the occasion requires—a measure of temporary and exactly adjusted relief. I think that one year is time enough to allow for the issue of these notes. I think that $10,000,000 is large enough an amount for which to issue them. Feeling a strong desire to benefit the commercial interests of the country, in its resuscitation from embarrassment, I feel a very strong desire that the notes which shall be issued by the country shall not take the character and meet the fate of a permanent loan, but that they shall go into the circulation of the country immediately as an equivalent of gold and silver, and for that reason I want as low a rate of interest as possible. These are my views. They were at first submitted with deference, but they remain unchanged.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] seems to think that the commercial revulsion through which we are now passing, was brought upon us by the suspension of specie payments by the banks, and that the revulsion is now over because the banks have resumed specie payments. If this is the idea of the Senator, I must differ from him altogether. The suspension of the banks did not cause the revulsion—the revulsion caused the suspension of the banks. This sudden commercial revulsion which swept over the country with appalling force, carrying down monetary institutions, business corporations, and commercial houses, and turning out of employment tens of thousands of toiling men, was not brought upon the country by the suspension of the banks of New York and Boston, which were the last to bend before the storm, and are now the first to right up when the violence of the storm has somewhat spent its force. The banks of New York were the first to feel the approaching revulsion; they undertook to breast the storm, to save themselves by a sudden and violent contraction of their loans, but after a vain struggle they were compelled to yield—to go down—under the pressure their own short-sighted and selfish policy had increased. The Boston banks, which had adopted a policy far more liberal, followed the New York banks in the suspension as they have now promptly followed them in the resumption of specie payments. This early resumption of specie payments is a gratifying evidence of the resources and strength of the resuming banks, but it is not an evidence that the effects of the revulsion have passed away. Light is dawning. The violence of the pressure has ceased—the panic—which did not, as the Senator from New York suggests, cause the revulsion, although it greatly increased its force—has partially subsided, and the country is slowly recovering from the effects of this sudden and sweeping commercial storm.

But this revulsion was brought upon the country by causes far too great, and its effects have been far too general and destructive, to pass away at once. The country possesses vast resources, and the energies of the people are so great, that we shall recover from the effects of the pressure, and bound forward in the race of prosperity. But weeks and months must pass away before we shall fully recover from the effects of the pressure under which the interests, business, and labor of the nation now suffer. The rates of interest continue to rule high; money, to the masses of business men and the people, continues exceedingly scarce; merchandise of most descriptions has depreciated in value at least thirty per cent., to almost ruinous rates; hundreds of manufacturing and mechanical establishments are closed, or work on short time, and at greatly reduced rates for labor, and tens of thousands of mechanics and laboring men are out of employment, or laboring for wages which will hardly afford to themselves and families even the absolute necessities of life. Sir, I live in a commonwealth largely engaged in commerce, manufactures, and the various mechanic arts, and I know that the business of that State is but slowly recovering; that many manufacturing establishments and mechanic shops are yet closed; that thousands of intelligent, skilled, and industrious men are still seeking of their fellow-men leave to toil.

Sir, this monetary crisis, this wide-spread commercial revulsion, came upon the country at a time of apparent prosperity, at a season when the earth bore upon its bosom the largest harvest the farmers of the country were ever summoned to gather. Years of great prosperity have followed each other in succession. During these years of prosperity, the various causes have sprung up which have this year precipitated upon us a commercial crisis of unexampled severity. Revenue laws which were not wisely adjusted to protect the productive industry and capital of the country; a banking system not wisely guarded by law or prudently directed; a vast expenditure of capital in unproductive railroads; an undue expansion of credits by States, cities, corporations, banks, and business men, resulting in enhanced prices, excessive importations, over-trading, wild speculations in western lands, and public and private extravagance, have precipitated upon the nation this sweeping and far-reaching revulsion, the effects of which are everywhere seen and felt. The wave which has swept over us has reached the Old World, and the monetary institutions, the commercial houses, and all classes of people in England, France, Germany, and, indeed, all western Europe, are shaken by its force. Governments have been compelled to interpose their powers to break the force of this pressure. American stocks, mercantile credits, and staple products have fallen, and all is distrust concerning the future.

Now, sir, if Senators believe that we are at once to recover from the effects of this crisis now upon us, which we see by the news just received from Europe is now producing bankruptcy and distress, they are greatly mistaken. If they believe that the importations during the coming six months, for the remainder of the present fiscal year, are to equal either in quantity or value the importations of the corresponding months for 1856 or 1857, they are, in my judgment, altogether mistaken. While millions of merchandise are held in your warehouses—while millions of merchandise of most kinds remain on hand at depreciated prices which are almost ruinous—while the merchants of the sea-board hold millions of dollars of renewed or protested paper, they will be in no haste to go into foreign markets for goods. European merchants and manufacturers, smarting under losses already incurred, and the ruinous depreciation of stocks and goods, will be in no haste to crowd their goods upon a losing market. The money market will soon become comparatively easy; but the immense sacrifices which the merchants have made to sustain their credit, the losses they will incur on renewed notes which will not be met at maturity, the ruinous depreciation of merchandise now unsold, and the great lesson of economy taught the people by this disastrous revulsion, will tend to check importations during the remainder of the present fiscal year.

The Secretary of the Treasury estimates the balance in the Treasury on the 1st of July, the close of the present fiscal year, at less than half a million of dollars. I believe when that day dawns upon us we shall find no balance at all. We shall commence the next fiscal year with an empty Treasury. The Secretary estimates the expenditures for the year at $75,000,000. The Secretaries of War and the Navy ask for new regiments and new ships, which will call for several millions more; several millions of claims are pressing upon us for payment; and we have a Mormon war impending over us. When the year 1859 opens upon us, these Treasury notes must be paid. On that day I think we shall find no money in the Treasury to meet their payment. We shall find, if I am not mistaken in my estimates of the effects of the present revulsion upon the revenues of the next twelve months, both upon the lands and the customs, that we shall have to borrow millions of money to meet the obligations of the Government.

Now, sir, I am willing to vote for this bill as a temporary expedient. I am not willing to increase the national debt, or to commence a system of expedients to supply the ordinary wants of the Government. While I shall vote to give the Government the means to meet its immediate wants, I demand that Congress shall reduce the expenditures, or so revise the revenue system as to enable the Government to promptly meet its obligations.

Mr. DAVIS. I look on the proposition that is submitted to us as simply a proposition to borrow money for the immediate use of the Government. If the Government is censurable for the fact that the Treasury is empty, or about to become so, then I can perceive the point of the inquiry as to the cause which has produced the financial distress and thus prevented the receipt of revenue into the Treasury. I would say, however, that I have heard not yet assigned what I believe to be the true reason for the diminished revenue of the United States. Among the remarks which have been made, there have been some directed to that interest and to that section of the country which I, in part, represent. The honorable Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. SIMMONS] yesterday gave warning and advice to those who represent the cotton-growing region. To-day, time after time, we have heard one cause and another assigned, and among them, chiefly, the great imports of the country.

Now, sir, that, as the country increases in its wealth and population, imports should increase, should excite the surprise of no man. I am sorry that it should excite the regret of any one. It is a fact that the imports of last year did not exceed those of the preceding year as much as those of the preceding year exceeded those of the one before it. There is a steady progress, owing to the very great prosperity of the country, and something is also due to that excitement which over banking produced.

The sale of cotton is usually transacted by bills of exchange. That is the ordinary commercial course; and the whole embarrassment which fell on the southwest and the lower Mississippi, was due to the fact that the goods were imported into the city of New York which were consumed in that section, and the cotton was bought with bills which were to pay for the goods imported into New York. When New York, by extravagance, by her speculation in railroad stocks and western lands, became bankrupt, and was no longer able to pay for the goods she imported, not because there were not consumers in the country, but because they had proceeded on credit alone in their importations, and could not, therefore, buy the bills of exchange which were to move the cotton—then it was, and for that reason entirely, that commercial distress came upon the southwest.

We are told, also, of the great increasing expenditures of the Government. Sir, I have no respect for that sort of economy which adds up long columns of figures, and announces this to be economical and that extravagant. This year one may spend a large amount and next year a small amount; but, if the fruits of that expenditure of this year remain to posterity, and are worth more than the money disbursed, that is good economy.

Then again, sir, how are administrations, this or the past one, to be held responsible? It comes badly from the other side of the Chamber, where so many criticisms, and even denunciations, were heaped on the last Executive for his vetoes, to now point to the aggregate sum expended, and arraign that as an accusation against him. The estimates of this Administration are sent to Congress in accordance mainly with the acts of Congress. Change the service if you wish to reduce the expenditure. It is idle to call on the public officer to reduce the estimates, and yet require him to perform the particular service. The President and his Secretary recommend measures in advance of legislation, because in their belief they are necessary for the good of the country. It is for the Senate and House of Representatives to decide whether they will adopt the recommendation or not; but if they adopt the recommendation—if they impose the execution of the duty on the Executive, they have no right to turn around then and add up how much has been expended, and charge it to the Executive.

As to the advice which was given to the cotton planters, (which, if I understood it correctly, was that they were to encourage an increased consumption of the raw staple in the United States,) I will merely say that if that encouragement is to be given by paying additional duties on imported goods, that is to say, if we are to get our neighbor to use our corn by sending him a mill to grind it, we have a right to add up the dollars and cents there, also, and ascertain whether it is to our interest or not. My impression is that it is not—that it matters not to us where our customer comes from. We have an article to sell, and it is for sale to him who will give the most for it. New markets are an advantage, but encouragement to a particular buyer is none. We want markets in every quarter of the world, so that the consumption of that staple which we produce may keep pace with its increased production, or, if it exceed it, may enhance the value of it to those who produce it. So far as this is made into the form of an appeal to our support to a protective tariff, I imagine there is not one among us who will ever yield to it.

Looking upon this bill, however, as a mere proposition to borrow money, I will not say it is the form which I would prefer. Fearing the temptation to extravagance, not in the Administration, but in the Congress which directs the objects of its expenditure, I am sorry to see adopted a plan which so easily exceeds the just revenues of the country. If we may run on increasing our debts from year to year, meeting every extravagant scheme by an appropriation which will cover it in this easy manner of furnishing the means, no one feeling the pressure, no representative responsible to his constituency for a tax which is imposed, I fear that abuse may come, and therefore I say this is not with me a favorite method of raising money.

But I am glad to find that instead of these notes being issued, as has been recommended in some of the commercial portions of our country, merely to throw specie into circulation, to become a safe deposit, they are to bear interest. That interest, and the necessity of assignment from hand to hand as each note passes, will perhaps prevent these notes from going into general circulation, and assuming, as has been asserted, the character of bank notes. Then, according to the limitation which I think has been wisely proposed by the Senator from New York, to confine the bill to one year, if our hopes are realized of returning prosperity to the country, and the equalization, by exchange, of that which we have to give for that which we have to buy, thus restoring to us the ordinary revenue of the Government, I trust when these notes are redeemed, the day will be far distant when we shall have to issue another.

I say this especially to those who have arraigned the last and the present Administrations for their extravagant view, because it depends on the Congress and not on the Administration to keep down the expenditures of the Government. The Executive can alone see that the money is honestly disbursed, and properly applied to the objects indicated by Congress, and in such sums as Congress may grant. If we are going to make harbors where nature has made none, to build up cities where commerce has to be drawn, by heavy appropriations from the United States, then we shall want increased means of supplying the Treasury, and probably shall have to extend the credit of the United States also.

Nor am I at all opposed to the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] to connect with every use of the credit of this Government, whether in the form now proposed or in any other, some direct and special mode of supplying the money which is to redeem the debt created. On this occasion I should be glad to see every article now on the free list put on the dutiable list. Those articles of general consumption which, by the popular cry, have been put on the free list, and which are the most fit subjects of taxation, ought to be restored to the dutiable list and thus contribute to fill the Treasury. All that long list of articles which my honorable friend from Virginia added at the last year to the free list, which, however advantageous they may be to the manufacturers of the country, enter into the increased value of their article, are as fit subjects for duty as the article itself. Everything that will bear a duty, according to my ideas of a revenue tariff, should have the duty imposed on it which it can pay, and then we should scale down to the lowest duty that will furnish a sufficient revenue to the Government. That would be my mode of answering the proposition of a just distribution of duty—a distribution which should cover everything which is imported, and which should be the lowest on each thing that the necessary revenue of the country would permit—approximate free trade; I wish it were absolute. I wish that no Secretary of the Treasury ever had again to send in an estimate of the cost of collecting the duties from imports, that the custom-houses were abandoned, and the army of retainers of the Federal Government employed to collect the taxes through impost duties, dispersed among the people. I should like to see free trade existing throughout this Union, with all its fraternizing effect on the nations, with all its beneficial results to the laboring masses, each receiving that which can be made elsewhere cheaper than he could produce it himself, and each exchanging that which nature and the industrial habits of his country enable him to produce more cheaply than others. Then we should at once be rid of all frauds upon the Government.

But as I do not hope to attain that desired object, I will say one word on the oft-repeated charges of fraud upon the Government by false invoices. That invoices may be so skillfully framed as to deceive the best appraiser, I do not doubt; that labels may be put upon things for export to the United States, that will deceive even a practiced eye, whilst there will be that slight difference that will shield the parties and protect them from the charge of forgery, I have had occasion to observe; but I think the fault is not in the law, or if in the law, it is less there than it is in the want of capacity in the appraisers. I think the duty properly discharged by the custom-house officers will leave but little to complain of in the way of fraud, by invoices or otherwise.

It has been with me, from my earliest manhood, a matter of gratification, that my own countrymen, alone of all the world, constituted a race that looked upon smuggling as a crime—who, parts of a Government that belonged to themselves, paid the duties which their laws imposed, and aided the Administration in collecting those duties by voluntary efforts of their own. To what other land shall we go to find a people who would discredit a man because he smuggled in foreign goods? The evil may exist in our country; but if so, I believe it to exist in a very small degree. I believe there is no public tone in the country that would countenance it for a moment, and I am sorry that Senators should dwell upon frauds which are but incident to the imperfection of those who are to execute the laws, and thus send us forth to the world in a character not our own; for I claim for the American people the credit of having such a respect for the laws of their own land that they are willing to maintain the revenue laws, even in those sections where they most oppose them.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not propose to protract this discussion, but I did not exactly comprehend the remarks of the honorable Senator from Mississippi, in regard to what I said yesterday about the great staple of his section of country—cotton. He said that I had proffered some advice or suggestion. I hope he did not understand me as proffering any advice in an offensive manner.

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly not, sir. I would say to the gentleman that I considered him as presenting a set of sentiments that belong to one end of the fiber of cotton, and that I represented the opinions that belonged to the other end of the fiber.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to bring both ends together, if I could, [laughter,] and I believe that was the spirit of my remarks. I said that the nearer the consumer was to the producer the better for them both, and that, when you prevented an increased consumption of cotton in the United States, the South lost the best customer it had for its great staple. I shall not, however, go into that subject now. I mean to confine myself to the provisions of the bill before me.

Yesterday, I examined the President's message in order, if I could, to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the President had mistaken the causes of our distress, on the supposition that if he had understood the causes to be different from those stated by him, he would have proposed a different remedy. I made myself hoarse in doing that, and I shall not advert to it again.

Now, I desire to inquire of the Senator from Virginia whether the Treasury notes to be issued under this bill are to pass from hand to hand by mere delivery, or whether the indorsement of the holder will be required?

Mr. HUNTER. They are to pass by indorsement and delivery.

Mr. SIMMONS. After the first indorsement, are they to pass from hand to hand without reindorsement?

Mr. HUNTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then this measure proposes to make the Treasury a bank of issue. I do not object to furnishing money for the purposes of the Government; and if Treasury notes are to be issued, my desire is that they shall be put in such a shape as to be a medium of exchange between the different parts of the country, and not used as a medium of circulation, passing from hand to hand. If these notes are to be issued, let them be in such a form as to remedy the evil of which my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. CARR-

TENDEN] spoke yesterday. He gave us an instance where a bill of exchange, drawn by a specie-paying bank in Kentucky on a non-specie-paying bank in some other part of the country, cost two per cent. I think that is a dead loss to the men who have occasion for exchange—the producers of the country.

I have no desire to embarrass the operations of the Government, and if the Senate are satisfied that Treasury notes ought to be issued, be it so; but let them be issued in such a form that they may answer the purposes of the Government, facilitate the business of the country, and alleviate the existing distress about the causes of which we shall probably never agree. I think we should allow no Treasury note to be issued for less than $100; and we should require them to pass only with the indorsement of the holder. If this were done, if I desired to remit a Treasury note to Wisconsin, I could indorse it to the order of the man whom I wished to receive it, and then, if the mail were robbed, he would be safe, because the money could not be collected, without his order. If, however, these notes may pass from hand to hand by mere delivery, a man might rob the mail of an envelop containing a thousand dollar note, and get the money for it.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator from Rhode Island allow me to put a question to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand the Senator from Virginia to say, that as the bill now stands, the Treasury note is, in the first instance, to be made payable to the order of the person to whom it is issued, and after that it may pass by delivery without indorsement. If I view the provisions of the bill aright, when a note of this kind is made payable to the order of any person, there is nothing here taking away the right of that person to restrict the payment to the individual to whom he indorses it. In other words, he may make a special indorsement, and then there can be no legal title to the note, unless by the authority of the person to whom it was first issued. Whether that is right or wrong I do not pretend to say. I think these notes ought to pass by delivery alone, in the first instance, because you compel your receiving officers to receive them in payment of customs, and lands, and debts due to the United States, and if a note comes to him with six or eight indorsements on it, in hand-writings of which he can have no knowledge, you subject him to great hazard. Again, when the Government comes to redeem the notes, if any indorsement were not genuine, the payment would not be good against a person who was a special indorsee. If you issue a note payable to order, and the party to whom it was issued chooses to indorse it to a third person, how can you, by paying the note, destroy the title of that third person, unless he himself has indorsed it? If the note were payable to bearer, you would be free from responsibility by payment to any one presenting it, but not so in the case of a special indorsement, unless the special indorsement is broken in upon by an indorsement in blank by the special indorsee. As long, however, as special indorsements may be continued on notes in the form authorized by this bill, the last indorsee may restrict payment of the note to whom he pleases, and the title cannot pass without his indorsement, so that if it were lost or stolen, the Government would pay at its own risk.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am sorry that I asked any question on this point, because it raises a debate about the title to notes after indorsement and before indorsement. I thought that perhaps there was some settled principle about the indorsement of all kinds of notes. I have seen a great many Treasury notes which were issued by the United States, and indorsed by the first holder "to bearer," and I supposed they passed by delivery. If I take a note payable on its face to a particular man, or order, and he, by his indorsement, orders it to be paid "to bearer," I do not see how it can afterwards be restricted; but I am no lawyer. If it is indorsed in blank I suppose the man who holds it can get the money; but I do not understand law, and I do not find anybody here who can tell me what the law is. [Laughter.] I called attention to this point because I did not see any more difficulty in the way of the Treasury issuing these notes so as to answer the purpose of exchange than in drawing from one sub-Treasury on another.

Mr. HUNTER. I will say to the Senator from Rhode Island, as he has asked the question, that I believe the practice has been to indorse Treasury notes in blank, and they have generally passed by delivery; but I suppose there could be a special assignment of them. I see nothing in the law to prevent a special assignment of them.

Mr. SIMMONS. I asked the question not for the purpose of raising discussion, but because I thought the Senator from Virginia had probably examined the matter.

I understood the Senator from Mississippi to advert to the remarks which I made yesterday as if I were a protectionist. What I said was, that if the Senator from Virginia would intelligently prepare a statement of our probable exports and imports for the next five years, and would tell me how much revenue the Government would need, he might lay his duties on that amount of trade, making the articles free that he considered it best to make free, according to the plan of last year, and I would go with him whether his rate of duty was twenty, or twenty-five, or any other rate per cent.; providing only that the revenue should be fairly and fully collected without fraud on the Government. That is all I ask. Fix your rates to suit yourselves, but have a fair and honest home valuation. I would as soon let the foreign producer fix the rate of duty as fix the value on which the duty shall be assessed. It seems to me nonsensical to say that we should fix the rates of duty and the foreign producers fix the value. I want this Government to fix the value and fix the rate of duty. Then you may fix the rate as low as you can get along with, and on that system I will trust the industry of this country in competition with that of foreign nations.

I observe that this bill provides against frauds on the Treasury, which may be attempted in counterfeiting these Treasury notes. Will not the Senator from Virginia agree to insert a provision to prevent the much larger frauds occasioned by fraudulent undervaluations of imported goods? When the bill was introduced I was sorry that it did not come from the House of Representatives, because I thought it would be improper to insert in it such a provision as I propose to incorporate into it; but on consultation with one of the members of the Judiciary Committee, I find that it is competent for us on any bill to introduce provisions for the prevention of fraud; and as the bill already provides against some frauds, it has appeared to me that the provision which I am about to suggest is entirely germane. The imported goods are now valued at the principal market of the country from which they are imported. The proposition which I have drawn up provides that upon the entry of the goods in the United States they shall be valued at the prices prevailing at the principal place of importation in the United States, to wit, the city of New York, and that the duty shall be assessed upon the market value of the goods in New York.

I propose this in order to avoid the complications resulting from the different currencies of the world. Does not the Senator from Virginia know it to be a fact that more labor has been spent in the last three years in finding out what is the relative value of the currency of the United States as compared with the currency of the nations from whom we import, than on any other single branch of the public service in the Treasury Department?

They have not settled it yet, and they will not settle it until this country gets to be as old as any civilized nation that ever existed. It cannot be settled. Does not the Senator from Virginia also know that the Treasury instructions to our officers on this point have embroiled the executive department in vexatious disputes with our foreign ministers and consuls? I know what would be the result of such disputes if I were officiating in any department of this Government. If a man presented to me a claim based on the state of the law twenty years ago, when he was appointed to a mission or a consulate abroad, and said that he sustained a loss on account of the currency in which he was paid, I should not hoggle with him about ten per cent., but I would pay him at once. I noticed on this point a somewhat remarkable statement in a book this morning. I do not send for information because I adopt the maxim of Dr. Franklin—when I want information I go myself; if I send for it I am not very apt to get it in season, especially within the short time we are allowed here for debating such bills as this. I understand that on account of the alterations in our currency since the organization of this Government we are losing from ten to fifteen per cent. as exchange on every payment of salaries we make to our officers abroad. I regret, and I am astonished at the fact, that the intrinsic value of our coin has been diminishing ever since the establishment of the Government. The plentier gold is, the more dross we put into the currency. I do not like that. I want the coin of the United States to be as good as the coin of any other country. I am astonished to see the discrepancy in the relative values of the currency of the different nations of the world. It is a study of itself. A man who undertakes to administer our revenue laws under the present system of foreign valuation ought to have such a mind that he could extract the cube root of any given sum of numbers in his head without going through the figures.

I think there is no difficulty in the way of establishing a system by which you shall value the goods in this country in the currency in which the duties are paid; and for that reason the amendment which I have drawn up, provides for valuing them in the city of New York, our principal port of importation. Of course I anticipate that there will be some objection to this. I read in the debates of last spring, a statement by some Senator that the home valuation had been exploded long ago, on account of its unconstitutionality. Now, sir, I cannot perceive why it is not as constitutional to value the goods imported into this country at the principal market of such importations, as it is to value them at the principal market of the country where they are purchased. I was struck with the statement made yesterday by the honorable Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] that the honest merchants at New Orleans imported their goods through New York in order to get them cheaper. Why should they be compelled to do this? No intelligent merchant in New Orleans orders foreign goods without looking to the principal market of this country to ascertain whether the importation will be profitable or not. With the present opportunities for the transmission of intelligence throughout the country, you can, in the course of an hour or two, ascertain the value of any article in any of our ports. I say, you might as well value the imports at our principal port of importation, and then the valuation will be uniform throughout the United States.

Then there are two provisions in the act of 1842, in reference to the valuation of merchandise, which I should like to see adopted. That act also contains some provisions in regard to specific duties, to which I intend, at the proper time, to call the attention of the Committee on Finance. The law of 1842 provides that, after valuing the goods at the fair market price, and there is any dispute as to it, the collector, if he thinks there is any attempt to defraud the revenue, may take the duties in kind. For example, a man imports five cases of goods into New York, and makes his valuation, under oath, of the fair wholesale market value of those goods, but the collector thinks there is an intention to defraud the Government; then, if the duties are twenty per cent., he takes one case of the goods, sells them within twenty days, and puts the proceeds in the Treasury. Thus the Government gets its twenty per cent., let the rates of exchange or the relative values of different currencies be what they may, and the importer pays no more than twenty per cent. The seventeenth section of the act of 1842, provides a feasible mode of valuation; and then the eighteenth section, which I should like to see inserted here, provides:

"That the several collectors be, and they are hereby, authorized, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, whenever they shall deem it necessary to protect and secure the revenue of the United States against frauds or undervaluation, and the same is practicable, to take the amount of duties chargeable on any article bearing an ad valorem rate of duty in the article itself according to the proportion or rate per centum of the duty on such article, and such goods so taken the collector shall cause to be sold at public auction within twenty days from the time of taking the same in the manner prescribed in this act, and place the proceeds arising from such sale in the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That the collector or appraiser shall not be allowed any fees or commissions for taking and disposing of said goods and paying the proceeds thereof into the Treasury other than are now allowed by law."

The Senator from Virginia will see that this avoids all the old-fashioned discussion about the accumulation of duties on the article itself. Suppose a merchant imports into New York five cases of goods that cost $100 a case in Germany, but which are said to be worth $120 a case in New York; there is a duty of twenty per cent. on them, and the collector takes one case and sells it to pay the duty: although it may bring $120, it costs the importer but $100, so that he does not pay more than his twenty per cent. There is now a percentage for freights and a great many incidental charges. Thus Government has been trying for the last six years to make little contrivances against fraudulent importations, when there were provisions on the statute-book that I think would have prevented the whole difficulty; but whether this be so or not, I think we should avoid the complication resulting from the different values of the various currencies of the nations of the earth. We ought to value the goods in the currency in which we take the duties. I suppose the Senator from Virginia knows the fact that there is a dispute between the Department and one of our ministers abroad as to an item of $500 a year in his salary—not that he is not paid as much as the law allows, but because of our variations of currency. His salary formerly was predicated on the dollar unit of our currency, which was originally a silver coin; but when we made a gold dollar coin, it was insisted that that was the legal standard, and the Treasury paid by that standard, and that is not worth as much as the silver coin by the amount of $500 per annum on the salary of the officer to whom I have alluded. I am told that the Government is put to an annual expense of more than forty thousand dollars a year in the way of exchange on the salaries of our ministers and consuls abroad.

I wish now to say a few words as to the home-valuation system and the old tariff, and to this point I desire to invite the attention of the Senators from Louisiana. I happened to be here as a spectator during a portion of the last session, and I perceived that there was very great solicitude on the part of the Senators from Louisiana about the rates of duty on sugars. In 1842, the Senate appointed a Committee on Manufactures, consisting of myself, Mr. Archer, of Virginia, Mr. Miller, of New Jersey, Mr. Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. Morehead, of Kentucky; and that committee made a unanimous report in favor of the home-valuation system. I hold that report in my hand. Since it was made, the subject has undergone great discussion in the country. This is the point to which I adverted yesterday, and in regard to which I supposed the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] had got somewhat informed. Perhaps I owe him an apology for not alluding to the remarks he made this morning, as to the difference between him and me yesterday. I did not happen to catch all that he said this morning, because I did not know that he was applying his remarks to me; I thought he was addressing himself to what had been said by the Senator from Massachusetts, or I would have tried to reconcile our differences, for I consider it one of the glories of human life that men should always reconcile their differences.

Mr. SEWARD. The honorable Senator will find, when he comes to read my remarks, that I did precisely the thing which he says he would have done, if he heard me—reconcile our differences.

Mr. SIMMONS. If I ever get time to read my own speech I will try to do it, and, after that, endeavor to read the honorable Senator's speech; but I have no idea that I shall be able to do so this session. [Laughter.] I have no notion of reviewing this matter when it is once out of my hands.

I was about to call the attention of the Senators from Louisiana to the report made by the Committee on Manufactures in 1842, with respect to the article in which they feel interested, to show how admirably the home-valuation system embodied in that denounced act of 1833, called the compromise act, would have answered all the practical purposes of this Government. This report proceeded on the idea of having a fixed valuation for every article of importation which entered into competition with the productions of our own labor, requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to report to every new Congress the actual value in the market, so that the legal valuations might be revised, if there was any necessity for it. We fixed the value of molasses at twenty-four cents a gallon, and there was a duty of twenty-five per cent. on it. I ask the Senators from Louisiana whether there has been a time, within the last fifteen years, when the Louisiana planters would not have preferred this to any duty that has been laid? It is not too high to-day. Last year, when molasses was fifty cents a gallon, the Senators from Louisiana would have been perfectly satisfied with a duty of six cents a gallon, because they were well enough off without any duty at all; and if the price should come down to ten cents a gallon, they would want as much as six cents duty to prevent the foreign article driving them out of the market. Such a system would keep the revenue steady; but it did not happen to take with the political notions of the day, and it went by the board.

Then, as to sugar, that report contained this scale of valuation:

"Brown or raw sugar produced at, and imported directly from, places beyond the Cape of Good Hope, at six cents per pound; from all other places, and sirup of sugar-cane, in casks or otherwise, at seven cents per pound; white-clayed sugar, and all sugar in advance of brown or raw sugar, and not refined, in whole or in part, at ten and one half cents per pound."

Now, I wish to invite the attention of Senators from Pennsylvania to the valuations imposed by this report on iron, to see if it would not have furnished, during the last fifteen years, a good rule for estimating the duties on iron:

"Iron, and manufactures of iron, shall be valued as follows—that is to say: iron cast into pigs or kentledge shall be valued at thirty-two dollars per ton; fluens, or run-out iron, being iron in advance of pig iron, at forty dollars per ton; cast into vessels, at five cents per pound; glazed castings, sad irons, hatters' and tailors' irons, and all castings and vessels of cast iron not in the rough, as from the mold, or having any addition of wrought iron attached, at ten cents per pound; statutory castings, at twenty-five cents per pound; castings of all other kinds, at ninety-five dollars per ton; all old and scrap iron, fit only to be remanufactured, at twenty-eight dollars per ton; hammered iron, in bars or bolt, not manufactured in whole or in part by rolling, at eighty dollars per ton; anchors and anvils, and parts thereof, at eight cents per pound; chain cables, or parts thereof, in links or otherwise, manufactured in whole or in part, at one hundred and forty dollars per ton; chains of iron of all other kinds, or parts thereof, at two hundred dollars per ton; cannon, at six cents per pound; screws weighing twenty-five pounds and upward, at ten cents per pound; iron in blooms, loops, slabs, or other forms less finished than iron in bars or bolts, shall be valued the same as iron in bars or bolts.

"Railroad Iron.—Iron prepared to be laid upon railways or inclined planes, without further manufacture, shall be valued at sixty-five dollars per ton, subject to the proviso in the fifth section of the act approved the 11th day of September, 1841, entitled 'An act relating to duties and drawbacks.' Provided, That this act shall not be construed to include chains, pins, or spikes, as railroad iron."

I do not believe there could have been a valuation of iron which would have given more encouragement to the manufacture of iron than this valuation of it, had it stood without alteration for the last fifteen years; and you would have avoided all the quarrels we have had about protection and valuation. The Committee on Manufactures, in 1842, recommended a duty of twenty-five per cent. upon the principal articles of importation. The only exceptions to this rule were sugars and the finer manufactures of iron, which were put at thirty per cent. This was done after consultation with the iron masters of Pennsylvania, who had made heavy outlays for machinery to enable them to make a finer species of iron, and they thought they ought to have an additional duty of five per cent. for a time at least. The sugar planters of Louisiana were also consulted. I was introduced by Mr. Preston, then a Senator from South Carolina, to his brother, who was a large sugar planter in Louisiana. He stated, with frankness, that a duty of twenty-five per cent. would afford ample protection to the large sugar makers, but it was doubtful whether men of limited means, who had to hire the capital necessary to enable them to carry on the business, in a State where the legal rate of interest was ten per cent., could sustain the competition. As this was a new business, and the small planters had to make nearly as expensive an outlay for machinery as those who produced ten times as much, it was feared that the effect of a twenty-five per cent. duty would be to break down the small planters. The committee, therefore, unanimously recommended putting sugar at thirty per cent. duty as an exception.

I make this statement to relieve myself from the charge of ever having undertaken to make a high tariff in this country, which I understood to be the intimation of the Senator from Mississippi. After a few years' discussion in the country, these modern reformers came in and fixed different rates of duty, from five to one hundred per cent. That they called leveling! That is your tariff of 1846.

Now I desire to know whether the Senator from Virginia objects to adding to this bill a provision against frauds on the revenue? I will go with him as far as I can, in supplying the temporary wants of the Government. I only ask him to provide that the Government shall not continue to be the victim of outrageous frauds. I shall take pleasure in voting for the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] because I think the rates of duty were changed last spring without a proper understanding of what was done. It was done in the night, and pretty much in the same hurried manner that we were precipitated into the consideration of this bill a day or two ago. I think, however, that point ought to be considered by itself; but here and now is the proper place and time to provide against those frauds to which I have alluded. If the Senator from Virginia will agree to do it, I shall take it as an earnest, on his part, that he wishes to relieve the distresses of the country—the laboring men of the country.

I stated, yesterday, that there had not been an occupant of the Treasury Department since the framer of the act of 1846 retired from it, who had not recommended to Congress to change the system in some way, so as to prevent frauds; and allusion was made this morning to the views of Mr. Guthrie, the last occupant of the Treasury Department. The existence of these frauds is admitted. The Senator from Mississippi admits it. It is evident that you cannot properly value a thing when you do not see it; but let us bring the valuation under the eye of our officers, let us value the goods in the city of New York, and you cannot fail to get at the correct valuation. I submit to the Senator from Virginia that a home-valuation system, with a provision allowing the duties to be taken in kind where fraud was suspected, would do away with all disposition to fraud. Then a man would know that a fraudulent entry and appraisal of his merchandise would be detected; and this, after all, is the surest preventive of fraud. That is all I ask. Hereafter, when the subject comes up, I shall be willing to fix the duties at such an amount as the friends of the Administration think will give us an adequate revenue, provided they be kept on the articles on which they are now imposed, and be laid uniformly on them. I cannot see why the manufactures of cotton should be put at nineteen per cent. in the bill of the last session, while all other manufactures are at twenty-four per cent. If anybody can give me any sort of reason for that, I should like to hear it. That branch of manufacture in this country reaches $80,000,000 or $100,000,000 a year; it consumes six hundred thousand bales of cotton per annum; it did that ten years ago; and but for your ruinous discrimination against it as a marked interest for the disapprobation of the Government, it would have consumed one million two hundred thousand bales of cotton this year. I never could conceive why this distinction was made against that great interest of the country. If there is any reason for the distinction, let it remain where it is; but wherever it is put, whether at five or at thirty per cent., let whatever is stipulated for our security in our own market be fairly and honestly carried out. That is all I ask, and I think it will be accomplished by the amendment which I have drawn up in the most simple form.

At some other time I may speak about the conduct of the present Administration; I do not mean to go back. I should not say a word in regard to it now, but that, since I spoke yesterday, I have read more of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. The Senator from Mississippi tells us that Congress is to blame for the appropriations; that the Executive has nothing to do but fairly and effectually to carry out the laws which Congress may pass. Did I understand him correctly?

Mr. DAVIS. Not quite.

Mr. SIMMONS. I would not misrepresent the Senator for the world.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not say the gentleman misrepresented me, but I do not think he quite understood me. The Executive is responsible for his recommendations; but if Congress adopts them, and makes appropriations to carry them out, I say it is not fair then for Congress to turn round, and arraign the Executive for the expenditure which has resulted; and when Congress adopts measures without the recommendation of the Executive, and, perhaps, against his known will, it is still less fair for Congress then to arraign the aggregate of expenditures against him.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is not exactly the point, but it comes near it. Now, I wish to ask the Senator from Mississippi whether he thinks it the duty of the Executive to carry out the measures of Congress, if adopted without his recommendation?

Mr. DAVIS. I should say so. If the President signs an act of Congress, it becomes a law, and he cannot fail to carry it out.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, then, I wish to ask the friends of the Administration by what authority they carry $17,000,000 of the appropriations of the last year to the current expenses of the present year? If your rule be as stated by the Senator from Mississippi, and you go upon strict construction, I desire an explanation of that; and I desire to know, too, how the Executive can put himself in the place of Congress, and refuse to carry out one fourth of its appropriations. I noticed in the President's message a statement that he would withhold certain appropriations, but he assured us that they would be of such a character that no harm would be done to the country by suspending the execution of the law. As I understand my rights here, if I vote for an appropriation and it receives the sanction of both Houses of Congress and the approval of the Executive, it is not then to be as he says, but as we say. I hope Senators will explain this matter. No doubt it will be excused, for we want money, and everybody would be glad that there was so much unexpended if it was only in the Treasury; but it is all gone, and the law has been violated. I shall not go into that, however; I merely give notice that I shall want to have an explanation of it. I am glad that I now know what the law is on this point. If there is any excuse for not carrying it out, let the excuse be given; and if it be at all reasonable, I shall accept it with pleasure, for I do not mean to arraign the Executive.

Mr. President, I have stated the proposition which I desire to add to this bill as an amendment. Let the Senator from Virginia fix a reasonable time when it shall take effect, and I will not disagree with him as to that. I desire to accomplish the object in a reasonable and proper way. I trust he will accede to my proposition.

Mr. DAVIS. I think it due to myself, and due to the Senator from Rhode Island, that I should say to him—and I have waited for that purpose until the close of his speech—that, in referring to the advice he gave to the cotton-planting interest, I did not do so, as I supposed, in a manner to induce the belief that any offense had been taken because advice was given, or that he was considered unfit to give advice. Certainly no offense was felt. I did not intend so to express myself; and recognizing him as one who had long been at the head of the manufacturers of cotton, I was quite ready to listen, and I did listen, attentively and respectfully; but we view the matter in different lights, and may arrive at different conclusions. Whilst I receive his proposition that the two ends of the fiber should be brought together, as a very good figure of fraternization, he will of course allow me to say it was a very bad proposition for the cotton spinner, as by that means he would never make a cotton thread, [laughter;] and it is somewhat encouraging to the cotton planter, because it offers a hope that our nap cotton will receive from him a better seed in future, where the fiber is only bent, not the two ends brought together.

But we will let that pass. I will now say that I hope always to receive any suggestions which the Senator may make for a common interest, in that spirit in which I am sure it will be offered, and with that respect which is due to his information and judgment. In any reply that I may hereafter make, I wish to assure him in advance that if my manner should be earnest, he is not therefore to infer that I have become offended, or suppose he has assumed more than I was willing to grant.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not the slightest apprehension of being offended at any remarks the Senator may make. My solicitude is not to give offense.

Mr. DAVIS. I take none.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no fear of receiving any. I know the character of the Senate. I have been here before, though not lately, and I have never seen a disposition to give offense to anybody agreeing with me in sentiment. I may speak earnestly. I only seek to get out the truth without any embellishments. As to the figure we have wrought, we will not dispute about that. It is rather too fine spun for me when you go into fibers. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUNTER. I will say to the Senator from Rhode Island that, at the proper time and proper place, I will agree to any fair proposition for the purpose of preventing frauds on the revenue. I will go as far as he who goes furthest for any proposition which has that object simply, and which is calculated, in my opinion, to effect it; but I wish to appeal to him, and other Senators, whether this is the proper time, and whether, on this bill, when there is a necessity for urgent action, we can be expected to ingraft legislation which is of a character to affect our whole system of revenue laws? Is this a bill on which we can make amendments to the tariff, amendments to the system of appraisement, amendments, I believe, in the monetary system of the country, and in the warehousing system? If he were to succeed in ingrafting amendments of that sort, the only effect would be to kill the bill.

What we want is to know whether the Senate of the United States will vote for an issue of Treasury notes to supply the wants of the Government? If they think the bill is insufficient as it stands, they will amend it as to them seems good. If they think the amount asked for is not the proper amount, they will fix that according to their own views of propriety and necessity. If the bill, in their opinion, should require further guards, they will affix those guards; and when that is done, I hope they will either vote the necessary supplies for the country, or let us know that they cannot be afforded in this shape. It is important that we should ascertain this soon, for the Government is in want of this money. Now, it is perfectly obvious, that if we depart from the simple question, whether we will supply the wants of the Government in this form and shape, to enter into debates on the tariff, or the warehousing system, or the monetary system of the country, there will be no end to them. The discussion will go on beyond the Christmas holidays, and the time will come when the Treasury will run out for the want of means.

I hope that I may be allowed to urge these considerations on the Senate. I do it with the utmost respect. I have no disposition to restrain the utmost latitude of debate. At the proper time, and on the proper occasion, I shall listen with great pleasure to the Senator, when he may choose to present his views on these great questions. Whenever the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky come up for consideration, then will be the time for him to present these views, and to present whatever amendments or propositions of law he may have to offer in regard to the revenue system of the country. But, until then, may I not ask gentlemen to suspend, and confine their amendments to the Treasury note bill itself, to what pertains to the character of that bill, and to say, and to say soon, whether they will pass the bill or not?

Mr. DIXON. I have not risen, Mr. President, with the view of opposing this bill. Certainly I should not, at this time, and in this body, interpose any factious objection to it. I believe, as the Senator from Virginia has just said, that the Treasury wants money, and must have it; and, for one, I am disposed that the majority of the Senate here should obtain the supplies necessary in the manner that seems to them fit and proper. I desire to take no responsibility with regard to it, except so far as may be involved in my own vote.

Nor, sir, do I intend at this time to go into any discussion with regard to the particular merits or demerits of the bill itself. That has been done, as I think, effectually, ably, and thoroughly, by the Senator from Rhode Island, and by other Senators who have spoken on this side of the Chamber. In the main, I agree with all that has been said by my political friends on that subject. All I desire to do at this time, (and it seems to me eminently proper,) is to call the attention of the Senate, and of the country, so far as anything which may fall from me is worthy to arrest the attention of the country, to the present condition of the nation in view of, and in connection with, this particular measure as offered at the present time.

What do we see? What is the condition of the country? We see in the first place the business of the country paralyzed, and its commerce, both foreign and domestic, almost entirely destroyed. We see its industry unemployed. We see that sad spectacle alluded to yesterday by the Senator from Rhode Island—willing industry reposing in involuntary idleness. We see willing hands waiting for employment and unable to obtain the privilege of labor. We see, further, the banks of the country compelled for sixty days to suspend specie payment; and now, at last, only enabled, as I believe, with due deference to the distinguished Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] to resume specie payments by the very plethora of money to which he has alluded, which is occasioned by a total stagnation of business, a total absence and cessation of new engagements.

In addition to all this, we behold in Europe the reaction of what has taken place here. We see England herself, and every commercial nation of Europe which has had any dealings with us, feeling the effect of our troubles. We find that the excess of trade, the over-importation stimulated by our own legislation, has at last wrought its effects in every country which has traded with us; and that now, through our inability to consume and pay for what we have purchased from them, they are suffering themselves; showing that our system is not only injurious to us, but is also injurious to those nations in Europe who have been supposed to reap benefit from it.

Furthermore, at last we see a bankrupt Government. Only ten months ago when I came here to take my seat, I found the Senate discussing the question how they might deplete the Treasury, how they might reduce the sum of our revenues; and now this proud nation, by its representatives here, is attempting to borrow money, and proposes to do it by the issue of paper money.

This is what we see about us; and I beg leave to say to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance, who, I believe, was in one or the other House of Congress ten years ago, that we have now passed through a decade, a period of ten years, since the financial system inaugurated and established at that time by the Senator from Virginia and his political friends, on the ruins of another and very different system, has been in effect; and we see, as I think, the fruits, the consequences, or at least the sequences. That the Senator himself will admit. I believe these fruits and consequences belong to him and his political friends; and that he is entitled to the benefit of them all. I lay them at his feet as the trophies of the victories of the last ten years; and he is at liberty, if he pleases, to hang them as high as he chooses, with festive vows and offerings, in the temple of the party. If not the result of, they have followed those measures; and that is the point to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate.

Now, sir, the Secretary of the Treasury comes in with his report, stating that "a revulsion in the monetary affairs of the country always occasions more or less of distress among the people." I think we may agree on that point. "The consequence is, that the public mind is directed to the Government for relief;" and he goes on to say that no relief can be furnished by the Government. What does he offer? What is his measure? He proposes (I do not say that it is not at this time a necessary measure; perhaps it is, in the present state of the country) the issue of $20,000,000 of paper money, in the strictest sense of that term; money which is to be paid out by the Government for debts due by the Government; money which is to pass by delivery; which is to circulate from hand to hand; which is inconvertible into specie; which will not anywhere command specie, except by the voluntary exchange of it for specie. In every sense of the term, by every definition, it is paper money in the old sense. That is what the Government now proposes to issue.

I wish it to be understood by the people of this country what this issue is. I wish it, furthermore, to be understood that this issue of paper money is to be locked up, as I suppose, in the sub-Treasury. I take it that this paper money, which is to be engraved and adorned so as to bear the semblance of bank bills, the semblance of currency, and act the part of a currency, is to be locked up in the sub-Treasury, or it is to be exchanged for specie which is to be locked up there. This and the sub-Treasury are to act hand in hand; the two are to go together. Is not that an abandonment, at least temporarily, of the entire sub-Treasury system?

I do not propose now to go into a discussion of the sub-Treasury. I do not even propose to say that I am opposed to it as a financial measure. I barely wish to call the attention of the Senate to this peculiar circumstance. We were told that the sub-Treasury was to prevent all contraction or expansions; that it was a great conservative power; that it was to prevent over-importations; that it was to protect our country; that it was to save the banks, or at least, to save the Government. This much at least I may say in regard to the sub-Treasury without contradiction; it will be admitted by its warmest friends that it has shown itself powerless for the good which was predicted in regard to it. It has shown itself unable to prevent expansions, unable to prevent contractions, unable to prevent over-importations, unable to prevent the ruin and distress which have been spread far and wide throughout the country. Furthermore, it has failed in that last benefit which it was said it would at last confer; it has been unable to save the Government; and we now find, under this sub-Treasury system, the Government unable to collect its duties and in a bankrupt condition. We see, in the great ports of the country, the warehouses filled with foreign importations which an impoverished people at this very time are unable to consume.

I wish I could believe, with the distinguished Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] that this evil was entirely temporary, and that the recovery would be as rapid as the fall. That I understand to be his statement. Why, sir, I read not long since, in an extract from a speech of that distinguished Senator—and I always read everything he utters with deference and respect and admiration—a prediction of the very state of things now existing, even to the specification of the suspension of specie payments; and that prediction was founded entirely upon the system of financial government pursued by the gentleman from Virginia and his political friends. His prediction has been fulfilled. I trust that his prediction now will be equally true, but I cannot believe it. Although he showed himself then a prophet indeed, I cannot believe that his present prediction will be equally true. I hope it is true of the State of New York, which he represents here; but in that part of New England from which I come, in the State of Connecticut, the troubles of the day are by no means over. Indeed, sir, if not at their height and intensity, there is at this time no symptom of recovery. The only want of money is for liquidation for the payment of debts. The banks have money. They can loan money to-day; but the difficulty with them is to find paper of a business character on which they think it safe to make their loans. There is no apparent relief thus far from what we have already suffered. I am in hopes that the brilliant prospect pointed out by the Senator from New York will prove to be true; but I think that when we stand here one year hence, we shall find that then the recovery has only commenced.

The Secretary of the Treasury says that no relief can be furnished; that the people, although they suffer more or less in a revulsion, must not look to the Government for relief. That is the old story; it is not new. He only offers to us a bankrupt law for the banks. That is the only measure of relief, with the exception of this issue of paper money, which, to say the least of it, is as inconvertible as any money issued by the banks during the suspension. My belief is that there is a relief which can be offered by this Government. I think it was pointed out by the honorable Senator from Rhode Island yesterday. I believe that the distinguished Senator from Virginia, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, has the talent and the ability, if he had the will, (and I know he wishes to do all he can for the country,) to devise a scheme by which confidence and credit shall be restored in a single day, and prosperity restored to the country in three months. I believe Congress has full power to restore the business of the country as rapidly as it can be possibly restored after such a fall. I believe it can be done, without shocking any constitutional scruples, and without any high protective duties. I ask no more for high protective duties than does the Senator from Rhode Island. I believe that if you will discriminate in favor of American industry, as you discriminate against it by your present measures, it is all that will be required. I believe that, if you will only consent to give the American laborer the poor privilege of doing American work, you will at once restore this country to prosperity.

Sir, I am very glad that the minds of men are turned to this subject. They are looking on with anxiety. It is a subject in which they feel an interest, more or less. As they suffer more or less, as the Secretary of the Treasury says, they feel interested more or less, and I trust the end will be that through much tribulation and suffering and sorrow, sooner or later—it may not be in my day, nor in the day of any member of the Senate—we shall, at last, reach another and different policy of Government, by which the country can be restored to permanent prosperity.

Mr. COLLAMER. I shall not detain the Senate long, because it is not likely that the remarks which I may make will operate on any man's mind but my own; yet, perhaps, it is due to myself to explain the reasons for the vote I shall give. As I differ from the views expressed by many of the gentlemen on this side of the Chamber, I feel the more bound very briefly to state the views I entertain.

In the first place, I cannot regard the law of 1847, which is cited as a precedent for the bill before us, as furnishing any precedent at all. This bill seems to have been carefully copied after that law, with very few variations. I say no precedent is to be found in that law for this bill. That was a war measure. It was adopted while we were at war with Mexico. It was so adopted as to have effect only while the war continued. I need say no more to show that that can furnish no precedent for a measure like this in a time of peace.

In the next place, if that law is to be taken as a precedent, it should be taken as a whole. The act of 1847 authorized the borrowing of $23,000,000 as a loan, and the provision for Treasury notes was interwoven with the other provisions for a reason then given, and which I well remember. I think it was stated by Mr. Cave Johnson, of Tennessee, who was then chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that if you advertised for a loan you would get bids only from great money proprietors, on such terms as they might choose to offer, and the ordinary people would get nothing; but if you permitted the Government to issue Treasury notes bearing a moderate interest, they would be taken by the people who might have $50, or $100, or $200, which they were willing to deposit in this savings bank, and thus aid their country and benefit themselves. The Treasury note system was shaped with a view of enabling the common people to get hold of a portion of the loan; for it was provided in the law that whoever held Treasury notes might fund them in the general loan. That was the reason given at the time, for allowing these notes to be issued. How far it practically operated it is not for me to say, but I know it did operate to some extent.

I say, then, that that law furnishes no precedent for this, because the object now is avowedly to issue these Treasury notes to circulate from hand to hand, and they are to be put at a very small rate of interest for that purpose. I am sensible that some gentlemen suppose—and the Senator from Rhode Island seems to have that view—that these notes, especially the larger ones, will be valuable for remittances through the mails, because the bill provides that they shall issue payable to some person or order, and be by him indorsed. Clearly, the man to whom the note is first made payable may, instead of indorsing it in blank, indorse it to A B, or order, and A B may indorse it to C D, or order, and so on until it comes to the man who presents it at the Treasury. In that way, to be sure, if the payee in-dorses it to A B, or order, he may transmit it through the mail to A B, with safety, because, if it be stolen from the mail, nobody can obtain the money except A B, or somebody to whom he has ordered it to be paid. If an indorsement is forged, the drawer pays at his own hazard, and will afterwards have to pay the true owner. Do gentlemen really intend that this Government, or its officers, shall be put in this condition; that they shall take up the notes at their own hazard; and if it afterwards is ascertained that there was a forged indorsement, be compelled to repay the true owner? Is it intended to take such a burden on us? I presume not. The provision of the bill is that the notes shall be payable at the Treasury to the "lawful holder;" but you may strike out the word "lawful," and it will mean the same thing; for a man is not the owner of a note which is payable to a certain person or order, unless it has been indorsed to him. In truth, there is no way to secure the Government in the payment of these notes with safety, if they are to go into circulation, unless by striking out the provision that they are to be made payable to a particular person, or order, and make them payable to bearer. It is possible that they may all be made payable to some clerk in the Treasury, who will put his name on the back of each one in blank, and after that they would pass by delivery, and could not afterwards receive a restricted indorsement. To do that, however, is to go through forms for no practical purpose. You may as well make the notes payable, in the first instance, to bearer, as to go through that form of indorsement.

Probably that provision of the bill will be stricken out; but how came it here? Undoubtedly it is copied from the statute of 1847, and it was inserted there after the sub-Treasury system was adopted in 1846. The object was, that the Treasury notes should not be regarded as a circulating medium, but as bills payable to order and indorsed by the payee, and to be used in that way in order to escape the charge of having in any way overridden the provisions of the sub-Treasury system. You may possibly preserve the form now, but you will have to destroy the life of the form. If you make the notes payable to a particular clerk in the Treasury, to be by him indorsed in blank and then paid out, you might as well make them payable to the bearer at once; this form of indorsement is resorted to for the purpose of evasion.

Then, let us look at this bill in its true character. What is it? We must bear in mind that we have a sub-Treasury system. I do not propose to enter into its merits now. I will simply say that, in my opinion, it was rather commending itself to public acceptance than otherwise, by the lapse of time. How far, in point of fact, it has been practically observed, is another consideration; I suppose, in truth, it has been generally vetoed; but no matter, it had, at least, the plausible claim of conducting the dealings of this Government in a constitutional currency. What do we see now? The moment there is difficulty, the moment there is any pecuniary pressure which is felt by the Treasury, however slight its pulse may be, immediately the bottom is knocked out of your system by this bill; the whole of it is utterly disregarded and broken down. What is substituted in its place? To begin with: the bill provides for the issue of $20,000,000—I will not use any vulgar names, but I will say $20,000,000 of irredeemable paper; that is, paper which no man who holds it can get the money for by any legal demand he may have, short of one year; and as the Treasury receives these notes in the payment of revenue, they are to be reissued, with a provision that no more than $20,000,000 shall be out at one time. Will not this afford the means of paying your incoming duties? Undoubtedly; and probably $10,000,000 would do that. I suppose $40,000,000 is probably as much revenue as you will derive this year from the present tariff. Now, if you issue $20,000,000 of Treasury notes, they will go into the hands of those that have duties to pay, and be used by them in the payment of duties. As soon as the Treasury gets in $5,000,000 of them, they will be reissued, and they will go around in the same circle again. If you issue $20,000,000, and they come back in six months and are reissued, they will have paid during the year your $40,000,000 of duties, and what will be your condition at the end of the year? You will have these notes in the Treasury, but no hard money, no constitutional currency.

It seems to me that it is hardly worth while for us, at this particular juncture, in a crisis like this, to abandon and prostrate altogether the Independent Treasury system, as it is called. You will find it impossible to escape the charge; every man in the community will know from this bill, if you pass it, that your much-boasted system of constitutional currency has failed the Government. Is it not worth while to retain it, at least for a time? What says the President in relation to the circulation of paper money—convertible paper—bank notes that you can cash every day and every hour? Because there have been fifty or sixty days during which the banks declined to pay specie for their notes, he says they should all be put into bankruptcy, and wound up. Then what are you to do with your sub-Treasury? It has failed; it proposes to issue a large body of paper which is actually irredeemable for a year, and incontrovertible altogether. Would the President have it put into bankruptcy and wound up? Would he have a commission issue on the Treasury, and force it into liquidation?

The President argues in his message that the States ought to adopt the same system; they ought to deal only in hard money; they ought to follow out the example of this, the mother Government! Let us see how they would follow it if they were to make the attempt. They would take nothing but hard money for taxes, and pay out nothing but hard money. By-and-by a pinch comes, and they cannot get hard money. Suppose they follow the example of the General Government, and issue bills; what are they? Nothing but bills of credit, which the States are forbidden to issue. If you give a man a Treasury note, payable in a year, what is it? It is a bill on the credit of the Government, for which the faith of the Government is pledged. When the States come to this point, the Constitution interposes; they cannot follow the President any further; he leads them into a slough; he gets himself out of it by asking Congress to exercise its power of issuing bills of credit, which the States are forbidden to do. I do not make these remarks with a view of finding fault with the Independent Treasury system or a hard-money currency; I am merely endeavoring to show how palpably and grossly that system is violated by this bill.

But, sir, there seems to me to be something dishonest and discreditable in it. Suppose a man is my debtor to a small amount; he owes me $100. I go to him, and say that I want my $100 paid. He tells me he has stopped payment, and has not got any money. He admits that he has means enough to pay me, but he has not the cash. He can borrow the cash and I cannot, but he says he will have to give something for borrowing it. I claim that he ought to borrow the money and pay me what he owes me. He will not do it, but proposes to give me a note for $100 at a small rate of interest—two or three per cent.—something that he knows will not enable me to get my full debt, and he takes advantage of his power to force me to receive his note or get nothing. Is that the part of an honest debtor? Is there any better morality in the Government doing the same thing? Is a different system of ethics to be applied to the dealings of the Government with its creditors from that which is applied between man and man? Certainly not. You may say the people are not obliged to take these Treasury notes. They have Hobson's choice. I say the necessities of the Government's creditor compel him to take the notes, and thus you force him to get the cash for them. Is that the way to treat your creditor, to give him a piece of paper for which you think he can get cash? Why do you not give him the cash? You engaged to pay him so many dollars for his property that he sold to you, or the services that he rendered to you. It is your business, not his, to get the dollars with which to pay him.

I say, then, that this whole proceeding is unprecedented in its nature, unfair in its principles, a violation of the whole idea of the sub-Treasury, an abandonment of the great constitutional currency. I have still another reason for objecting to the bill. If the necessities of the Government crowd on the Treasury, I am not disposed to find fault with the Administration, or with the Secretary of the Treasury. If he has drawn money out of the Treasury and applied it to the redemption of the public debt, he acted, no doubt, with a view to relieve the country. It did that, in some measure. He supposed, perhaps, that by anticipating the debt due in 1868, and paying it now at a premium, he might possibly so far relieve the commercial community as to enable the importations to go on, and thus keep up the revenue. In that object he has failed. I do not find fault with him for not having had more foresight than anybody else in the country. This result has come upon us unexpectedly; but I say that, when it has come, there should be fair dealing, and consistent conduct.

Now, what is proposed? It is said that the object is to pay debts which we now owe. We have not the money. Then borrow the money like an honest debtor and pay interest for it. Go and buy gold, put it into your Treasury, keep up your sub-Treasury, do not abandon your constitutional currency. You can to-day obtain a premium for six per cent. stocks of the United States having any reasonable length of time to run. You will make money by borrowing gold for your stocks. Why this shrinking back from the borrowing of money when you owe a debt, and ought to pay it? Why not honestly and squarely say "we will preserve the constitutional currency; we will preserve our sub-Treasury; we will not thrust our paper on people against their consent and oblige them to get it cashed; but we will as honest men use our credit to borrow hard money, and use it as we have agreed to do, in paying our debts." There is no other honest way of acting on this occasion; all other modes are evasions, inconsistent with your previous principles. The issuing of these notes is an abandonment of the constitutional currency, and the more you make them circulate the greater is the abandonment. You deny that we have power to establish a national bank. We once had such a bank, with a capital of $30,000,000, and you said it was a great monster. Here you are making a national bank without checks, without any hypothecation of securities, based on nothing except the public credit. You are creating a bank with power to issue $20,000,000 in one day, and to reissue it from time to time; and at the end of the year, after you shall have issued this paper three or four times, your Treasury will be in the same condition as now.

I think it would be infinitely better to borrow money when you need it; not only because that is honest and right and consistent with your previous assurances to the public, but because I think it will be some relief to the community. There is undoubtedly in this country a very large body of unemployed money—I do not allude to the money in the bank vaults; but there is a great quantity of money sequestered, or, as the common expression is, hoarded; that is, held by people who do not choose to shave notes or lend their money for short periods. My own State has had a little experience on a small scale in regard to this matter, which will illustrate my meaning. The little State to which I belong holds that it is best not to be in debt at all. The State keeps out of debt; but almost every year, in order to meet the expenses of the session of the Legislature and the annual payments to our officers, we have occasion to anticipate the taxes, and, therefore, we annually pass a law authorizing the treasurer to borrow a small sum—generally $50,000. He borrows it for a short time from some of our banks, and when the taxes come in he pays them, and the matter is ended in a few months. This year he called on the banks for some money to anticipate the taxes. The banks told him: "We cannot lend the money; with the other banks of the country we have stopped redeeming, and we hold it to be dishonest to lend money which cannot be redeemed; our notes will pass current, and people will take them; but honesty requires that we should not lend you paper which we do not redeem, and we will not lend you anything." The treasurer then went to Boston, and stated his desire to borrow money for short periods. After several days' trial, he could not get it, and came back. The Legislature being in session, he informed them of the facts. It happened that our State House was providentially burned last year, and we were rebuilding it, and therefore had occasion to use some money.

On the whole, but with a great great deal of reluctance, the Legislature passed an act authorizing him to borrow $100,000 for five years, at six per cent. interest. He went to Boston, and came back with what he wanted, and informed us that he could have ten times as much any day on one hour's notice without any discount at all. That is to say, there is money enough, and people are glad to get a chance to lend it, provided they have a security which is known to be reliable, and especially if the money is not to come back on them immediately.

I have no doubt that, if you should endeavor to borrow money, you would get a premium on a six per cent. loan to any amount you might ask. I do not think that premium would be as much as the Secretary of the Treasury has paid on the redemptions he has made. I do not blame him for making those advances, which he did, no doubt, with a good purpose, and in all fairness; but I say that if we borrow four or five millions of dollars, we shall be no more in debt than we were a year ago; we shall draw the money from places where it is now hoarded, and by being put in circulation in payment of demands against us, it will go to relieve the people by putting in circulation money that is now sequestered from use. These Treasury notes, however, give no relief; they do nothing but run round and round in the circle of the Treasury business; they destroy your system of constitutional currency, and leave your creditors, to whom you pay these notes, to get them cashed as well as they can. To such a system, I am utterly opposed.

Mr. HUNTER. I am very reluctant to say a word; I know it does not become me to do so, when I am begging the Senate to vote; yet it is very hard to pass by such charges as the Senator from Vermont has made against the measure we are proposing. It seems to me that I can show, in a very few words, that they result from an entire misapprehension of our position.

Because we bring forward a proposition to borrow money on Treasury notes, the Senator from Vermont charges us with abandoning the doctrine in regard to hard money, and abandoning our principle with reference to the Independent Treasury. Now, sir, what is it that was ever proposed or promised by the Independent Treasury? Simply this: that the Government would be able to conduct its operations without being embarrassed by a suspension of the banks; that is to say, whenever a suspension occurred, the Government would have its Treasury in such a form as would be available to it, and could be used all over the world. Have we admitted that experience has not proved that this is the best currency in which we can collect our revenues? Have we admitted that there is not specie enough in the country to enable us to conduct the operations of the country? By no means. It is not as a monetary measure that the Treasury note is resorted to, but because it is the cheapest mode by which we can borrow money; and it is not only the cheapest mode by which we can borrow money, but, incidentally, it will relieve the community more, or, to speak more properly, it will operate less onerously on trade and commerce than any other mode in which we can borrow money.

We do not propose it because we confess that there is not specie enough to carry on the operations of the country, or because specie is not the best currency, but we propose it because this is the cheapest mode in which we can borrow money. Can anybody deny that? Is it fair to say, in relation to it, that the mode which we propose will not draw out the specie resources now hoarded in regard to all except the $6,000,000 to be issued at once, just as much as a loan would draw them out? We are to advertise that we will exchange the note for specie at the lowest rate of interest at which specie will be given for it. Nor do we propose to force it on any one. Is it not specially provided that it shall not be paid to any creditor of the United States except at his option. And is it likely that there will be any necessity for the Government to force it on its creditors? If we provide the means, is it not probable that the Government will always be in funds to enable it to give the creditor his option to take either the specie or the note; and, what is more, if we issue the note to the bidder who will give specie for it at the lowest rate of interest, will it not, in all probability, command specie at any time and in any place?

Then, sir, I deny that, in proposing this issue of Treasury notes, we are either abandoning our policy or our professions, or are attempting to force on the public creditor, if he does not choose it, anything but gold or silver. In point of fact, I apprehend it will turn out that, in many places, many persons will prefer these Treasury notes to gold and silver, and if you give them the option they will take the notes. When you trace the history of the previous issues, you will find that they were very nearly at par with specie during the whole time they were issued. There may have been short periods when they fell below the value of specie; but generally, in our past experience, Treasury notes have been equal to specie.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Treasury notes issued under the act of 1847, were fundable at six per cent., and for that reason they were of course equal to specie.

Mr. HUNTER. There have been various acts for issuing Treasury notes besides the act of 1847—all modeled on the act of 1837. To show that there is nothing inconsistent in this bill with our professions, let me refer to the fact that at the very time when the sub-Treasury was proposed, provision was made for an issue of Treasury notes—in 1837. This is one form of using the Government credit; it is the cheapest form; and if it follows, as an incidental consequence, that we relieve the community more by using the Government credit in this form than in any other, are we to be accused of a departure from principle, because we do not suffer that consideration to drive us from what, in other respects, looking only to the good of the Treasury itself, is the best mode to which we can resort? Surely not.

The Senator from Vermont says that I referred to the act of 1847 as a precedent. I referred to it only as a precedent for the form of the bill, and I offered that argument in reply to the various propositions suggested for amending the form of this bill. I believe I might go back and say that it comes within the act of 1837, though I have not examined that so critically—I mean in regard to the provisions as to the form of the Treasury note, the mode of assignment, and other matters of detail. These are all taken from old precedents, which have worked well as far as we know, and led to none of the objections that have been suggested.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have but a word to say in reply. It has been put forth all the while that we were to issue these Treasury notes, and even place them at a low rate of interest, so as to enable them to pass as a currency. Now the gentleman talks of raising money by them as a loan. Why disguise that loan? Why not have an actual loan at once? Again, in view of the illustration which I gave before, how can any man suppose that we can get a loan of money on as good terms upon notes payable in one year, with three or four per cent. interest, as we could upon a six per cent. stock payable in five or ten years?

Mr. HUNTER. Allow me to refer the Senator to the fact that the average rate of interest on our Treasury notes has been much less than the average rate on our loans.

Mr. COLLAMER. I suppose you can get a premium for a six per cent. loan having five or ten years to run; but the impracticability of getting money on favorable terms, upon short paper, I endeavored to illustrate by the instance in my own State to which I alluded. There we could not raise money at all, on short paper, but could get as much as we wanted on a six per cent. stock having some time to run. The notion that it is better to raise this money on short paper is perfectly ideal—there is nothing in it.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the advantage of a loan for a short time is, that we are very soon to be out of debt. I hope that, with returning prosperity, we shall soon have revenue enough to support the Government.

Mr. COLLAMER. Does the gentleman propose to borrow himself out of debt?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; but I expect, with returning prosperity, to have revenue enough to pay the loan, and the current expenses also, particularly if we shall get all your free articles on the duty list.

As the Senator from Virginia has truly said, this is a cheap mode of making a loan. I do not say it is the best. It is not the form I myself prefer. When I addressed the Senate before, I was under the impression that these notes, like the notes issued under the act of 1837, must be assigned from hand to hand as long as they traveled; that they were never to pass as money—never to be in the nature of bank notes passing by delivery. It is exactly in that view that I think it is to relieve the country. Money has been locked up on account of a want of confidence between man and man. Deposits have been withdrawn from the banks and other places where deposits are usually made, and locked up, and are now guarded with constant apprehensions lest house-breakers shall carry them away. All the gold and silver thus secured by the owners will very gladly be exchanged for Government securities bearing a very low rate of interest; those Government securities not being subject to the same hazard, either of arson or of theft, as the gold and silver which they are now hoarding on account of a want of confidence in the incorporated institutions or in the individuals of the country.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1857.

NEW SERIES... No. 7.

Then, sir, as to the probability of controlling the circulation and constituting a sort of regulator of the business of the country: to my mind there is no mode better adapted to that than that the Government should constantly exhaust its Treasury. In periods of prosperity money will flow in; when the people can spare it it will be collected; and in periods of commercial revulsion, when the receipts at the custom-houses cease, the Treasury will be depleted; and when the Treasury is exhausted the Government steps in and makes its loan during just such periods as this; and the like has occurred about every twenty years, running back. When confidence has been lost, when there has been a failure of the incorporated institutions to answer the purpose of furnishing money on the credit of individuals, then the Government credit comes and draws the money from those places in which it has been locked up, throws it into circulation again, and thus, in the ordinary transaction of its own functions, brings relief to the community. This is the only mode in which the Government can properly interpose, and it is an effective mode at a time like this, when specie enough is locked up in the country to answer all our wants, and it merely requires some hand sufficiently strong to draw it out and throw it into circulation.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understand that the House of Representatives has already adjourned, and I suppose nothing can be gained by forcing this bill through the Senate to-night, if it were practicable to do so. It is undoubtedly true that a number of Senators desire to speak on it. If we sit longer, we shall probably be forced into a night session. As I can see nothing to be gained by that, and as it will not advance the measure particularly, I will, in accordance with the desire of several gentlemen around me, move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HUNTER. Will the Senator withdraw that motion for a moment, in order to allow me to make an appeal to him?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly.

Mr. HUNTER. When we adjourned yesterday, I thought it was with the understanding that we were to have a decision on it to-day. The Senate is aware that there is urgent necessity for speedy action on it. We know that a Senator [Mr. BIGLER] has the floor for Monday for the discussion of another subject; and if we do not dispose of this bill to-day, we shall probably have a contest with him on Monday. We know, too, that the Christmas holidays are approaching, and it would very much facilitate the transaction of the public business if we were to minister to the necessities of the Government by passing this bill soon. If we are going to pass it, let us say so at once. If we will not pass it in this form, let that be known. I hope I shall not be considered unreasonable in asking the Senate not to adjourn now, but to take the question on the bill to-day or to-night.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not see what is to be gained by pressing the bill to-night. If we pass it to-night, that will not make it law. If we delay it until Monday, our action will, probably, be soon enough for the House of Representatives. I am ready to express my views on the bill now, but this is a very important measure, which ought not to be hurried through; and, as a number of Senators will probably speak on it, I renew my motion that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HUNTER called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Hale, Harlan, King, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Broderick, Brown, Clay, Davis, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Reid, Sebastian, Thomson of New Jersey, and Wright—27.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In his annual message, which was sent to the Senate only eleven days ago, the President of the United States, after reviewing the condition of the country, and attributing our commercial disasters to the circulation of bank paper, congratulated the country on the condition of the United States Treasury, in this language:

"Thanks to the Independent Treasury, the Government has not suspended payment, as it was compelled to do by the failure of the banks in 1837. It will continue to discharge its liabilities to the people in gold and silver. Its disbursements in coin will pass into circulation, and materially assist in restoring a sound currency."

This was the language of the President only eleven days ago. At the same time, we received a report from the Secretary of the Treasury showing that the revenues of the country for the next fiscal year would be sufficient to defray all its contemplated expenses. Now, sir, in less than two weeks, what do we see? A bill is brought in proposing the issue of $20,000,000 in Treasury notes. After reading a lecture to the States about the impropriety of banks of issue, founded upon specie, and the paper of which is intended to be convertible at all times into specie; and after professing to pay out nothing except gold and silver from the United States Treasury, we find, coming from the same source, this proposition to issue $20,000,000 of paper money. This shows how professions and practices sometimes run counter to each other. The President, boasting of the credit of the Government, told us in his message that—

"From its high credit, should we be compelled to make a temporary loan, it can be effected on advantageous terms. This, however, shall, if possible, be avoided; but, if not, then the amount shall be limited to the lowest practicable sum."

What has occurred in the last eleven days to change this entire programme? This is a most extraordinary proposition. In a time of peace, without any extraordinary expenses having been incurred in the last ten days, here is an actual proposition brought before the Senate to raise $20,000,000; in a form, too, directly at war with the professed policy of the Administration.

I have had occasion, at different times, to attempt to show that this Administration, and the one that preceded it, although professing to entertain certain principles, had in practice departed very widely from them. I think this is an instance. The preceding and the present Administrations, calling themselves Democratic, professed to advocate Democratic measures. One of the cardinal principles in the creed is economy—to carry on the Government in an economical way, and to raise no more revenue than is absolutely necessary for an economical administration of its affairs. This is the principle. How have they carried it out? For the four years expiring on the 30th day of June last, there were expended more than two hundred and eighty-five million dollars, more than two hundred and forty millions of which were exclusive of money paid on account of the public debt—a sum larger by millions than any other Administration ever expended during the same period, even in time of war. On the 1st day of July last, as shown by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, there were nearly eighteen million dollars in the Treasury. His report further shows that, for the three months ending the 30th of September last, he received into the Treasury more than twenty millions, making upwards of thirty-eight million dollars; and he estimates the receipts for the next three quarters at more than thirty-six millions, which is over twelve millions a quarter. Here were nearly eighteen millions on hand on the 1st of July, an addition of twenty millions by the end of September, and twelve millions more before January is to commence—making altogether fifty million dollars expended in six months; and that is your economy! Now, the Secretary asks for $20,000,000 more; and this bill is brought in to be urged through in hot haste the second week of the session, within eleven days after we have been told by the President that the Government of the United States is able to discharge all its obligations in gold and silver! He wants $70,000,000 to administer this Government for six months!

Sir, I am in favor of raising the necessary means to carry on this Government, not by increasing the tariff, not by increasing the revenues in any form; but I am for bringing down the expenses of the Government, and you never can do that when you have a full Treasury. In order to show how inconsistent the professions and the practice of the Administration are in this respect, I desire to read another extract from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. He says:

"When the public revenue happens to be abundant, many projects are listened to and adopted by Congress without careful regard to the burdens they may permanently impose. The building new revenue cutters, not needed for the enforcement of the revenue laws; the multiplication of ports of entry and ports of delivery, for local and temporary convenience, at points not required for the collection of the revenue; and the erection of expensive buildings for officers of the customs and other public officers, are of this class."

The Secretary of the Treasury deprecates a large revenue. This was but eleven days ago, when he told us he had money enough to carry on the Government for a year; but it was possible, as the President said, that a loan might be required; but it should be for a small amount, and no more than was absolutely necessary should be called for. What has brought about this change? If it is the intention of the Secretary of the Treasury, in good faith, to reduce the expenses of the Government, and to prevent the establishing of ports of entry and delivery, and building custom-houses and appointing officers where they are not wanted, why this attempt to raise $20,000,000, thereby making the revenue "abundant," and leading to the very legislation which he deprecates?

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator yield the floor? I wish to move an adjournment, as it is now the dinner hour. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope not. I desire to get action on the bill. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 13, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, King, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Broderick, Brown, Clay, Davis, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Reid, Sebastian, and Thomson of New Jersey—26.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It was to have been hoped that after this warning of the Secretary of the Treasury, showing that a large amount of money in the Treasury led to increased expenses, there would have been no attempt to raise, especially by an issue of shipplasters, a surplus revenue, so as to have more money on hand than was actually wanted for the expenses of the Government. One good effect which I had thought would arise from the revulsion in commercial affairs, and depleting the Treasury, was that it would lead to less extravagance in the administration of the Government. I know that various appropriations are passed through this body under the impression that we have a large amount of money on hand, and that we may as well disburse it to relieve the Treasury, which could never pass under other circumstances. I myself have voted for appropriations because there was an amount of money lying idle in the Treasury which I would not have voted for if it had been necessary to raise the money in order to meet the appropriations.

It has been assumed, on the other side, and conceded by some on this side of the Chamber, I am sorry to say, that there is a necessity for raising $20,000,000; but there is no evidence of such necessity before the Senate. It is a bare assumption, and I ask Senators to look at the facts. If you vote for this bill, you are voting to raise $20,000,000 without a particle of evidence before you to show that such an amount, or anything like it, is necessary. This is a very large sum of money. It has been assumed, and seems to have been taken for granted, that it was necessary for the Treasury to have $12,000,000 on hand in order to meet the necessary expenses of the Government as they occur. This is a false assumption; it is erroneous in point of fact. The Government requires no such amount, as is evidenced from its previous action. At a time when the Treasury was full, and when Congress did not know what to do with the money, they made a provision for purchasing the indebtedness of the United States not then due, and inserted this clause in the law:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to purchase, at the current price, any of the outstanding stocks of the United States as he may think most advisable, from any surplus funds in the Treasury: Provided, That the balance in the Treasury shall not at any time be reduced below $6,000,000."

Congress authorized the reduction of the balance in the Treasury down to $6,000,000 on the idea that that sum was abundantly sufficient to be kept on hand for the convenient operations of the Mint and all other purposes. This act was passed in 1853, three years after the act which was referred to by the Senator from Louisiana. Congress thought it unwise to have more than $6,000,000 in the Treasury, and authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase bonds so as to reduce the sum on hand to that amount.

Now, what is the condition of your Treasury? The Senator from Virginia sent to the desk the other day a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, and that letter was read, for the purpose of showing the necessity for the passage of this bill. It is to be presumed, inasmuch as the Secretary is favorable to the bill, that he stated the case as strongly as the facts would warrant. What does he say? He does not state that $12,000,000, or any other sum, is necessary to be kept on hand. That has been assumed on the other side of the Chamber in the same manner as some Senators have assumed that no one objected to the necessity of raising this amount of money. We do object. There is no necessity whatever shown for it. The Secretary of the Treasury shows, simply, that the disbursements are weekly exceeding the income, and that the amount on hand is now reduced below $6,000,000, having reference, no doubt, to the act of 1853, which was predicated upon the idea that it was necessary at all times to have $6,000,000 in the Treasury, for the convenience of the business of the Treasury Department and the Mint; but he does not state how much it is below that amount. He states further, as a reason why money should be raised, that on the 1st of January it will be necessary to pay our interest on the public debt, amounting to $722,629 29. The best case that the Secretary of the Treasury can make out is, that the amount in the Treasury has been reduced something below $6,000,000, the sum which the act of 1853 assumed to be the proper amount to be kept on hand, and that we have $722,629 29 interest to pay in January. Does that make out a case showing the necessity for $20,000,000? The Secretary does not say in this letter that $20,000,000 are necessary, or that $5,000,000 are necessary. He does not undertake at all to say how much may be necessary; but he thinks it advisable that $20,000,000 should be borrowed, or notes to that amount authorized to be issued; and he says they will not be used unless they are wanted. Does not the Senator from Virginia see that that runs into the very difficulty which the Secretary of the Treasury says we have been in all along by having so much revenue, that we have incurred unnecessary expenses?

I wish to call attention for a moment to some of the expenses which are alluded to by the Secretary of the Treasury by the improper establishment of custom-houses where they ought not to be. Before I proceed to name the cases—I shall call attention to only two or three of them—I will make a general remark, that the action of this Government for the last few years has been just as inconsistent with its professions in regard to centralizing power here in the Federal Government, as it is now inconsistent after the message of the President and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury in asking, at the expiration of eleven days, for $20,000,000. It used to be the good old Democratic creed not to have any more officers than were necessary for the administration of the Government, to preserve the rights of the States, and not to consolidate power in the hands of the Federal Government. Sir, that is the kind of Democracy in which I believe. But this Government has been going on, not only increasing its expenses, but increasing its patronage and multiplying its officers, at a fearful rate, for the last few years.

By reference to the report of receipts and expenditures made at the last session of Congress, I find that there is established at Perth Amboy, New Jersey, a custom-house, with a collector. The whole amount, according to the report which I hold in my hand, of the receipts from the collection of customs in that district for the year, was $1,701 18. What was the expense of keeping up that office? On referring to the expenditures for collecting the revenue from customs at Perth Amboy, New Jersey, I find the amount to be $3,796—more than double the amount of revenue collected at that point. At Edenton, North Carolina, the amount collected was $171; the expenses were $204. At Pensacola, Florida, the amount collected was $351 49, and the amount expended was $2,892—nearly nine times as much was expended in order to keep up the custom-house and pay the officers as was collected on goods entered at that port. I have not had time to follow this inquiry out; but I have no doubt if I were to look to some of the offices established away up in the mountains, thousands of miles from the sea-board, I should find that the salaries paid to collectors and to watchmen, and for the rent of buildings, exceeded frequently ten times the whole amount of revenue collected at these places.

What has led to the establishment of these useless offices, and the increase of Executive patronage? An overflowing Treasury, and a desire to furnish places for some hungry office-seekers.

This is not only the case in regard to the collection of the revenue, but it is so in reference to the judiciary. Almost every session of late some State having but one judicial district is divided into two, and a new judge, district attorney, and marshal have to be appointed, and all the expenses of another court incurred. Last session, I remember, a bill was introduced to divide the State of Missouri into two judicial districts, and it passed. Upon what ground? Why, that some other State had been divided the year previous; and it was just as necessary to have two districts in Missouri as somewhere else. Within a few days the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BACCHUS] has offered a bill to divide the State of Indiana into two judicial districts; and probably the reason for the passage of that bill will be, that Illinois and Missouri have been divided. Iowa will come next, and so on until you get two judicial districts in every State of the Union, with judges, marshals, district attorneys, and all the expenses attending those courts. I find, on looking into the report of the estimated expenses, that $1,000,000 is estimated for the expenses of the judiciary for the next year.

We certainly ought to have courts enough to do the business that legitimately and properly comes before the United States tribunals; but it never was the intention in the foundation of this Government, that the Federal judiciary should be so arranged as to afford an opportunity for all classes of cases, including those between citizens of the same State, to be brought before it for adjudication. We know that many cases find their way into the United States courts, of late, of which it was never intended they should have jurisdiction. The law does not authorize citizens of the same State to bring private suits against each other in the Federal courts; but we know how that is evaded. The suit is brought in the name of a citizen of some other State. By this multiplication of courts, and holding them in small localities, you draw within the vortex of the Federal Government thousands of cases which were never intended to be litigated elsewhere than in the State courts, and which ought not to be litigated elsewhere. It is only as to that class of cases where there is some reason to suppose that justice would not be properly administered by the State courts, that the United States courts should have jurisdiction. Now, they are swallowing up the whole law business of the country by bringing them down, as it were, to every little neighborhood. When we shall have established two districts in every State, the proposition, I suppose, will be made for a third in some State; and that will be followed by having three judges, and all the paraphernalia connected with the administration of three Federal courts in every State of the Union.

I am opposed to this system of legislation; and I hope my Democratic friends who profess, at any rate, to be opposed to consolidating power in the hands of the Federal Government, and to be in favor of an economical administration of its affairs, will begin now to lay the foundation for curtailing expenses and the rapid increase of Executive patronage, by preventing this large surplus from getting into the Treasury. I repeat that there is nothing shown—the Senator from Virginia has not shown anything—requiring the issue of $20,000,000. It is a mere request of the Secretary of the Treasury. He has not shown $6,000,000 to be necessary. The acts of Congress themselves show that $6,000,000 is all that is required to be on hand. All that the Secretary has shown is that the amount of surplus has been reduced below $6,000,000; and that a little over seven hundred thousand dollars will be necessary as an extraordinary expense on the 1st of January next. Does that showing call for $20,000,000? If you raise the $20,000,000, shall we not then be beset by all sorts of applications to get the money out of the Treasury? Do we not know by experience that when the income is large, the expenses will be proportionably large? Let us keep the amount in the Treasury down to the lowest point. I would say never let it get above the $6,000,000. If I had my way, so far from increasing the tariff in order to get a surplus in the Treasury, I would reduce it, if necessary, so that there never should be over $6,000,000 there, if that is the proper sum; and I assume that it is, because Congress, in its action heretofore, has directed any surplus exceeding that amount to be used in the purchase of the outstanding debt of the United States.

Under such circumstances as these, I think it most extraordinary that a call like this should be made by the Administration. It may be said, be and has been said, that the Administration is not responsible for large expenditures; but what is the fact? It is said Congress votes the appropriations; but we vote them upon the estimates of the Departments. Here comes in an estimate for this year of $20,000,000 for the support of the Army, and matters connected with it. Do we look into and examine it? I will not undertake to say that a portion of these $20,000,000 is expended just as uselessly as other portions of the public moneys are expended in paying useless officers. I will not say that there are in the Army, as there are connected with the Treasury Department, hundreds of officers not needed for the public service; but I do not know that it may not be so. I think it quite as likely that there are abuses there as in the civil service.

Then, I am opposed to this bill. In the first place, I am opposed to issuing this paper currency. I was in favor of the Independent Treasury; am in favor now of collecting the revenues of the country, and disbursing them in gold and silver, and I do not wish to see that policy departed from. The Government must go on, and I am prepared to vote the amount necessary to keep it moving, but I am not prepared to vote such a sum as $20,000,000, or anything like it. Congress is in session, and if, at the end of sixty or ninety days, it shall be necessary that we should raise a further sum than is now provided, a bill can be passed in a very short time. We see this bill about to be forced through this body in two or three days, and the Senate is kept in session on Saturday, and through the night, if necessary, in order to pass it. If this can be passed now, in such hot haste, an additional one can be passed three months from now, if necessary. But, sir, I am utterly astonished that a call for $20,000,000 should emanate from an Administration professing economy, depreciating a surplus in the Treasury, and especially when the Secretary tells us that this surplus leads to unnecessary expenditures. He says he will not use it unless it be necessary; but it will be ready to be used. The necessity, I fear, will arise if the money be raised.

I prefer, in the first place, that we should borrow the money, rather than issue a paper circulation; and, in the next place, I want to see the amount reduced. I am not willing to vote for more than the one fourth part of $20,000,000, and the Secretary has not asked us to do so, except in general terms. He thinks it advisable to issue $20,000,000; but he says he will use no more of that amount than is necessary. I prefer not to issue it, and then he will certainly not use it. I believe the policy of the Government, for the last few years, has been such as, if continued, will soon concentrate all power in the hands of the Federal Government. Its officers have been multiplied; its patronage has been greatly enlarged; its expenditures have been increased; and I think it high time that we should stop in this career of consolidating power in the hands of the Executive, and of the Federal Government. I know no better place to begin than here; and if I am in order—I do not know what the precise condition of the motion now pending is—I move to strike out "twenty millions," and insert "five millions."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an amendment pending which has not been disposed of, and no other is now in order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. At the proper time I shall move the amendment which I have indicated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment pending is that offered by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] to insert at the end of the tenth section:

And provided further, That the power to issue and reissue Treasury notes conferred on the President of the United States by this act, shall cease and determine on the 1st day of January, 1859.

Mr. HUNTER. I thought that amendment was accepted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It must be voted on by the Senate, however.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is it in order now to offer my amendment?

Mr. SEWARD. There was an amendment offered by me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York has offered an amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There cannot be two amendments offered at the same time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from New York is in section one, line six, to strike out "$20,000,000" and insert "$10,000,000."

Mr. COLLAMER. I take it that, in making grants of money, the largest sum is first in order; but in raising money the smallest sum is first in order. I think the motion of the Senator from Illinois is first in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That rule applies only to filling blanks, and does not apply to this case. The question now is on striking out "$20,000,000" and inserting "$10,000,000."

Mr. HUNTER. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 15, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Hamlin, King, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Broderick, Brown, Clay, Davis, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Reid, Thomson of New Jersey, and Wright—24.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SEWARD. I now move to strike out the word "six" in the tenth line of the second section, and insert "four." That is in regard to the rate of interest.

Mr. HUNTER. Yesterday I too hastily, and perhaps incautiously, assented to the proposition that the interest should be four and a half per cent., when that was suggested by the Senator from New York. I have reason to believe that we had better adhere to six per cent. I hope the Senator will not press his amendment. If he does, I cannot vote for it. I think six per cent. is better.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 17, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Hale, Hamlin, King, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Broderick, Clay, Davis, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Reid, Thomson of New Jersey, and Wright—24.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON. We have heard a great deal said in the country against small bills. I do not see the necessity of issuing these Treasury notes in such small sums as fifty dollars. I think they should not be less than one hundred dollars, at any rate. With that view, I move to strike out "fifty" and insert "one hundred."

Mr. HUNTER. To provide for Treasury notes of the denomination of fifty dollars is conformable to the practice of the country since 1837. It enables the small dealer with the Government to obtain the facilities of these Treasury notes, as well as other people. That is all that I have to say about it. That has been the denomination of notes ever since 1837, in all the bills ever passed.

Mr. PUGH. I hope this amendment will be agreed to. I have thus far voted in favor of all the amendments offered to this bill, though I have been very loath to separate on the various questions from my political friends. It does seem to me that this bill, as it now stands before the Senate, affords a very serious ground of indictment against those of us who profess the principles of the Democratic party. Here is a proposition to issue $20,000,000 of shiplasters. It is nothing else in the world, according to my understanding of the bill. It is to issue notes of the denomination of fifty dollars, to circulate by delivery. After the first indorsement of the payee, they are then to circulate from hand to hand by delivery, like a bank note. They are to bear six per cent. interest; for I am satisfied, after the remark of the Senator from Virginia to-day, that every dollar of them will bear six per cent. interest. He read us from a list yesterday, showing that of the Treasury notes issued, more than fifty million dollars of them bore six per cent. interest, and only $5,000,000 five per cent, and none of them, I presume, were at any less rate, at least he read none.

Mr. HUNTER. I stated that there were all rates of interest, from six per cent. down to one mill.

Mr. PUGH. I understood the Senator to stop with stating the amount of five per cent. notes. How many were there issued at less than five per cent.?

Mr. HUNTER. I suppose some twenty or thirty million dollars.

Mr. PUGH. All told?

Mr. HUNTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. PUGH. And $50,000,000 at six per cent. Now, let us see what this currency is to be. In the first place, being an obligation of the Government, it is receivable for public dues in Washington, in New York, in New Orleans, in San Francisco, and all over the Union. It is better than a bill of exchange to the holder; and, for the sake of borrowing money, you propose to give six per cent. interest, and exchange from San Francisco and New York, or from any of the inland States to New York.

The Senator from Rhode Island, who told us about the money lenders yesterday, will now see that the Government is going into the hands of a species of usurers such as we have never seen before. We have had a little experience in the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent. At the instance of the merchants, the Legislature of Ohio passed a bill, five or six years ago, and I was the author of it—I take the shame on myself to say so—to authorize parties to stipulate for any rate of interest not exceeding ten per cent.; and forthwith three fourths of the people seemed to think it was illegal to take less than ten per cent. Leave the limit of six per cent. in this bill, and you will pay six per cent. on these notes; because the man who finds that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to give six per cent. will stick, in the bargain with him, until he gets it; and this will be the dearest loan this Government has ever made. You give a piece of paper, as I say, which is better than any bill of exchange, and you pay interest on it besides.

I do not see how it is to relieve the Government. I am frank on that point. If the note is to be paid out here by the Secretary of the Treasury, and to be taken back at the custom-house at New York, I do not see how the Government is relieved, if that is the whole effect. If it is to become a circulating medium, it is worse than any bank note—which the President has denounced in his message—for there is no provision for its redemption. And yet, sir, what is the issue which is thrust on the Senate? At the last session we were called upon, in a great hurry, to reduce the tariff. I was in favor of a reduction of the tariff, and I believe nearly every Senator was in favor of it. A bill was produced here that had been put through the House of Representatives under the operation of "the previous question." When my friend from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] addressed the Senate at some length, I made a motion to adjourn; it was voted down, and we were pressed into a night session, and toward daylight we passed a tariff bill. What was the argument for that haste? That if we did not reduce the tariff in double quick time, there would be a surplus of $60,000,000 of coin in the sub-Treasury, and it would break everybody! We have passed a tariff bill; but we have not only broken everybody, but we have no money in the Treasury. Is this the way the financial affairs of this Government are to be conducted? You begin at one session to press through a bill to drive money out of the Treasury, and then come here and press us into the night hours to get another bill to put money into the Treasury. I think it is a serious impeachment on the financial abilities of the Democratic party; and, without meaning to be unkind to individuals, I am a little ashamed of it.

I do not see any proposition to reduce the expenses of the Government. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] has very truly said that we are an extravagant Congress and an extravagant people; and he might have taken a great deal of it to himself, for I do not recollect that he ever voted against any proposition to expend money, not even submarine telegraph. Every one of us has voted for improper appropriations. We shall be asked at this session to give a million of money for the Washington aqueduct; we shall be asked to give a million of money for the dome that is to be put here; but instead of doing like a man who is in trouble, calling in his debts and reducing his expenses, we propose to make up the deficit by an issue of paper money which we shall never redeem, or will redeem at a higher rate of expenditure than we have been called upon to do.

If this bill can be so amended as to reduce it in amount to the immediate pressing demands of the Treasury, that are to be passed over within the next thirty, or sixty, or even ninety days, I shall consent to it. If it can be reduced in the amount of this circulation so that it will do as little mischief as possible, I consent. If the rate of interest is struck out or reduced lower, I consent. Or even, these amendments having all failed, if the gentleman from Virginia will put in his bill an amendment that these notes shall circulate only by special indorsement, I shall vote for it; but if the payee is to indorse them in blank, and then let them pass by delivery, they are nothing but bank notes, and they are not bank notes with any three dollars in coin for one of paper to redeem them. There is no fund to redeem them. Thus we are precipitating the Government of the United States, in a time of peace, without any excuse for it, into a system of continental paper money. I can make nothing else out of it.

If the Senator from Virginia can remove these objections, I assure him it will give me the utmost pleasure to vote with him, as I have nearly always done on financial questions, and with my fellow-Senators of the Democratic party. My apprehension is, that this measure is a fatal departure from the whole policy of the party.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish to correct the Senator from Ohio. I admit that I have voted, though with great reluctance, for many appropriations when our Treasury was full, which I would not have voted for but for the very reason that we had an overflowing Treasury, and I thought it important to deplete the Treasury; but the submarine telegraph bill was one that I did not vote for.

Mr. PUGH. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought he did vote for it.

Mr. HUNTER. I will simply state that there have been Treasury note bills of October 12, 1837; of March 31, 1840; of February, 1841; of January, 1842; of August, 1842; of March, 1843; of July, 1846; of January, 1847; and they will all be found to conform, so far as the matter of form is concerned, with this. We have adhered to the old forms, because they seemed to have answered well in experience. I was afraid to depart from them; for that which has been proved by the experience of so many years to work well we ought to adhere to.

Mr. PUGH. I ask whether those notes were not, in point of fact, only circulated by special indorsements?

Mr. HUNTER. The notes could either be specially or generally indorsed. I believe, in point of fact, the indorsement was generally in blank.

Mr. PUGH. Why not require it to be special?

Mr. HUNTER. It was not required heretofore, because it was supposed that it might lead to embarrassment.

Mr. PUGH. The fact that our predecessors omitted to put in that safeguard is no reason why we should not put it in when we see its necessity.

Mr. KING. I shall vote for this amendment. I regard it as one of the best tests which have been presented here to determine whether this is a bill to bring money into the Treasury as a loan, or whether it is a bill to make a Treasury bank, and authorize the Treasury to issue paper for circulation. The first section of the bill authorizes the issue of notes of the denomination of fifty dollars. Now, there is nobody in the country who is going to come here with fifty dollars and lend it to the Government and take the Government's note for it. The moneys lent to the Government will be lent in larger sums. Fifty dollars is a convenient sum for paper for circulation. In my judgment, it would have been better for this country if there never had been a note under that denomination in circulation as money; but I think, of all the paper which is to circulate in this country as money, the worst is paper based on the credit and faith of the Government, and not upon coin. I would rather have the responsibility of individuals than that of the Government, because they are limited by the courts, and by their liability to be brought up by a stronger power than themselves, and when they become insolvent there is an end of them; but the Government has no end to its credit except an utter prostration like that which resulted from the issue of continental bills. The issue of Government paper does not require means; by a simple determination of the representative body, the Legislature, to increase the amount of their circulation, the capital of the bank can be doubled. It depends on the judgment and opinion of the legislative body; and I think that the most dangerous mode in which paper may be issued for circulation. It has been tried by most of the Governments of the world, and has failed.

The bill itself (if it were not that that is disclaimed on the part of the committee who brought it in) looks to me as if it had been framed for the purpose of establishing permanently a Treasury bank. That, at any rate, would be the result as I read the bill originally. The first section authorizes the issue of these notes in denominations of not less than fifty dollars, and pledges the faith of the Government for their redemption; and the tenth section authorizes them, as they are taken in by the Government, to be reissued constantly; and thus, as the bill was originally presented, there was permanent authority on the part of the Treasury to keep out this amount of $20,000,000 in all time.

Mr. HUNTER. I will say to the Senator from New York, that there was no intention to make it permanent, and it was supposed that this privilege would stop at the end of the year; but the moment it was suggested that it should be limited, we agreed to a limitation.

Mr. KING. That undoubtedly improves it; but I speak of the bill originally presented, and then the readiness of the gentleman to accept the proposition to limit it in time, confirmed the impression on my mind. What is this limitation in time? If the emergency which exists now shall exist at the end of the year, the breath of the majority can withdraw it, and they have the bill again in perpetuity.

My objections to this bill are the bank features of it; and I shall therefore, as I think I should under any circumstances with these provisions remaining in it, vote against this bill; but I will vote for this amendment, as I would for any other that I think would improve the measure. I was opposed to the old Bank of the United States, although it was in the hands of individuals; and yet I am free to say that if we are to have a bank, I doubt very much whether it would not be better that it were in the hands of individuals, and not have the credit of the Government complicated with it in any way. But I am opposed to any Bank of the United States, in any shape or form that issues paper. I am in favor of the Mint.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator from New York will find that this bill was framed on the model of the act of 1837, which was introduced by his distinguished predecessor and friend, Mr. Silas Wright; and he will find that this denomination of note was then introduced and has been adhered to since. However, I am not strenuous about it. If the Senate think the denomination of $100 better, let them strike out the $50.

Mr. KING. I will mention another difference between this bill and those formerly passed. I think most of the Treasury notes we have heretofore had were fundable, were convertible into stock. These are not. There may have been such notes heretofore; but I know those of 1847 were fundable into permanent stock, which was another feature that looked to the creation of a loan instead of the issue of paper for circulation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Briggs in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Wilson].

Several SENATORS, (to Mr. HUNTER.) Accept the amendment.

Mr. HUNTER. I am willing to accede to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PUGH. I now offer an amendment which will relieve the bill of difficulty. In the fourth line of the first section, after the word "notes," I move to insert "payable to order;" and in the second line of the fifth section, to strike out the words "assignment indorsed," and insert "special indorsement thereon;" and after the third line, to insert "and by subsequent special indorsement of each holder." The object is to prevent the circulation of this paper as currency, and to make it an investment. My amendment will require it to pass only by special indorsement.

Mr. HALE. I have been prepared, sir, throughout the whole of this debate, to vote for the bill, and to vote for it very much in the shape in which the chairman of the Committee on Finance might present it—not intending thereby to indorse the financial policy of the Government, nor to give pledges that I mean to vote for the estimates submitted; but as I have not believed that this was an appropriate time and place for discussions of that sort, I was going to take this remedy which had been presented by the chairman of the Committee on Finance very much as I used to take medicine when I was a sick boy. I opened my mouth and shut my eyes, and took just what the doctor said I wanted; and I look on the chairman of the Finance Committee (if he will excuse me) as the doctor. [Laughter.] The body-politic, no doubt, is sick, and this is the remedy he proposes. I am willing to take it, and I shall take it whether he puts the rate of interest at four or six per cent., and whether the amount be $10,000,000 or $20,000,000. I shall probably vote for it if this amendment be adopted; but I am free to say that this, to my mind, is an exceedingly objectionable amendment; and if any amendment could induce me to vote against the bill, this would induce me to do so, because I think it separates the measure entirely from that character of relief to the commercial community which may incidentally be given to it by a loan in the form in which the chairman of the Committee on Finance has presented it. It is the fact that, while it has a tendency to relieve the necessities of the Government in the shape in which he has presented it to us, it has also a tendency to relieve the necessities of the commercial community, which commends it to my judgment. If you strip the bill of this feature, you make it simply a relief for a distressed Government, ignoring entirely the fact that there are distresses in the commercial community.

Having said thus much simply in explanation of the vote which I shall give, which will probably be for the bill, I yield the floor.

Mr. HUNTER. If we adopt this amendment, it seems to me that it would be better to resort to a regular loan at once, for it destroys the whole theory of the Treasury note. If I understand it, the Treasury note is issued as a temporary expedient, as a means of making a temporary loan, because we can in this way borrow money at the lowest rate of interest, and on the cheapest terms to the Government. We can borrow money in this way on the cheapest terms to the Government, because, at the same time that the Government is bound to redeem the note with whatever interest is specified on its face, there is a demand for it in the way of exchange, and it circulates from hand to hand. If it be designed to prevent that, there is no difference between this and a regular loan, except that this is a loan for a short time, and the other would be for a longer term of years, perhaps. If we adopt the amendment, it seems to me it would be better to provide for a loan at once, because we destroy that which enables us to raise money more cheaply by Treasury notes than by a loan.

Mr. BAYARD. I think there is another objection to the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Ohio. It strikes me that it would work great injustice. By the sixth section of the bill, these Treasury notes are required to be received by the proper officers of the Government, in payment of all duties and taxes laid by the authority of the United States, and in payment of public lands, and all debts of the United States, of any character whatever.

If this proposition prevails, of necessity the title to one of these notes cannot pass except by special indorsement. A note is issued here, and it is tendered in California for the payment of duties, or in Illinois for the payment of lands, and the officer is bound to receive it if it is genuine. There may be a dozen special indorsements on it. He must take the hazard of the genuineness of every signature on the note. Will you put your officer in that situation? What means has he of ascertaining whether the indorsements are genuine? He can know and ought to know whether the signatures of the Register and Treasurer of the United States are genuine; but how is he to know the signatures of eight, ten, or twelve persons who may put special indorsements on the note? Yet, if this amendment be adopted, and he accepts a note with an indorsement that is not genuine, the result is that he is the loser; the party entitled to the note will have a right to demand payment; and the Government would not allow the amount of the second payment to the officer.

I do not think you ought to place your officers in that position. It is impossible for them to test the genuineness of the signatures presented to them. If you are to borrow money in this mode, the only true course is to suffer the note to pass by delivery, and I think it would be better to let it pass by delivery in the first instance by making it payable to bearer.

It is no sound objection to this bill that it proposes to issue a paper currency, as gentlemen allege. The object is to obtain a loan for a temporary purpose, based on the fact that we cannot yet ascertain whether the commercial convulsion which has reached this country and is now going through Europe, will so react that, in the course of the next six months or the next year, the Government will have from its ordinary revenues all the money it wants for current expenses and to redeem these notes without the necessity of a permanent loan. This is a temporary loan, and of course we should make it in that shape which will be most acceptable to the community and least embarrassing to the Government. You may, if you choose, call these Treasury notes "shin-plasters," in the language of the honorable Senator from Ohio; I care not. If we found it better to raise coupon bonds, payable in one year, surely that would be a perfectly appropriate mode of raising money. The question is whether the Government, in consequence of the commercial convulsion, is not in such a condition that it ought to have more funds in the Treasury to meet what is certainly not a permanent state of things. If we find that there is no reaction to increase the revenues of the country, of course we shall be obliged to resort to some other mode of filling the Treasury, either by direct taxation or by increased duties; and we shall be obliged also to cut down our expenditures; but we cannot do this on the instant.

I have said that as this money is wanted by the Government, we ought to borrow it on such terms as will be most acceptable to the community and cost us the least. That, I think, is accomplished by this bill. This is no adoption of the principle of a paper currency. We do not make these Treasury notes a tender in the payment of debts. We only say, that on account of the emergency, we will, for a temporary period, as we have often done before, issue promissory notes of the Government, payable in one year, at such a rate of interest as the community will take them at. Surely it is wisdom to put them in that form which will give them their highest value. Much as I am opposed, and I think I am quite as much opposed as the Senator from Ohio to a paper currency, strongly as I believe it would be better for us if no bank note, or Treasury note, or any other kind of note which could pass as money, were ever issued for a sum less than $100; yet, in this emergency, with a view to raising a loan, not looking at it as a permanent mode of raising revenue or contracting loans for this Government, I am willing to vote for this issue of Treasury notes. The power to issue them is limited to a single year. If, when Congress next assembles, or if during the present session, we find that there is no prospect of such a reaction in commercial affairs that the revenues of the country will, under our present laws, flow in to a sufficient amount to meet the engagements of the Government, we may then have to resort to a permanent loan; but we must have time to ascertain that. This convulsion, it seems to me, has come upon this country and upon Europe most unexpectedly, and there are now wide differences of opinion as to its causes, and as to its probable duration.

Under these circumstances, as the Government, by reason of this convulsion, has had its revenues cut short at once, what possible objection can there be to a temporary loan, when it is proposed to borrow the money which we need in the mode most acceptable to the community, and most likely to get us the money at the least cost? If you attach the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to this bill, the result will be, not only that your Treasury notes will not be so likely to command as high a value in the market; but further, you commit gross injustice in this respect: in order to give them increased value, you prescribe that the notes shall be receivable in payment of all debts due to the United States, and you place the receiving officer in such a position that you hold him bound to know the signature of every special indorsee, and you make him bear the burden of the loss, if any signature turns out not to be genuine; and yet it is morally impossible, in the transactions of business, that he can ascertain that fact with any certainty.

Mr. PUGH. I think the Senator from Delaware has furnished me with two or three additional, and, as it seems to my judgment, conclusive arguments in favor of the amendment. He says that the Government is now to issue paper money, or notes payable to order, indorsed in blank, and they might just as well be payable to bearer, for a note payable to order, and indorsed in blank, is payable to bearer.

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. PUGH. He says that we may issue them because we have not made them a legal tender. In strictness of phraseology among lawyers, we have not; but we have made them more nearly a legal tender than any bank note in the United States. You have on your statute-book a provision that a bank note shall not be received for a debt to the Government, but this shall. And yet does the mere fact that a bank note is not a legal tender prevent it from displacing the gold and silver coins of the country? It has displaced them, and the President urges us to suppress, by all the means in our power, the circulation of that denomination of bank paper which conflicts with the gold and silver coins of the denomination of twenty dollars and under. You have given them a significance which bank paper does not have, and yet you are now suffering, if the President be correct, under the evils of bank paper, and in eleven days from his recommendation, as the Senator from Illinois has said, you plunge headlong into a worse system than that which he condemns.

The Senator from Delaware tells us it will be necessary for the public officers to know the signatures of the indorsers; and, therefore, lest we should inconvenience them a little, lest we should put them to trouble, we should inconvenience all the people of the United States. Sir, I have been strongly impressed with the fact since I have been a member of Congress, that the convenience of the officers of this Government governs at the expense of the convenience of the people. There is no more danger of forgery of indorsement, if there are three or four indorsers, than if there is one. The bill already provides that there shall be one indorsement—the indorsement of the payee. Does not the public officer have to look to the genuineness of that? The argument against the amendment is of no more importance than if addressed to the original bill. Have you not provided safeguards, whereby the accounting officer can know from whom he takes the note? If there is a forged indorsement on it there is no payment; the remedy of the Government is just as good against the man who delivered it as before. You have required every man who pays one of these notes to put his name on the back of it, and if there is a forged indorsement behind him he continues liable on his own indorsement to the Government. There is not half so much danger if you require the indorsement of every holder, as there is if you require the simple indorsement of the payee alone.

But the Senator from Delaware has inaugurated a new feature in this debate. We are to enter on this system of paper money, because we do not know what is next to come. That is his proposition, in my humble judgment. I hardly think the honorable Senator saw the consequences to which it would lead. I understood my friend from Rhode Island, when he pronounced his panegyric on bank directors yesterday, to state that they were men responsible in substance and means, and when they put out a promissory note, they had some dim expectation of being compelled to pay it, and of providing the means of payment; but we are to issue our notes because we do not know whether we shall be able to pay them or not. That is the reason why we are to put them out. We are to put them out in the hope and expectation that in the course of the next twelve calendar months we shall find out whether we are able to pay them or not. Suppose we are not able to pay them; what then? Issue more? The same argument will be good then, and thus, at the end of the administration of Mr. Buchanan, we shall be where our continental fathers were when they put into the Constitution of the United States the provision for a gold and silver currency.

Having disposed of that, I propose to answer the argument of the Senator from Virginia, that it will not accommodate the Government, and that we might as well have a loan. So we might. We had better have a loan if we only had time to negotiate it; but the proposition is that we are in a hurry, and that we do not want to make this debt for a long time, not beyond a year, and therefore we take this form of security. We do not go to the expense and trouble of issuing bonds, but we make a short loan of twelve months. I understand that is what the bill is for. The Government wants to borrow money for twelve months, and instead of issuing a bond, which generally runs from ten to twenty or thirty years, we adopt this form of security as more readily available; but it will be just as good a loan, payable to order, as if the notes are payable to bearer. If you want it as a loan, it is your best form. The Senator from New York [Mr. KINC] has well said, that you will not find a man who wants to lend the Government fifty or one hundred dollars. Such a man does not come to your Government to lend money; but the man with a million comes. What does he want? He wants the investment; he wants the interest you are to pay; or he wants the note that he may sell it in the market as a bill of exchange, and realize a profit. He does not want to circulate it. The man who is ready to lend you money on fair terms wants your security as an investment, for the interest that is due on it, and for the fact that it can be used for the purposes of exchange. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. DAVIS] told us we wanted to get the money out of the stockings, to which the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. SIMMONS] alluded yesterday, where the old farmers' wives had put it; that there was lack of confidence, and that this confidence was to be all restored in twelve months, if you would give them something equivalent to a deposit, not something that they are to pass off from hand to hand.

Then the Senator from Virginia said these notes, if required to be indorsed specially, could not be available for the purposes of exchange. Does not the Senator know that every bill of exchange is indorsed? Certainly it is. The man who takes it wants the security of the indorser on it. For all the purposes of exchange, these notes, if indorsed, will answer as well as if they were payable to bearer; but there is one purpose which they will not answer, and that is the substance of the whole amendment. They will not answer the purpose of bank notes, and that is what I want to prevent. They will answer the purpose of a loan; they will answer the purpose of bills of exchange; but they will not answer for bank notes. If they are required to be indorsed, they will not go into circulation, because a bank note passes by delivery, being payable to bearer, or payable to order, and indorsed in blank.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] says he will vote against my amendment because it will not relieve the community. What relief does the community want? What relief can this Government give the community by issuing a parcel of irredeemable paper dollars? Will that relieve the community? It never yet relieved any community; it simply prolonged for the time the present unnatural state of affairs, when men who have exhausted their means are endeavoring to keep up their expenses without having resources sufficient to pay their debts. If you put this paper into circulation, and it goes into circulation as bank paper, instead of relieving the community it will make tenfold the distress through which we have lately passed.

I should like to know what the banks that are trying to resume specie payments are doing? They are trying to get the community to keep their paper out; for if the community do not keep their paper out the banks can never resume. If they come in every day with notes and demand specie, the banks might as well close. Yet we are to relieve the banks by putting into circulation that which every man will prefer to the bank note; and in order to get it he will run every bank note home and get specie on it, so as to invest it in Treasury notes. Why should he not? The bank note circulates within a certain number of miles of the place of payment; it circulates on the credit of the bank; it carries no interest. Your note carries interest; your note passes from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Will any man keep a bank note in his possession when he can demand specie for it, and with the specie can buy one of your $20,000,000 of Treasury notes? It seems to me the community would be relieved with a vengeance by such a system; that is, if the community intends to take bank paper. If you wish to drive all the bank paper out of existence—and I, for one, shall not complain of that at all—you will drive it out to the extent of your $20,000,000 of notes, or else you will make it a depreciated currency that will pass, not because of its solvency, but because men can get nothing else.

The old proposition comes back. The Senator from Virginia wants it, though he does not avow it, because he wishes it to make a circulating medium. The Senator from New Hampshire wants it because he wishes a circulating medium. Then I say it is worse than bank paper. There is no provision for its payment. It is a post note. Bank notes are payable on demand; these are payable twelve months after date. In all the history of banking—and I think I can appeal with confidence to the Senator from Rhode Island, for he gave us the benefit of his experience yesterday—have not our Legislatures been trying to prevent the issue of post notes by banks, and to compel them to issue paper payable on demand? But here is a post note, and no means for its payment.

I am among the youngest members of the Senate, and I do not profess any great amount of financial skill. All my pecuniary transactions unfortunately have been small; but it does appear to me as a most amazing proposition. If you want to issue paper money, call it paper money; issue it payable to bearer, and either levy a tax or provide a fund of some sort by which it can be kept in good credit, and let it be payable on demand.

Mr. SIMMONS. This morning, with the view of ascertaining the purposes contemplated by the Department and by the committee that introduced this bill, I inquired whether the notes were to pass from hand to hand by delivery, or by indorsement from holder to holder. It was suggested to me by the provisions of the bill that there was a difference between the $6,000,000 to be issued at once and the $14,000,000 to be issued on advertisement. I supposed that the $6,000,000 were to pass from hand to hand by delivery. I know there is a little delicacy on this point; I appreciate the "pinch" of those who make professions about hard money and want to evade the honest truth; I do not wish to expose them.

In striking out the provision for fifty dollar notes, you have destroyed the benefit of this issue as a currency to pass from hand to hand. If you restrict it to $100 notes, they will be a capital medium of exchange; and under the doctrine professed by those who propose this issue, that is the only legitimate use for which such a piece of paper ever ought to circulate. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] sought to correct the positions assumed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PUGH.] On his ground, he ought to have gone back of the bill itself, and required the notes to be drawn payable to bearer in the first place. If you mean to circulate this species of paper as a currency, holding the original holder as an indorser, when you know that the principal cannot be sued, it is a fraud on the public. If I indorse one of these Treasury notes, may I not be sued on that indorsement? But the principal, the Government that issues the notes, cannot be sued. If you mean to make this paper a currency, do not, in God's name, do so by committing a fraud on the man who first takes it and indorses it; but if you mean to make it a medium of exchange, let every man who holds it be able to trace its course through the country, and be holden as every man is who takes an ordinary bill of exchange. If, however, you are to allow six per cent. interest, it is inconsistent with any notion of currency or exchange, and then you ought to have a regular loan. If you mean to pay six per cent. why not offer it in the shape of a loan, and then you can get a premium for it? The Senator from Ohio says I made a panegyric on bank directors. Thank God, I never made a panegyric on note shavers; and this is the worst species of note shaving I ever heard of—holding the innocent indorser liable, and letting the principal go free.

I have no disposition to throw the least embarrassment in the way of the Treasury. All I ask is that the Senator from Virginia will state frankly to us what he wants, and let us put it in a form that will be consistent, if not with Democratic doctrines, at least with commercial doctrines, with the notions of mankind, with honest doctrines, and then I will vote for your bill. But you have insisted, by a vote on the yeas and nays, upon having six per cent. interest on these notes. Then require them to be indorsed, and let them pass as a medium of exchange. In that way, they may do some good. I must say, however, that I do not see how any man in the western country is to use them for purposes of remittance. They will be paid out here at the Treasury; and how are they going to get west of the mountains? That is my trouble. I want to get them over there, so that our western friends can remit them here and relieve themselves of the premium on exchange.

I say, that for this Government to offer to a man a Treasury note payable a year ahead, and oblige him to indorse it in order to give it currency, when they know that the holder has no legal remedy against them, is a fraud on the public, provided the notes are to be used as a circulating medium; but if you are to use these notes for purposes of exchange, the case is somewhat different. If the Senator from Virginia will agree to restrict the bill to the issuing of $5,000,000 Treasury notes, payable to bearer, I shall not object to it. I must confess that that appears to me to be what is really intended, and I am sorry to see that scarcely any man has the courage to avow it except the honorable Senator from Ohio. I do not care anything about law; but when a man rises here and makes an honest proposition, I will go with him to the death.

If these notes are to be useful to the community, such of them as are intended to circulate from hand to hand ought to be made payable to bearer, resting on the naked promise of the Government; and such of them as would be more convenient to the community, and no less available to the Treasury, as a medium of exchange, ought to be indorsed by each holder; and when they come back to the Treasury, let them be treated as the Bank of England treats her notes when she gets them—let them be stamped and never issued again, and a record kept of each issue and reissue. I shall not go into the accounts as to how much may be wanted for this hand-to-hand circulation; if only five or six million dollars are asked for that purpose, temporarily, I shall not object to it. I am astonished that gentlemen should be so much alarmed as to the probable result of this experiment that they will do nothing for the relief of the community, holding themselves as much aloof from the people as if this Government was wielded by the Autocrat of the Russias. I do not say that the Government of the United States has lost its honest heart, but it acts very much like those money lenders of whom I spoke yesterday.

I am so desirous to accommodate, that I am willing, on this occasion, to forego a little sound doctrine about currency, especially Government currency; but the Senator from Virginia insists on having six per cent. for these notes, and leaving large discretionary power in the hands of a Government that has changed its policy twice in a week. I do not believe in any such discretion. Let the House of Representatives and the Senate prescribe the mode of issuing this paper. I will not throw a straw in the way of making it as useful to the public as possible; but do not hold the individual indorsers when the Government is not held responsible. If these notes are to be used as a medium of exchange, I do not see any inconvenience that is to result from holding the receiving officers responsible for paying the notes to the right parties.

There is always great propriety in conforming our action to the public sentiment of the country. The President of this Republic, recently elected, undertakes to denounce the currency which the people are obliged to use, and which they were very glad to get when it was irredeemable, and he proposes in its place a worse one. This is a woeful blow not only at consistency, but at moral honesty. The people now have not a currency which is really payable in coin, but they have the legal means of enforcing payment. No State in the Union has interposed a solitary obstacle between the debtor and the creditor on bank paper. You can sue a bank for a dollar note in a justice's court any day, and recover a dollar in silver or gold, and half a dollar for costs besides.

Mr. PUGH. They beat us on executions generally.

Mr. SIMMONS. The banks?

Mr. PUGH. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish you would hand me an execution against one of them. If I happened to owe them anything, I could use it as a set-off.

I want the Senator from Virginia to make this bill such as will suit the Administration. I am sorry that he insists on having it so large. I have proposed, with the greatest disposition to accommodate, a means for the relief of the community, to travel side by side with this relief to the Government; but I have not yet drawn from him any public expression on the subject. Every man with whom I have spoken admits the existence of frauds on the revenue; and I have proposed to insert in this bill a provision to guard against them, to go alongside his penal enactments, for the man who may undertake to counterfeit one of these notes. The Senator says my proposition will involve a great many questions; and he does not wish to be embarrassed with anything but getting money into the Government's hands.

I know that those who expect to derive benefit from a measure, do not wish anything else to be connected with it.

I shall vote for this amendment, because it will make this paper better for purposes of exchange than currency, especially now that the notes are restricted to $100. Then, I think we ought to insert a provision that, when one of these notes returns to the Treasury, it shall never be reissued in that specific piece of paper; but a substitute may be issued. I do not mean to embarrass the Treasury; but I have no idea of holding all the world as indorsers, and having forty suits on a single piece of paper.

Mr. DAVIS. I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, for the simple reason that I concur in the propriety of meeting that which has been treated as objectionable. I wish to prevent these notes from circulating as money; to strip them, as far as possible, of the character of bank notes; to make them investments which will be sought for by those persons who now hold specie, and, from want of confidence, hoard it and guard it as treasure; and to have them circulate, as bills of exchange do, by special assignment.

I do not fear that there will be any special difficulty in the public officers determining whether the successive indorsements are valid or not, because, in the first place, I believe the indorsements will be few, and the best custodian of the validity of the indorsement will be him who holds the note; but occasionally it may occur that this Treasury note will fall into hands surreptitiously, and may be presented and paid when fraudulently presented; but that will be an extraordinary case for which we can provide after it occurs. I prefer to encounter that hazard rather than make this Government the issuer of a paper currency. I believe there is money enough in the country—and when I say money, I mean gold and silver—to answer all the wants of commerce. It only requires to be thrown into circulation, and, as I said before, it only requires something which will command the confidence of those who are now hoarding it, to bring it out and give the public the advantage of it. The Government needs this money, I take it for granted, from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and from the estimates of the able chairman of the Committee on Finance, and therefore I am willing to vote it in the form of a loan; otherwise I cannot vote for the bill.

I hold this broad distinction between Government banking and banking by individuals; every individual within a State, but for statutory provision, might issue his promissory note; any two individuals associated together as a firm, might use their promissory note, and those notes might circulate with everybody who would receive them. They might have them engraved, and assume the form of bank notes. The only objection or difficulty to this, is constituted by the statutory provisions against individuals issuing such promissory notes. All that exists in a bank charter is merely relieving the individual or corporation from that statutory prohibition; and hence it is not, as so often asserted, a State issuing bills of credit, or authorizing another to do that which it cannot perform itself. It is merely permitting an individual or corporation to use that credit which he or it may enjoy among the community where he lives.

Against paper money issued by the Federal Government, I would raise my protest in every form. It was not contemplated by our fathers, who were a hard-money race. The men who instituted this Government, gave to Congress power to borrow money. This is one form of borrowing money, or otherwise I would not vote for it. Make it in any degree an issuance of paper money by the Federal Government to circulate throughout the country, and I would vote against it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PUGH.]

Mr. TRUMBULL called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 14, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Clay, Collamer, Davis, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Hamlin, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Pugh, Simmons, Trumbull, and Wade—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Broderick, Clark, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Green, Hale, Harlan, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Reid, Seward, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Wilson, and Wright—30.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PUGH. After this vote I ask the Senator from Virginia to accept the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island, to strike out the fourth section of the bill, and thus make the notes payable to the bearers. It is a manifest injustice to hold the bearer responsible for the indorser, for if the Government will not pay, he is liable for the amount. I cannot make the motion myself, because I cannot vote for the bill; but I hope the Senator will strike out that section.

Mr. HUNTER. I prefer to keep the bill in the same form in which it has been since 1837 to this time—the form approved by experience. I have not heard of any injustice being occasioned by it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. If there are no other amendments to be offered by the opponents of the bill, I will offer one or two as a friend of the bill, and by way of perfecting it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. SIMMONS] laid upon the table certain amendments, which he said he would call up at the proper time.

Mr. HALE. I do not believe that time has come yet. [Laughter.]

Mr. BENJAMIN. Section twelve of the bill is intended to punish counterfeiting. After the word "counterfeited," in the ninth line of that section, I move to insert the following words:

Or shall falsely alter or cause, or procure to be falsely altered, or willingly aid, or assist in falsely altering any Treasury note issued as aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENJAMIN. In line ten of the same section, after the word "publish," I move to insert the words "or attempt to pass, utter, or publish." The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENJAMIN. In the ninth line of the twelfth section, after the word "falsely," the word "made" is left out in the printed bill. I move that it be inserted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask the Senator from Virginia whether he intends to have these notes re-issued?

Mr. HUNTER. Under the bill, the operation of which is limited to a year, it is provided that when these notes come in they shall not be re-issued, but new ones may be put out in their places.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what I wanted to know.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time. It was read the third time; and on the question, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. TRUMBULL called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll. When his name was called,

Mr. BRODERICK said: I have voted steadily with the friends of this bill against all amendments offered by Senators on the other side of the Chamber, and I regret that I cannot now vote for it. Considering it to be in direct violation of the sub-Treasury act, I must record my vote against it.

Mr. IVERSON. I desire to give notice that as soon as this bill is disposed of I shall ask that the joint resolution regulating the pay of members of Congress be taken up and passed to-night. I trust Senators will not leave the Hall, therefore, before the passage of that resolution.

The result of the vote was then announced—yeas 31, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Clay, Crittenden, Douglas, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Green, Hale, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Reid, Sebastian, Seward, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Wilson, and Wright—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Hamlin, Harlan, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Pugh, Simmons, Trumbull, and Wade—18.

So the bill was passed.

PAY OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

On motion of Mr. IVERSON, the joint resolution (No. 2) from the House of Representatives to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the compensation of members of Congress," approved August 16, 1856, was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. IVERSON. I do not propose to make any remarks on this joint resolution. I presume it is not necessary to refer it, as it will not require the action of any committee whatever. Senators are all familiar with the defect which this joint resolution proposes to remedy. I propose, therefore, that it be, at once, put on its passage.

Mr. BAYARD. I move the reference of the joint resolution. If my single objection will prevent its passage to-night, I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the joint resolution will be read a second time with a view to reference.

The joint resolution was read a second time.

Mr. BAYARD. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. IVERSON. I hope that motion will not prevail.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution lies on the table, the Senate having refused to refer, and objection being made to its passage.

Mr. STUART. No, sir; the Chair is mistaken. It is in the power of the Senate to take up any bill or joint resolution, and act upon it at any time.

Mr. DAVIS. By unanimous consent.

Mr. STUART. No; a majority of the Senate can do it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution has been read twice, and it requires unanimous consent to read it a third time on the same day.

Mr. BROWN. If it has been read twice, it is under consideration, of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Delaware object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BAYARD. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then, under the rules, it cannot be considered.

Mr. BROWN. I suggest to the Chair that, after its first reading, the Senator may object to its second reading; but if it is passed to a second reading, then the question is upon its reference; and if the Senate refuses to refer it, the joint resolution comes before the Senate for action.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not see how that can be. The joint resolution cannot be read three times on the same day, except by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The only question is, whether it can be ordered to be read a third time after an objection has been made. A bill or joint resolution cannot be read three times in one day, under the rule, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BROWN. The Senate can order it to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. PUGH. I move that the Senate adjourn. Senators will debate this matter until Monday morning.

Mr. IVERSON. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion, so as to allow me an opportunity of giving the reason why it is necessary to act on this resolution this evening.

Mr. PUGH. I am not prepared to vote on it.

Mr. IVERSON. The reason is simply this: I am informed that several members of the other House desire to leave here on Monday for their homes, and they wish to get this money before they leave. It is important for them to get it; and for their convenience I urge the passage of this joint resolution to-night.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio withdraw his motion to adjourn?

Mr. PUGH. I do not care to press it, but I do not believe we shall have a vote on this question to-night.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear it read. I have not heard it read yet.

Mr. BENJAMIN. It is evident that this resolution cannot pass this evening; I therefore renew the motion to adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 16, noes 24.

Mr. STUART. I hope we shall now order the bill to a third reading.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand that this is a joint resolution to alter the law passed at the last Congress, in relation to the compensation of members of Congress. There are certain facts which should not be overlooked in connection with this measure. During the recess of Congress several members of the Senate, and also of the House of Representatives, have died, and I understand that no provision is made as to their compensation. When this measure comes up for consideration it should be perfected, so that it will be perfect in its form and be made to reach those cases which have arisen. I am not prepared with an amendment to offer, nor do I insist upon taking up time by speaking on it. If a majority of the Senate are in favor of its passage, I do not desire to delay action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read it. It directs that the compensation allowed to members of Congress, by the act entitled "An act to regulate the compensation of members of Congress," approved August 16, 1856, be paid in the following manner: On the first day of the first session of Congress, or as soon afterward as he may be in attendance and apply, each Senator, Representative, and Delegate is to receive mileage as now provided by law; and all his compensation from the beginning of his term, to be computed at the rate of $250 a month, and during the session, compensation at the same rate; and, on the first day of the second, or any subsequent session, he is to receive his mileage as now allowed by law; and all compensation which has accrued during the adjournment at the same rate.

Mr. BAYARD. I will state as briefly as I can the effect of this resolution. The convictions on my mind are clear that we ought not to pass such a bill or resolution under any circumstances, and I will give one objection, at least, which I think it will be difficult to answer.

Under the former compensation law, we received eight dollars per day, and the increased compensation, by the act of last year, speaking in general terms, doubled that pay; but Congress provided that the increased compensation should only be paid at the end of each session. That is the provision of the bill, as it stands. The effect of the present resolution is to make the pay come at the beginning of the session. Now, I want to show where I think it will work great injustice and corruption, if I may use the term. I think no milder word would apply to the case. The object for which the law was framed, of giving to each member his pay, on the same footing, no matter whether he was elected or not at the commencement of the term, is all perfectly right; to that I do not object; that is, whether a member was elected before his term commenced, or in the months of November or August last. You may, if you please, say he is entitled to pay from the month of March, 1857; though in point of fact, if a session of Congress had been called into existence, he would not have been able to perform the duties. I do not object to that. In the form of our Confederacy it is necessary to equalize pay in that respect.

What is the effect of this joint resolution? That in many cases you give pay to a person who was not in existence, to perform the duty, and to others who were never called on to perform the duty; you put them in the position that on the first day of the session they are to receive pay for arrears, as they are called, that have accrued; when, in point of fact, there may have been no valid election. In case of a contested election, there cannot be two persons entitled to the same seat. Where two persons claim to be entitled to a seat, and one presents himself with the credentials, that is prima facie evidence that he is entitled to a seat. If this amendment to the compensation law be made, he is entitled to get his full pay when sworn in, and then, if he is unseated, his successor can do the same thing. That is not right. I know the old usage of Congress was—and that practice was fair and right enough—that the member should be paid until he was unseated. Of course, he was fairly entitled to his per diem from the day he attended until the day he was unseated; and in courtesy (I suppose under some sort of a notion that it was right to give an opportunity to contestants, without too great an expense to them, to contest seats) both the House of Representatives and the Senate used to vote that the contestant should be paid mileage and per diem out of the contingent fund during the period of time he was in attendance. The operation of this joint resolution would be to give to a member whose seat is contested not a certain amount for the time he was a member of Congress, if he was unseated, and therefore never validly elected, but to give to each member who gets returned a bonus of some nine months' pay to which he was never entitled, for he has not been a member; and then you have to pay the same money over again to the person validly elected to the seat. That is the necessary result. I cannot pause now to say whether that could be obviated by a different language. The suggestion was made to me when I spoke of that objection to a gentleman, that we could provide, in the case of a contested seat, that the parties should not receive pay. That would be unjust, for if a member's seat is contested, and he is entitled to it, he ought to stand upon the same footing as every other member of Congress.

Again, there is no particular time limited. This resolution is to operate on the first day of the session. It would be almost impossible to find then whether a seat was contested or not. Under this resolution, as proposed to be passed, you give to a man who was never a member of the Senate or House of Representatives by any valid election, pay, not for the time he is in attendance, but you give him under the name of arrears, which cannot accrue if he never was a member, nine months' pay. I cannot vote for such a bill on any such ground. I like to have my pay, perhaps, as soon as any man, but that is a question which I do not think I am at liberty to look at. The individual conveniences of myself and others should not be consulted.

I think this measure will lead to corruption if it be passed; and I hope, if it should be passed, that the President will veto it, for it is intrinsically wrong in itself. The effect will be to pay double to one person who is entitled, because whenever he is sworn in he will be entitled beyond all question; and if the contestant succeeds, you pay a man who was never validly elected to the seat, for a period of time during which he never could render service, or be called on to render service. I am opposed to the joint resolution entirely, and I have given my reason for it. All I shall insist on is that the yeas and nays be taken on its passage. I wish to record my vote against it.

Mr. MASON. The Senator from Delaware speaks with a very confident opinion. No man is better entitled, from his general intelligence and his ability as a lawyer, to do so; but I suppose Senators may be allowed to differ with him in his construction of the law.

Now, sir, I could not vote for that resolution at this time of the evening if I were not satisfied, in my own judgment, that the Senator from Delaware is utterly wrong in his construction of the compensation act. He assumes that the compensation law of last session prescribed that this arrearage of compensation should not be paid until the end of the session. I differ with him. I do not mean to say that the first section of it is clear, by any means. None can read that bill without seeing that it was either drawn with a very hurried pen, or by an unskillful penman. But, as far as my judgment is involved, while I think that that first section admits of no clear construction, the best construction I can place upon it is that, under the law, the compensation is payable on the first day of the session.

What is this joint resolution? Why, if that construction of the compensation law be right, it is a mere declaratory statute, nothing more. If it were to introduce a new principle into this compensation law, I would be ready, as suggested by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] to review the whole ground, and see if any cases have been omitted. I am satisfied cases have been omitted, and that cases have not been acted on which ought to have been entertained and received, and which will be no doubt in a proposition for a general revision of that law. The reason why I rose, was merely to say that the confident opinion expressed by the honorable Senator from Delaware, that the first section of that bill admits of no other construction than that this money is payable only at the end of the session, is not participated in by at least one Senator.

Now I mean to say further, as I read that first section, that the compensation is due on the first day of the session. I submit it to the intelligence of Senators, whether lawyers or not, whether, in common sense, it is not payable on that day; and although it may be that a debt that is due is not payable, yet it devolves upon those who say it is not payable to show clearly where it is deferred and the time to which it is deferred. I say that upon the construction of that first section there is no contingency that can happen in human affairs which would divest the right of payment of the debt. Death will not, resignation will not do it.

The honorable Senator says there is a contingency, and that that contingency is where there may be a contested seat. Suppose there is a contested seat: the sitting member is the member, and is so admitted in all parliamentary law. Can he not vote? Can he not govern the legislation of the country by his vote? And yet, says the honorable Senator, a member whose seat is contested ought not to be entitled to the payment which the law prescribes, lest his seat should be vacated. I say that that is no contingency. The sitting member, although his seat is contested, is a member de jure et de facto, invested with all the rights, privileges, and emoluments, that belong to the place; and none can doubt it. It may be, for all I know, after a sitting member has been ousted in any case, that the Senate or House of Representatives, in its liberality or justice, may compensate him for the loss of his time, and also the member who was not sitting at the time, until it was decided.

I have thought it due to myself to say what I have said, because, when I first read that law I agreed with the opinions of the honorable Senator from Delaware, and told gentlemen around me that that was my construction; but I found a different opinion prevailed, and I felt called upon to look at the law closely, and I am satisfied, as far as my judgment goes—I do not speak with confidence—that the best construction which can be placed on that first section, although it is not clear, is that the money is payable now. I am perfectly indifferent whether it is paid or not.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I wish to offer an amendment to this joint resolution different from any which has yet been proposed, and I know it is one that will lead to debate. I am certain that we are to have a long debate if we attempt to go on with this subject now. There are amendments which I think justice requires should be made to this bill, and as we have not time to consider them now, having been so ardently engaged all day, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the Senator to withdraw the motion for a moment.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I withdraw it for the present.

Mr. BAYARD. I only wish to say that the honorable Senator from Virginia is perfectly at liberty to lecture me. I want to state the reason why I assumed that to be the construction of the law. I supposed the House of Representatives would not think it necessary to legislate in order to enable them to do that which they could do under the law. I therefore assumed that the House of Representatives, in passing such a bill, necessarily supposed that that legislation was requisite, and that, agreeing with my own construction, I stated it confidently. If we come to the construction of the other law, I shall not be quite so confident when I find the opinion of the honorable Senator from Virginia opposed to mine, though my convictions are strong, and I shall endeavor to sustain them, in order to show that he is in error in the construction of that law.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from Illinois gives us notice that he has amendments to offer which are going to give rise to a long debate. I think that is taking the advantage of the rest of us. He has his amendments fixed in his own mind, and his speech prepared. If we are going to adjourn over on these amendments, he should let us know what they are, in order that we may prepare our speeches. Can he not give us a little inkling of them?

Mr. DOUGLAS. With the greatest pleasure. The amendment that I suggested would lead to debate is this: the special session was convened on the 4th of March for the purpose of confirming the Cabinet, and other executive business. Of the new members summoned to that session, some came from California, and from the different parts and extremes of the country, and traveled here and back without any pay for that service. I think the law should be changed so that the new members who came on here especially for that session should receive their mileage for coming and returning. This provision is not to apply to old members of the Senate, or to give double pay, but will only allow pay to those who came here from their homes for the purpose of attending that session and returned after the adjournment. It was with that view that I wished to move an amendment. I have no speech to make on it, but I am certain it will lead to debate; and for that reason I move the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and at six and a half o'clock, p. m., the Senate adjourned to Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, December 19, 1857.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER stated the business first in order to be the call of committees for reports:

Mr. BENNETT. Does not the resolution which I introduced yesterday come up first this morning?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

The call of committees was continued.

Mr. GROW. I would suggest to the House that we commence the call for States where it was left off yesterday, and that we finish that call, in order that we may get business before the committees.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. Reports are in order from the Committee of Ways and Means.

CHAPLAINS TO CONGRESS.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. I desire to offer a resolution in reference to the execution of the order passed the other day relating to the clergymen of this city opening the House by prayer. I observe that the House was opened to-day without prayer. I suppose there will be no objection to the resolution. I understand the clergymen are laboring under some embarrassment, which I desire to remove.

Mr. GROW. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. Let the resolution be reported, and I think the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Objection was not withdrawn, and the call of committees was continued.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I suppose that there are very few committees ready to report. I therefore move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was not agreed to.

JOHN HAMILTON.

Mr. STANTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of John Hamilton; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LETCHER. Is there a report accompanying that bill?

Mr. STANTON. A report was made last Congress.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, I hope that that report will be printed with the bill, so that when the bill comes up we may have an opportunity of knowing something about it.

Mr. STANTON. Add to the motion, that the report from the Committee of Claims of last session be printed.

It was so ordered.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The call of committees being concluded—

The SPEAKER announced the call of States for resolutions next in order; and that the question recurred on the following resolution, offered yesterday by Mr. BENNETT, when his State was called for resolutions:

Resolved, That a select committee of — be appointed by the Speaker to take into consideration all such petitions and matters relating to the construction of roads, railroads, or telegraph lines to the Pacific ocean, as shall be referred to them by the House.

The pending question being on the motion of Mr. BARKSDALE to lay the resolution on the table, Mr. BOCKOCK called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 94, nays 96; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Barksdale, Bishop, Bockock, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Caskey, Chapman, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cox, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, English, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gillis, Gilmer, Goode, Greenwood, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Horton, Houston, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Lamar, Letcher, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miles, Miller, Millson, Montgomery, Moore, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Peyton, Powell, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Savage, Seales, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, James A. Stewart, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Underwood, Ward, Warren, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, John V. Wright, and Zolliecoffer—94.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Arnold, Avery, Banks, Bennett, Billingham, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, James Craig, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dodd, Durfee, Fenton, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Goodwin, Granger, Gregg, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Howard, Hughes, Kellogg, Kelsey, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Phelps, Pike, Potter, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Sandidge, Scott, Seward, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburne, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Watkins, Wilson, and Augustus R. Wright—96.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

Pending the vote—

Mr. FLORENCE stated that his colleague, Mr. PHILLIPS, was still detained from the House by sickness.

The question recurred on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. COBB. I desire to appeal to my colleague on the Committee on Public Lands to withdraw the call for the previous question, in order that I may offer an amendment.

Mr. BENNETT. The gentleman appeals to me to withdraw the call for the previous question, his object being, as I understand, to amend the resolution so as to have the subject referred to the Committee on Public Lands. Now, I have no objection to withdraw—

Mr. BRANCH. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman from New York, as I understand it, withdraws his demand for the previous question.

Mr. BENNETT. My friends around me say I had better not withdraw the demand. It will involve the necessity of taking two votes instead of one.

Mr. FLORENCE. I rise to a privileged motion. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to—yeas 47, nays 113.

Mr. HUGHES. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to lay the resolution on the table. I voted with the majority, and have therefore the right to make the motion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is that motion in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is in order.

Mr. MILLSON. I would suggest that the motion is not in order, for this reason: It is competent for the gentleman from Indiana again to move to lay the resolution on the table; and to reconsider a vote already taken on the motion would involve the necessity of two votes of the House instead of one.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would hold that a second motion to lay on the table while the resolution was in the same legislative condition, could not be entertained.

Mr. MILLSON. A vote on the motion to adjourn has intervened.

The SPEAKER. But the legislative condition of the resolution remains the same.

Mr. STANTON. Can a motion to reconsider be entertained while a demand for the previous question is pending?

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider may be entertained and put while the previous question is pending, but of course it is not debatable. Indeed, a motion to reconsider a motion to lay on the table would not at any time be debatable.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair. If the House refuses to second the demand for the previous question, will not the resolution then be open to amendment and debate; and if any gentleman proposes to debate it, will it not then go over indefinitely?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The Chair has heard the inquiry of the gentleman from Tennessee, with a view of answering it in good faith.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Do I understand the Chair to entertain the motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does entertain the motion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Does not the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table carry the resolution with it?

The SPEAKER. It does not, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 95, nays 105; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson, Andrews, Banks, Bennett, Billingham, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. So the motion to reconsider was not laid on the table.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I rise to appeal to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNETT] to withdraw the demand for the previous question, and allow me to offer a substitute for his resolution, which, I think, will be satisfactory to the House.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is the motion to reconsider the vote refusing to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Is it not in order, at this stage of proceedings, for the gentleman from New York to withdraw his demand for the previous question, and allow me to offer a substitute?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The motion to lay on the table would intervene and prevent the gentleman from offering his substitute.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has expired.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to—yeas 102, nays 86. So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PHILLIPS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of

THE TREASURY NOTE BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee was last in session it had before it for consideration House bill No. 4, to authorize the issue of Treasury notes. The bill has been read through, and is now open for amendment and discussion.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to detain the committee at any length. This bill proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue notes to the amount of $20,000,000—

Mr. BARKSDALE. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania design to press the bill to a vote to-day?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I shall be glad if the House will take a vote on the bill to-day. I will occupy only a few moments, for the bill requires only a word or two of explanation. It is similar in its provisions to bills which were passed by Congress at different periods of time, beginning with the year 1833. It is similar to the bill of 1847, with perhaps two exceptions. That bill provided for the funding of the Treasury notes. This bill omits that provision; so that the Treasury notes issued under this bill cannot at any time be funded. They are made payable in one year.

It is proposed by this bill, that $6,000,000 of these notes may be issued immediately by the Secretary of the Treasury at a rate of interest to be fixed by himself, limiting him not to exceed, however, six per cent. per annum. The balance of the $20,000,000 is to be advertised for bids, and is to be given to the bidders of the lowest rate of interest, the maximum here being also fixed at six per centum. These are the only features of this bill that contradistinguish it from the acts of 1833, 1837, 1847, and others, which I do not just now recollect. These, then, being its only peculiarities, I am not required to make any lengthy explanation. The act of 1837, if my memory serves me, was passed when the Whig party was in power, and the act of 1847 when the Democratic party was in power. I alluded to this merely to show the committee that this bill is a mere transcript of the bills passed by these parties when they were in power, and resorted to this mode of raising a loan.

The Secretary of the Treasury has addressed a letter to the Committee of Ways and Means, which will explain the bill, perhaps, much better than I could, and in fewer words.

It has been said that it is strange this issue of Treasury notes should be asked when the report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows an estimate of a balance of half a million in the Treasury at the expiration of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858; but it must be remembered that the estimates of that report are made on the ground that the receipts, from customs, will be the same as in ordinary years. Nothing has occurred to change the estimate referred to, unless it be the diminished consumption of the country. One fact is apparent, that there is now $28,000,000 of goods in the bonded warehouses; and if those goods be brought into market, they will pay into the Treasury some six million dollars. But the anticipation now is, that these goods may remain in the Government's bonded warehouses for some years. The necessity for this measure does not arise so much from an empty Treasury, for there is in its vaults an available balance of $6,000,000; but we are in such condition that there is no telling at what day the Treasury may be exhausted by some sudden change, some contingency or other, like a cutting off of imports, or bonding those which do arrive in the country. The Secretary of the Treasury must not be understood as saying that the Treasury is exhausted, and that this money is wanted for the ordinary expenditures of the Government; but as wishing that $20,000,000 of Treasury notes, at the lowest rate of interest, may be placed at his disposal, to be used when circumstances may require them.

The bill, as reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, omits a portion of the fourth section; and as I consider that portion important to make this bill efficient and available when it becomes a law, I shall ask for its restoration. A portion of a clause in the fourth section of the Senate bill has been stricken out by the Committee of Ways and Means, and I will explain to the committee what it is. In the first place, it is to be found in every Treasury note bill that has ever been passed by Congress, so far as I have been able to ascertain. I will read the clause, and then the committee will understand what it is. It is in section four, which reads:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, with the approbation of the President, [then comes the clause which has been stricken out,] to cause such portion of said Treasury notes as may be deemed expedient to be issued by the Treasurer in payment of warrants in favor of public creditors, or other persons lawfully entitled to such payment who may choose to receive such notes in payment at par; and the Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized, with the approbation of the President, &c.

That clause, sir, has been stricken out by the Committee of Ways and Means, or by the majority of the committee. I desire to have it restored. It has always been in all former bills. The Department is authorized by this bill, if it becomes a law, to avail itself of $6,000,000 immediately, and this clause enables them to use these Treasury notes for the payment of the creditors of the Government. It does not become necessary to negotiate their loan. The clause merely authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue these notes to its disbursing officers for the payment of the debts of the Government; and that would facilitate, at this particular crisis, very much the movements of the Treasury Department in the issue of this money.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I will ask the Clerk to read a letter which has been addressed by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Committee of Ways and Means, and which sufficiently explains itself.

The letter was read, and is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 15, 1857.

SIR: In my annual report to Congress of the 8th instant, an explanation of the causes which would lead to the necessity of supplying the Treasury with the means of promptly meeting the lawful claims upon it was given. I stated that "such provision should be made at the earliest practicable period, as a failure of sufficient means in the Treasury may occur at an early day."

At the time I prepared that statement, the weekly expenditures were exceeding the receipts to an extent that induced the opinion thus given. While the estimated amount of importations justified the conclusion that the revenue for the present year might be sufficient to meet the wants of the Government, yet the actual receipts into the Treasury in time to provide for the wants of the public service were dependent, not on the amount of merchandise imported, but the portion entered for consumption. At this time there is held in warehouse, in the city of New York alone, merchandise subject to duty exceeding twenty-eight million dollars in value, on which, when entered for consumption, duties must be paid to the amount of more than six million dollars.

The period when such payment of duty will be made may be influenced by so many circumstances, that the public credit should not be hazarded upon the contingency of its happening in time to meet the liabilities which we know must be provided for at an early day.

The amount now in the Treasury subject to draft is considerably less than six million dollars. When we reflect that balances must be kept in the hands of public officers in every part of the United States, by whom drafts are required to be paid, it will be readily perceived that the fiscal operations of the Government cannot be carried on with convenience and security with a less sum in the Treasury. The excess of the expenditures over the receipts is daily reducing this balance. I have been compelled to withdraw from the Mint and its branches the amount usually kept there for the purpose of facilitating the conversion of bullion into coin for the benefit of depositors. Such withdrawal necessarily occasions an inconvenience to the commercial community which should be obviated whenever it shall become practicable to do so.

It is proper to state that, in addition to the ordinary current demands on the Treasury, the sum of $723,632 29 must be paid on the 1st of January next for interest on the public debt.

In view of this state of things, I have the honor to ask your attention to the recommendation in my annual report that authority be given by law to issue Treasury notes. I think it important that Congress should act at once on the subject, that the necessary arrangements may be made by the 1st day of January to meet such public liabilities as become payable at and before that time, and which cannot be longer postponed.

Though the amount of $20,000,000 will not, in all probability, be needed at an early day, if at all, yet it is deemed best that the Department be authorized to issue and keep out that sum, should it be required by the public service. The rate of interest, for manifest reasons, should be left discretionary with the Department, subject to the approval of the President, but not to exceed six per centum per annum.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

HOWELL COBB,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. J. GLANCY JONES, Chairman of Committee of Ways and Means, House of Representatives.

MR. RITCHIE. I desire to call the attention of the committee to a circumstance which seems to me to make it rather doubtful whether the Administration desires, after all, to have this bill passed. In the message of the President of the United States, dated the 8th of December, I find this remark on the first page:

"Under these circumstances, a loan may be required before the close of your present session."

On the seventh page, I find this remark:

"Thanks to the Independent Treasury, the Government has not suspended payment, as it was compelled to do by the failure of the banks in 1837. It will continue to discharge its liabilities to the people in gold and silver. Its disbursements in coin will pass into circulation, and materially assist in restoring a sound currency. From its high credit, should we be compelled to make a temporary loan, it can be effected on advantageous terms."

So says the President. He contemplates nothing but the use of gold and silver; and if he has not enough of that in the Treasury, he intends to borrow it. This message of the President—and I suppose he speaks for the whole Administration—is dated on the 8th day of December. But here is the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, bearing date on the same day as the message of the President, in which he says that he is going to use nothing but gold and silver, and that it is going to assist materially in restoring a sound currency to the country; and what does the Secretary of the Treasury say? I wish to point out to the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means this discrepancy. There is certainly something wrong here in regard to the views of some part of the Administration. I cannot make out which is the real turtle and which is the mock one. The President says he will have nothing but gold and silver. Now hear what the Secretary of the Treasury says:

"In the mean time, adequate means for meeting lawful demands on the Treasury should be provided.

Such provisions should be made at the earliest practicable period, as a failure of sufficient means in the Treasury may occur at an early day. The exigency being regarded as temporary, the mode of providing for it should be of a temporary character. It is, therefore, recommended that authority be given to this Department by law to issue Treasury notes for an amount not to exceed $20,000,000, payable within a limited time, and carrying a specified rate of interest, whenever the immediate demands of the public service may call for a greater amount of money than shall happen to be in the Treasury, subject to the Treasurer's drafts in payment of warrants.

The fact that such temporary exigency may arise from circumstances beyond the foresight or control of this Department, makes some adequate provision to meet it indispensable to the public security."

So says the Secretary of the Treasury.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I can explain this discrepancy upon no ground but this: that we have here two kinds of Democracy—theoretical Democracy and practical Democracy. Theoretical Democracy disdains Treasury notes; it would touch nothing but gold and silver; practical Democracy will use whatever it can get to answer its purpose. If it has no gold and silver, it will issue Treasury notes; or, perhaps, speaking more properly, I should say that there are two Democratic dresses: one is a parade dress, for State occasions, and one a working dress, for working days. The gentlemen in the parade dress, who represent part of the Democracy, will have nothing but gold and silver; will touch nothing else than that. But the other class of gentlemen come slipping in behind, making very little noise, in their working day dress, and will take what they get; whether gold and silver, or Treasury notes. But, as the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has just remarked, that committee has taken out of the bill that feature of it which alone gave it the character of a loan bill. The original bill proposed that these notes should go to increase the debt of the nation, thus giving it somewhat the character of a loan. But now, the President and the Secretary of the Treasury fall back from gold and silver upon notes; and they come into the House here and propose that these notes are to be kept in circulation as bank notes, and nothing else.

MR. J. GLANCY JONES. I do not rise to address the committee, but merely to state that it is impossible for me to hear what is said on the other side of the Hall, and to inquire whether my colleague propounded any interrogatories to me?

MR. RITCHIE. No, sir; I said nothing requiring explanation, so far as my understanding of it is concerned. I see that the gentleman is in a dilemma. He must have these notes. I know that perfectly well. I do not desire to throw obstacles in the way of the operations of the Treasury Department. I desired merely to call the attention of the House and of the country to the fact that the theoretical Democracy and the practical Democracy are two entirely distinct things; and I desired to illustrate that by examples drawn from messages of the President of the United States and of the Secretary of the Treasury—both messages dated on the same day, and brought to the House at the same hour.

MR. J. GLANCY JONES. I have no response to make to that, because it is perfectly understood.

MR. BANKS. I desire to know whether the bill has been read by sections, or whether it is hereafter to be read by sections?

THE CHAIRMAN. The bill will hereafter be read by sections. It was read in extenso yesterday; and, so soon as the progress of the debate will permit, it will be read by sections, subject to amendment.

MR. BANKS. I have an amendment which I desire to offer at a proper stage of the bill. I desire now to make a suggestion on the subject, to which the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has referred—that is, as to the relative bearing of this bill, and of those that have been passed by Congress in previous years. He has stated that this bill differs from that of 1847, and from the bills passed in previous years, in one or two particulars only. In my judgment, it differs materially in more respects than those which he has suggested. It differs from those other Treasury note bills in the matter of principle, as well as in the matter of details. I have no reflections to make on the character of the Administration as it regards its Democracy. I do not know whether, as my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RITCHIE] says, there are on the other side of the House two classes of Democracy, or but one class. I only want to say, for myself and friends on this side of the House, that what he says in reference to Democracy has no reference to the Democracy on this side of the House.

The question of issuing Treasury notes has been one regarded by all parties in this country, from the beginning of the Government, as a matter of doubtful expediency, and dangerous in principle; and the plan has never been adopted, under any circumstances, when any other measure of relief could be immediately obtained by the Government of the country. There is nothing better established, upon the opinions of statesmen of all parties and of all times, than that the resort to a loan, in the form of Treasury notes, is a matter of doubtful expediency and of dangerous character. It has been so characterized by every man connected with the Government of the country who has had occasion to pass judgment on this question; but I know perfectly well that, at different periods of the Government, Treasury notes have been issued, and loans obtained in this way for the use of the Government. But I think that this will be found to be the truth in regard to every single case of this kind—that it has been a measure of necessity, and only adopted after the Government had ascertained that the relief which was necessary could be obtained in no other manner, and in no other form. This is as true in reference to the Treasury note bill of 1847 or 1846 as it is to those of 1841 and 1842, and to the Treasury note bill of 1837. In each case the Government had ascertained that it was impossible to obtain the relief that it desired to obtain in any other manner or form (so far as I can recollect the history of this question) than in the form of Treasury notes.

Now, whatever doubt we may have in regard to the expediency of this measure, as it concerns principle or its details, if the Government of the United States is, at this time, in such condition that it can obtain no relief for its immediate necessities and wants, except through the issue of Treasury notes, I, for one, am entirely willing to give my vote for the issue, on that statement being made. But it is not true, in my judgment. I think there never was a time when a loan for a small amount, or for a large amount, for a short time, or for a long time, could be obtained by the Government of the United States better than it can be at this day. I believe that the country is richer to-day than it ever has been before. There is more gold and silver coin in the country, by a hundred million dollars, than whenever the Treasury note question has been presented before. The banking institutions of the country are in a better condition to-day than they were at any period when the Treasury note question was presented by Congress to the country. Therefore, if there could be a loan by the Government of the United States, at this time, for a large sum or for a small sum, for a short time or for a long time, there is no apology for the resort to the issue of Treasury notes on the principle of the Treasury note bills of past times.

In 1837, it will be recollected by every gentleman on this floor, the Treasury note bill was introduced by the Administration, and sustained on the declaration that a loan could not be obtained at par for the use of the Government. It was passed on that ground. Gentlemen who then supported the Administration in this House took that ground. If I recollect right, the gentleman who was then chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and the gentleman from Virginia who sustained the measure at that time, put it upon the ground, expressly and exclusively, that the Government could not obtain the relief that it demanded by the usual and proper course of a loan.

The same thing is true of the bills of 1841 and 1842. The Government of the United States had applied for loans. The Administration of 1841 proposed a loan bill, but found it was impossible to obtain a loan by selling the stock of the United States at par; and therefore, and on that ground, the Treasury note bill was passed, and not—as this bill is now presented by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means—as an ordinary expedient for an ordinary relief of the Government.

And the same thing is true of the bill of 1847. The country was then at war with a foreign nation. The armies of this country had then, for the first time, undertaken to fight a battle upon territory exclusively of a foreign nation. The Administration had determined in their own judgment that the relief which was necessary for the Government at that time could not be obtained by the proper manner of a loan upon the stocks of the United States soon enough for the relief of the Government. It was so stated, and Congress therefore passed a Treasury note bill for that reason, for the relief of the Government at that time. But, sir, in that bill was incorporated the principle of a loan. They provided that the President of the United States should have authority to issue the stocks of the United States for the whole amount, or for as much of the $23,000,000 as should become necessary for the Government, in order, if it were possible, to obtain a loan upon the stocks of the United States—the stocks at six per cent. selling at par, that the President should have no reason for issuing Treasury notes, which had been declared by the eminent men of all parties from the beginning of the Government as inexpedient and dangerous in character, and false in principle.

Now, sir, if there be an exigency of this kind at this time, for one, I am ready cheerfully to afford relief to the Government to the extent it may desire, or the Administration recommend. But, sir, I ask that this House shall, in the first place, include, by inference at least, by a provision in this bill declaring that, unless it shall be found necessary—unless it shall be impossible and impracticable to obtain a loan upon the stocks of the United States, there shall be no issuance of Treasury notes to meet the wants of the Government. If it shall be found impracticable to obtain a loan, then I am willing that authority shall be given to issue Treasury notes.

Therefore, I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES,] and gentlemen on the other side of the House, when they set up the precedent of 1847 to sustain them in this measure, that they will incorporate into the measure the provision of the act of 1847, giving the President authority to make a loan, if a loan can be had upon fair terms, and throw upon him the responsibility of issuing Treasury notes if he shall choose to issue them without taking measures for first obtaining a loan. I ask, both upon principle and upon precedent, that that provision be incorporated into this act. It will relieve us Democrats on this side of the House [laughter] of some of the difficulties in our way in voting for this bill, standing as we do upon the principles and the practice of the Government in all past time.

But it is not in this respect only that this bill differs from the act of 1847 to which we have been referred. There is another, an essential and important difference, to which I wish to call the attention of the House. The bill of 1847 was introduced as a war measure. We were then, as I have said, engaged in a war with Mexico. It was not known to the Government, first, whether a loan could be negotiated in time to answer their purposes; and, second, what would be the duration of the contest. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who presented the bill of 1847 some time in July, 1846 or 1847, (I do not recollect precisely the date,) stated that if the war should not be brought to a conclusion and a treaty of peace established by the 1st of December following—not more than six months ahead—then they should take the initiative of presenting a bill for the issue of a loan upon the stocks of the United States in the ordinary manner. It was therefore a mere temporary measure to meet the exigencies of the Government in time of war. That bill, as I have said, provided first for the issue of a loan upon the stocks of the United States; but it went beyond that, and provided that the authority to issue Treasury notes should cease and determine upon a contingency named in the bill—that six months after the close of the war with Mexico the authority to issue Treasury notes should cease and determine.

Sir, if there was ever an occasion where unlimited authority for the issue of Treasury notes was warranted, it was under circumstances such as then existed. We knew not what would be the condition of the American army in Mexico. It had been declared by distinguished statesmen at the South, that it was impossible for American troops to meet the Mexicans in their own territory, to which our troops were unaccustomed, with even chances of success; and great doubt was felt everywhere in the country, as gentlemen well know, not only as to the issue, but as to the time of the issue. We were then without funds, and without a surplus in the Treasury to any very great amount. And therefore, having war upon our hands with a foreign nation, prosecuted for the first time upon the territory of that foreign nation, the duration of which we could not anticipate or determine, I say, that if there was ever a time when it would be proper to give the Administration full sweep, it was under circumstances like these. But even in that case, and under circumstances like these, a limitation was placed in the bill fixing the period when the power to issue Treasury notes should cease and determine.

But, sir, if I have read the bill, which has this moment been handed me by a page, there is no such provision in it. It provides for issuing Treasury notes to the amount of $20,000,000, and that there shall not be more than $20,000,000 of such notes outstanding at any one time. But they are to be issued and reissued as they are called in, for aught that is contained in this bill, as long as the Government shall continue. There is no limitation of time.

Now, sir, no man in this House can say, looking to the condition of the country, and looking to the prospects in regard to the continuance of the present difficulties, that this unusual and extraordinary source should be continued for more than three, two, or even one year after the passage of this bill, if the authority is given to the Administration at all. Under the circumstances in which we are placed, if we create this authority we should not extend the limit of its exercise beyond the meeting of the next Congress. There is no reason why such a power should be given to the Administration to extend beyond one year. The next Congress should be allowed to say for itself whether it is necessary to continue or repeat this act. In these respects I say, Mr. Chairman, this bill differs materially from the Treasury loan bill of 1847.

Mr. COBB. I understand the gentleman to say that these Treasury notes are asked at a time when we are in a profound peace, and I rise now to take exception to this, for, as I understand the President's message, we will soon be at war with the Mormons of Utah.

Mr. BANKS. That is impossible. We have upon this floor a Delegate from the Territory of Utah, in just as good standing, and with the same rights, as the gentleman from Alabama. No member here can say that we are at war with Utah, because we have a representative from that Territory upon this floor, who has been recognized by the House. There is a speak of war; but I will say to my friend that it is in another direction and for the future, and that the Government will not be relieved in that difficulty by any Treasury notes.

There are other points of difference between the bill of 1847 and the bill proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means beside those named by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and those I have suggested. In the first place, the bill of 1847 gave the privilege to the holders of Treasury notes to fund them if they chose. It gave to the President of the United States the authority to issue stocks of the United States in lieu of Treasury notes, if he thought proper. It also required—an important provision in the then condition of public affairs, but still more important in regard to the provisions of this bill—the President of the United States, at the beginning of each session of Congress, to make a deliberate statement of the issue of notes, of the redemption of notes, by whom paid, how paid, when paid, and every circumstance connected both with the payment and redemption of these notes. This information is important to the House and the country. It is certainly not included in this bill, and I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania will admit that such a provision ought to be in it.

I do not touch the question of the character of the issue, whether it affects the hard-money currency of the country or the paper-money currency. I call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentlemen of this House to the difference simply between the bill of 1847 and this bill. At the proper place, I shall move the following amendment:

And be it further enacted, That the President, if in his opinion it shall be the interest of the United States so to do, instead of issuing the whole amount of Treasury notes authorized by the first section of this act, may borrow, on the credit of the United States, such an amount of money as he may deem proper, and issue therefor the stock of the United States, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding six per centum, for the sum thus borrowed, redeemable after the 30th June: Provided, however, That the sum so borrowed, together with the Treasury notes issued by authority of this act, shall not, in the aggregate, exceed the sum of $20,000,000: And provided further, That no stock shall be issued at a less rate than its par value: And provided further, That the power to issue Treasury notes conferred on the President of the United States by this act shall cease and determine on the 1st day of January, 1859.

Mr. MILLSON. Mr. Chairman, I agree with much that the gentleman from Massachusetts has said, and it is for that very reason that I have risen to express my surprise that he has indulged in the complaints which he has just made. The gentleman has said, and truly said, that the country was never in a more prosperous condition than now, and he seems to doubt the necessity for continuing the issue of these Treasury notes. It is for that reason, sir, that I think that Congress ought at this time to prefer to supply the public necessities by the issue of these Treasury notes, rather than by resorting to loans on a long period of credit. It may be, sir, that the Treasury will have little or no occasion for such aid. It may be that the imports into the country will continue to be as large as they have been for some years past, and the revenue will be so abundant as to obviate any necessity for a resort to a loan. My own opinion on that subject, Mr. Chairman, is that there will be but a slight falling off in the public revenues. I do not know the relation between the exports and the imports of the last fiscal year; but I do know that for the two preceding years there was, what never has been before in the history of the Government, an excess of exports over the imports, of about $25,000,000. And when you take into consideration the fact that these exports are rated at the domestic valuation, while the imports come to us with the addition of profit, insurance, freight, and other charges, I do not think I make an extravagant declaration when I say that the public reports from the Treasury will show that, upon the transactions of these two years alone, the United States stand before the world as the creditor nation to the amount, perhaps, of $100,000,000.

This large indebtedness must be paid. It must be paid either in specie or in merchandise; and when we recollect that we are the great producers of specie, and reflect upon the general derangement of the business transactions of the country, if we continue to import specie in addition to the domestic supply, we must come to the conclusion that this debt will be paid to us in merchandise, thus filling the Treasury again, and providing for all the possible wants of the Government. I say, therefore, that there may be, for aught we know, no necessity whatever for any loan. I trust that it may be so; but at this time, sir, we are threatened with a deficiency of revenues. It is important that the public credit shall be maintained; it is necessary that the public wants shall be provided for; and it is proper, therefore, that discretion should be given to the agents of the Government, who, if they are trusted with the custody of the large sums belonging to the United States, may be very safely trusted also with the exercise of this discretion of issuing Treasury notes, in order, if necessary, to provide by this means for the public wants.

If you resort to loans at a long period, what will or what may be the consequence? Why, after having borrowed the money, it may appear that there was no necessity for it, and that it can be applied to no proper use, and the Government will then be placed in the condition, where it was only a few months ago, of purchasing its own paper at a very heavy appreciation, in order to save the unnecessary payment of interest. It may be compelled to do again what it was but recently obliged to do—that is, redeem its notes at a premium of some fifteen or sixteen per cent. You avoid this danger by the issue of Treasury notes. You have the advantage, too, of issuing these notes in sums adapted to the exigency of the moment. If you want them of small amount, why you will issue but a small amount of notes. It is not to be supposed that the Secretary of the Treasury, upon his responsibility as a public officer, will unnecessarily plunge the Government in debt by issuing a larger amount of Treasury notes than the wants of the country require.

The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RITCHIE,] who spoke a few minutes ago, seemed disposed to taunt the Democratic members with seeming or imputed inconsistency—for it was rather an imputed inconsistency than even a seeming one—in protesting in their theoretical expostulations against a paper currency, while practically they are found voting for the issue of Treasury notes, which he described as a new form, or another form of a paper currency. I am inclined to suspect, Mr. Chairman, that the argument thus used by the gentleman from Pennsylvania was intended by him to have more weight on this side of the House than that gentleman would be willing to attribute to it himself. Does he object to a paper currency? Is he an advocate of the hard-money system? I do not think he is. But the gentleman, perhaps, supposed that his chanting the virtues of a hard-money currency would, at least, have an effect here which it had not on his own mind. But, allow me to ask, Mr. Chairman, what sort of resemblance is there between Treasury notes bearing interest and a paper currency? Does not the gentleman know that there is scarcely a single feature of resemblance between these Treasury notes of the Government and what he calls a paper currency? I think, sir, it would be difficult to find a member in this Hall more desirous to destroy, or, at least, to diminish the circulation of paper money than I am; and yet it never occurred to me that there was the slightest inconsistency between my wishes upon that subject and my practice in the case now before the committee.

Why, sir, the most earnest and eager opponent of a paper-money currency has never questioned the propriety and the necessity of going into debt whenever debt becomes unavoidable; and when you go into debt, it is not only proper, but honest that some acknowledgment of the debt should be given, and some promise to pay interest for the withholding of the debt. What more do the Government do, sir, in the issue of Treasury notes? Is this a paper currency? It is but the borrowing of money; it is but the payment of the public creditor by giving him an acknowledgment of his debt, and promising to pay him interest for the delay of payment.

Mr. BANKS. We know that it is borrowing money, but it is the form of borrowing to which we object.

Mr. MILLSON. But the gentleman has not stated what there is objectionable in this form of borrowing, except that he supposes these Treasury notes will be used as currency. Now, I will undertake to show that if we are to judge of the future by the experience of the past, these Treasury notes will not be used as currency—will not go into the general circulation; and for the simple reason that State bonds and the evidences of ownership in the stock of your banking institutions are not used as a general currency, because they are bearing interest, and are worth more to-day than yesterday, and will be worth more to-morrow than to-day; they have no certain ascertained value; their value is perpetually changing; they are not fitted for the purposes of currency at all. We know very well, Mr. Chairman, that when Treasury notes were issued some years ago they were not used as a currency; they were purchased as other public stocks were purchased; they were generally sought after as means of profitable investment of money. And so it will be again.

When the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] interrupted me, I was proceeding to say that the Government paid to its creditors, or to such as were willing to receive them, these Treasury notes. There is no obligation implied in this bill for the reception of these notes. The public creditors may refuse to receive them. We know, Mr. Chairman, that in times past—and the very bill before you contemplates the possibility of a similar state of things existing hereafter—the Government has been wholly without means of paying those who are in the public employment; they prefer to continue in the public employment, even though they receive no money and not even an acknowledgment of the debt due them. What does this bill propose to do, sir, but to give to those persons evidences of the public indebtedness and to discharge the obligations of honesty and morality by promising to pay them interest upon the debts due them? That is all.

I therefore think, sir, that there is a peculiar propriety, for the very reasons assigned by the gentleman from Massachusetts himself, in raising this loan in the form of Treasury notes; and, sir, if I could have heard the statement of the gentleman's premises before he anticipated his conclusion, I should have come to the belief that he would have urged the issue of Treasury notes as a means of raising the required sum of money rather than a resort to a loan. But the gentleman, as I conceive, with all respect to him, with a perfect disregard of the obligations of logic, arrived at a conclusion which, as I conceive, is wholly and irreconcilably at war with his premises.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. What is the question before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore, (Mr. BOCOCK occupying the chair.) The bill has been read.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. There is no motion pending, then. I hope we shall take up the bill by sections, and go to work regularly, and have no more of this desultory discussion.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Debate has not been closed upon the bill, but the first section will be reported to the committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, obtained the floor.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Before we proceed further, I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. If the gentleman from Maine will yield the floor for that purpose, the gentleman from Georgia can submit the motion; but otherwise, the floor cannot be taken from the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I decline to yield.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I did not know the gentleman from Maine had the floor.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I desire, with the leave of the gentleman from Maine, to inquire of the Chair whether, if the bill be now read by sections, the debate will be confined to the sections which have been read?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. By no means. Debate has not been closed upon the bill, and any subject embraced in the bill is open to discussion. The first section of the bill was then read.

Mr. BANKS. I move to amend the first section of the bill, by adding to it the following proviso:

Provided, That the power to issue Treasury notes, conferred on the President of the United States by this act, shall cease and determine on the 1st day of January, 1859.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I think that the effect of the answer made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] is somewhat broken by the consideration that he ignored entirely the terms of the amendment. By that amendment, as I understand it, it was to be left to the discretion of the President of the United States to say whether a loan should be substituted for the issue of Treasury notes. Is not the gentleman from Virginia willing to indorse that discretion to the President of his choice? The gentleman from Virginia assumed that any loan which might be authorized, or made under the authority of the Administration, would be a loan for a long period of time; whereas, by the amendment, the time was not fixed, and, as I understand it, no time was contemplated by the amendment. If there was a blank in it, it might have been filled up by the House hereafter, or discretion might have been given to the Administration which, it seems to me, would remove entirely the objection of the gentleman from Virginia. Sir, in all times past, gentlemen of the school to which my friend from Virginia belongs, have opposed this principle of issuing paper promises by the Government, or by any of the agents or instrumentalities of the Government. No political party in this country has been so ready at all times to oppose any measure resembling in principle that now before the committee.

Why is this change—this signal and marked change? Why is it that these men who have been always heretofore opposed to paper currency, paper money, and paper promises in any form and in all forms, are now in favor of it, and are unwilling to leave any alternative to the Administration that they have put in power? Why is it? There must be some reason, and perhaps some reason that cannot meet the eye. There would have been no necessity at all for the measure, had the Administration of the gentleman's choice in past times been as prudent and as economical, and as just to all sections of the country as they should have been. We recollect, a few years ago, when ten millions were voted by this House, (and we were told that we had no right to inquire into the reasons of it,) for the purchase of a little strip of land, a few miles wide, worth not $10,000, as Colonel Benton told us; for the purpose of making the only connection that some gentlemen think it is possible to make between the Atlantic and Pacific, through the region of Arizona. May it not be that there are some other such operations in prospect—one out here in the ocean and others in the southwest—and that gentlemen desire not to be embarrassed by being told, when they come here with their propositions for an appropriation for such purpose, that not only is the Treasury empty, but that the Government has been contracting loans, permanent loans it may be, to get along with its ordinary expenditures.

I wish to know if there is anything of the nature of these reasons in this matter; or, if not, what the reasons are that have produced this wonderful and marked change in the opinions of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON,] and of those who agree with him on this floor.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I wish to inquire why members have not been furnished with copies of this bill? I understood that it was ordered to be printed yesterday, and supposed that the object was, that each member should have an opportunity of examining the bill for himself, so that he might be prepared to vote on the question when it came up. I find that there are copies of the bill on the desks of some members; but I, as well as many other members, have been unable to get a copy. I simply desire to know if the rule is that a few members are to have printed copies of the bill, and that the rest of the members are simply to take their votes as the rule by which they are to be governed? I want a copy of the bill for my own information.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore, (Mr. BOCOCK.) Of course, the present occupant of the chair had no control over the printing of the bill; but he has been informed that the usual order to print has not been executed, in consequence of want of time. The rules of the House require that a sufficient number of copies be printed to furnish each member with one. The order to print was only made yesterday, and sufficient time has not elapsed, perhaps, to have the requisite number of copies printed; so that some gentlemen may have got copies, while others have not.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I presume there are copies enough in the document room for all the members of the House.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. There are none there. I have sent, and have not been able to get one.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It only requires some two hundred and fifty copies to supply the House.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I may state that I took the pains myself to see that this bill should be printed; and I was informed that copies would be here for distribution at half past twelve. One was laid on my table at one o'clock, and others circulated around me; and, therefore, I supposed that all the members were supplied.

Mr. FLORENCE. Whose duty is it to see to this? Is it the duty of the Clerk of the House to have bills printed and put in possession of members?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Door-keeper has just informed the Chair, that a new supply has been brought in, and is in the hands of the pages, for distribution.

Mr. FLORENCE. I heard it said that they had not been sent to the Clerk's office. The Clerk is only an amateur, and I want to keep him to his duty. I want to set an example on this side of the House.

Mr. BISHOP. I have thus far, Mr. Chairman, heard no man deny that the resources of the Government were about exhausted; that the Treasury of the United States was nearly empty; and that there was a necessity, by some means or other, of raising funds to carry on the Government. The only question that has been discussed has been, whether this loan should be secured through an issue of Treasury notes, or by a loan, founded on Government stock.

It has been suggested, why not leave the question to the President of the United States, to decide whether he wishes this money raised by loan or by the issue of Treasury notes? Why, Mr. Chairman, if I understand correctly, the President wishes for no such privilege. He comes here, through the Secretary of the Treasury, and asks the Senate and House of Representatives to grant him the privilege of issuing Treasury notes. He does not ask for power to negotiate a loan upon the security of United States stocks. So far, then, as the opinions of the President are concerned, we are acting in conformity with those opinions; we are only carrying out the views of the President, in doing exactly what he recommends us to do.

It was suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Grow] the other day that it was a very extraordinary state of affairs to see this Government, only sixty days ago purchasing up their stocks at a premium of twenty or thirty per cent., now coming forward and asking for the issue of Treasury notes to meet their immediate necessities. Mr. Chairman, it is an extraordinary state of affairs, but no more extraordinary connected with the Government than connected with the affairs of individuals throughout the country. Where can there be found a man engaged largely in business who was not buying State stocks, railroad bonds, and railroad stocks, at a high premium, sixty and ninety days ago? And yet how many of these men have since become bankrupt, and have been compelled to place their effects in the hands of their creditors for settlement? It is true that this is an extraordinary state of affairs, but it is this very state of affairs which has brought about the necessity which exists for issuing these Treasury notes.

Now, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] suggests that these Treasury notes will not go into circulation. I cannot concur with the gentleman in that respect; I believe that they will go into circulation, and that they will be made a medium of exchange throughout the country, and that the business of the country will be greatly benefited in consequence; and it is for that reason, as much as any other, that I prefer the issue of Treasury notes to the issue of the United States stocks, as a measure of relief.

When the gentleman says that State or United States stocks and bonds have never been used as a medium of exchange it is very true, for the Government has never proposed to receive State or Government bonds in payment of the debts due the Government of the United States. But, sir, it is provided in this bill that these notes shall be received by the Government in payment of debts due the Government, and hence it arises, from the necessity of the case, that these Treasury notes will be made a medium of exchange. I know that, in my section of the country, they are looking for these Treasury notes, for the very purpose of making them a medium of exchange. If they bear no more than one per cent. interest, they will be taken into the banks as the equivalent for gold, just as much as though they bore six per cent. interest.

Another objection to the issue of United States stocks is that, in order that they may bring a large premium, they must have a long time to run. The exigencies of the Government may require that this money shall be needed only for a short time, perhaps only for a few months; and when that time has past, if you issue your Government stocks they may run on for twenty years, and you are obliged to pay interest upon them for the whole time, and then perhaps you bring about the same state of affairs spoken of by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in which the Government will again be found purchasing up its own stocks at a premium of twenty or thirty per cent. For that reason it is more economical for the Government, and better for the business of the country, that Treasury notes should be issued rather than Government stocks.

We have been referred to the issue of United States stocks in 1847, and it has been suggested that, as that plan was adopted then, why not adopt it now? Why, Mr. Chairman, there is no prospect of the Government wanting the same amount of money now which it wanted then. It may be, that before these very Treasury notes are executed by the Secretary of the Treasury, the necessities of the Government will have passed, and that the importations will have increased, and that there will be sufficient money in the Treasury to meet the exigencies of the Government before the time arrives for the issue of the first note. But I hope, Mr. Chairman, that if these notes are to be issued, the passage of the bill may not be delayed in this House. If they are to be issued at all, they should be issued in the most speedy manner. For, while the issue of these notes will be an advantage to the Government, I know that so far as my section of the country is concerned, they will be of wonderful advantage to the business of the State. Business there is prostrated. The country is not, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] said, in a prosperous condition. It may be true that there is more money in the country than ever before, but if such is the fact, I should like to have the gentleman from Massachusetts point out where it is to be found. The manufacturers and the business men of Connecticut cannot find it. It is hoarded up; confidence is lost; and though there may be money in the country, it cannot be made available for the benefit of the business men of the country, except at a high rate of interest.

Mr. COVODE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Connecticut a question, with his permission. I wish to ask whether the simple reason why this gold is not in circulation is not that paper money has taken the place of it? Then, if you put more paper money into circulation by the issue of Treasury notes, do not you drive more gold out of circulation? and not only out of circulation, but out of the country? That is the cause of the difficulty under which the country is laboring. The more paper you introduce as a circulating medium, the more gold you drive out of circulation.

Mr. BISHOP. In answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania I have to say, if he admits that these Treasury notes are the same description of currency as the paper issued by the banks throughout the Union, perhaps his argument may amount to something; or, if he believes that the issue by the Government of a few Treasury notes for a few months, or for a year or two, in order to make up a small deficiency in the Treasury, is the same as the establishing of a bank authorized to issue notes of the denomination of five dollars, three dollars, two dollars, and one dollar, almost without limit, with scarcely a dollar of specie upon which that paper money is based, I admit, then, that his argument may amount to something. I am no more in favor than the gentleman from Pennsylvania of making the United States Government a machine for the manufacture of paper money. I regret that so much paper money has been sent into circulation throughout the country. I believe that it has been the great cause of the present unfortunate condition of the country.

Mr. COVODE. I say to the gentleman from Connecticut, that he started with the admission that the money in the Treasury is nearly exhausted, and therefore there is nothing upon which to base this circulation of paper money. [Laughter.]

Mr. BISHOP. I ask the gentleman whether this bill does not provide that these Treasury notes shall be sold to the highest bidder, and that gold shall be paid for them? If this is true, I then ask him whether, when these Treasury notes are out, there is not a dollar of gold for every dollar of notes?

I do not wish to dwell upon this subject. I am no advocate of paper money. I should like to see a law passed, if it were possible and constitutional, forbidding any banks in the Union from issuing a bill under the denomination of fifty dollars. But, sir, that cannot be done. I trust that this measure will pass. It will meet the necessities of the country and benefit the business of the country.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am anxious to bring the House to a vote upon this bill to-day, and I therefore move that the committee rise, with a view to fix a time for closing debate on it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I desire to submit a few remarks, and I hope the gentleman will not make his motion now.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. CLINGMAN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SAVAGE and WINSLOW were appointed.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative, the tellers having reported—ayes 80, noes 92.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who last addressed the committee threw some light on a subject which has removed some doubt which previously rested upon it, if not as to the purposes intended to be accomplished, at least as to the purposes which will be accomplished by this bill, if passed in its present form. It was stated yesterday by the honorable gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HORTON], who for a long time presided over the Committee of Ways and Means, that this bill, he believed, followed, with considerable accuracy, the precedents of former bills for issuing Treasury notes. The honorable chairman of the present Committee of Ways and Means started out this morning with the same statement, which, however, he qualified, by saying that they were the same, with the exception of two or three particulars, which he specified, still leaving the impression upon the House that this bill was no novelty, but was in the line of former precedents, if they were not the same.

I was very much struck by both forms of expression at the time they were used; and on investigating the former laws which have been passed, I find that they are alike in the formal parts of the bill, but in those portions which touch the material qualities of it, they greatly differ. I can scarcely add, on this point, to the observations already made so well by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS], nor have I any further suggestions to make with reference to the amendment which he has moved, for the purpose of bringing this bill within the line of early precedents.

In the first place, with reference to a matter of detail—and I address myself especially to my friend at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means—the clause of the fourth section which he has moved to add to the bill, cannot stand in the bill without coming in direct conflict with the second provision of the bill as originally drawn; and that conflict existed in the bill when drawn, and when yesterday presented to the Committee of Ways and Means for their consideration. I make the suggestion because the gentleman can obviate the difficulty by an amendment. The second section provides that the first $6,000,000 issued shall be issued at such rate of interest as the Secretary of the Treasury shall see fit to prescribe; and it directs that the residue shall issue at such rate of interest as shall be bid for by the lowest bidder.

The fourth section, as amended by the honorable gentleman, provides that these Treasury notes shall be exchanged in the payment of the duties of the Government to persons bearing warrants on the Treasury. But as they are to bear interest, and as only $6,000,000 can have the rate of interest fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and as the rate of interest on the residue is to be fixed by bidding, it is plain that it is impossible to apply any beyond the $6,000,000 to the payment of the creditor of the Government, unless he and the Secretary of the Treasury are themselves to bid, according to the language of the act. It is plain, therefore, that my honorable friend must modify the bill in that particular. When that shall have been done, then the bill will be in the position in which the President of the United States desires it; and, judging by the gentleman who spoke last on the other side of the House, that apparently is an all-sufficient reason for accepting it in this shape. On this side of the House, Mr. Chairman, we, perhaps, are not so docile with reference to the executive recommendations, and we venture to specer a question as to the purposes which may be subserved by the bill, although it may be very true that the Secretary of the Treasury does not mean to accomplish those purposes.

When we reach this point, then light falls upon the bill from the gentleman who last spoke, [Mr. BISHOP.] I take his speech in connection with the remark of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON,] that this is no paper currency. The last gentleman who spoke said, "Oh, but it is needed in my region of country, where there is scarcely any currency; it will accomplish the purpose of regulating the exchanges of the country." I submit that there, at once, are two distinct admissions that this paper is put forth upon the country as a paper currency, for these are the two purposes which a paper currency is intended chiefly to subserve. With reference to the exchanges between different portions of this country, Mr. Chairman, you know very well—much better than I do—that ever since the destruction of the Bank of the United States in 1836, there has been always the greatest difficulty in finding any paper medium that would transfer funds from one portion of the country to another, except at a ruinous rate of discount. And gentlemen know, and the honorable gentleman who spoke last knows—for he comes from that portion of the country where, of all others, the operations of exchange and paper money are most perfectly understood—that the very moment the Government casts upon the country their $20,000,000 of Treasury notes, split up into sums of fifty dollars, they form the best medium of exchange existing in the country—one of the chief purposes of paper currency—and one of the greatest necessities of modern commerce. There is no time provided at which any man can be coerced to present any one of these notes at the Treasury. They may, if presented, be redeemed at or after the expiration of one year, within sixty days after the Treasury may be in a condition to redeem them, and shall have published that fact; then the interest is to cease. But, suppose the Treasury is ready within two months after a large proportion of them shall have been issued, there is still no law to coerce the return of the bills. The holder may very well be content to lose the interest upon the amount of a bill which can be used as the cheapest and best method of exchange for the next twenty years to come; and there is no provision of the bill that can at any time prevent the circulation of this medium for the purposes of exchange. I say, therefore, whether the gentlemen who drew this bill intended it or not, that they have accomplished exactly what the notes of the Bank of the United States accomplished, and exactly what Mr. Webster designed to accomplish by his scheme of a fiscal agent; that is, the issue of notes on the faith of the Government without being guarded, as Mr. Webster's scheme was guarded, by having five or ten million dollars of specie dedicated to meet the notes. It is an irredeemable currency; a currency, however, that will circulate upon the faith of the Government. So that the honorable gentlemen on the other side, intentionally or unintentionally, have themselves proposed a measure which they cannot limit, if it is adopted in the shape in which they have proposed it; making a perpetual irredeemable currency, the very material of exchange, and which, for that purpose, will always continue in circulation until they, by some mode or other, coerce its return.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. How can they coerce it?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The gentleman from Kentucky asks how can they coerce it, and it is for gentlemen on the other side, who have now the responsibility of the Government, and who have been reading us divers lectures on the evils of a paper currency, to respond. Under the provisions of this bill, I say it cannot be controlled, for there is no provision saying that it shall be returned to the Government within any period of time whatever.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not care now to discuss what will be the effect upon the country of throwing upon it $20,000,000 of Government paper, which is really currency. Sir, it is a significant fact that the amount of the notes is limited to that precise point which the Secretary of the Treasury and the President of the United States recommend should be the limit of bank bills. That is a significant feature in connection with the fact that they are now prepared by the policy they have indicated, both in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury and in the message of the President to strike down the banks of the country by a bankrupt law, and then to have $20,000,000 of Government paper floating in currency, which it is beyond their power to call back, and which will instantly fill the void which they make, if they do what they say in the President's message.

I mean to cast no imputations. I am merely developing the legal results of the bill that has been, and is being, pressed here earnestly to a passage before gentlemen have had an opportunity of considering it. I appealed to the courtesy of my honorable friend at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means to allow me to ascertain and develop the legal consequences of this bill; yet, in his opinion, the public exigencies would not justify the indulgence. I say I am merely developing the legal consequences of that which, in its existing shape, gentlemen wanted to force to a final vote of the House. I am entitled, therefore, to cast upon them the responsibility of all difficulties connected with it.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Will the gentleman allow me to say that I did not want to cut off his speech, but merely to fix the hour at which the debate should close?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Then, Mr. Chairman, for the present, and until the bankrupt law shall have been passed, striking down all the banks of the country that have seen fit—in the exercise of a wise discretion, and following the best precedents of the greatest financial minds of this country and of England—to relieve the country by suspending their specie payments, what is proposed? Ere they shall have reached that point, and shall have stricken down the banks because, in a wise discretion, supported, almost without exception, by the business men of the country, (the most marked instance of it being in New York, where suspension was brought about deliberately by the merchants themselves, the great money masters of the country, who caused the very banks in which they themselves had their deposits to suspend, while the banks themselves, on a factitious idea of commercial honor, tried to avoid suspension,) they took the course to preserve the credit of the country and its whole commerce from being prostrated, they come in with this measure. The banks of the country suspended less than three months ago, and now they have more specie in their vaults than they ever had before, and have resumed specie payments. The operation of the general bankrupt law, had it then been in existence, would have been to have stricken down, at one blow, the half currency of the country; and I leave to gentlemen who know anything of commercial affairs, to say what condition we would have been in had this favorite plan been in operation.

But I do not mean now to discuss that. We have now a perfectly sound paper currency throughout the country, because the banks have not broken. Merchants have broken; but the banks have not broken. Their paper has not been returned on them. It is still in circulation. In New York it is now exchangeable in gold or silver at their counters, and therefore they are still in existence. At this point, the financial gentleman at the head of the Treasury Department of the Government desires to increase the amount of paper currency to the extent of $20,000,000 at his will. I leave to gentlemen, conversant with mercantile affairs, to say what the operation of that will be.

Mr. BISHOP. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I prefer that the gentleman will allow me to proceed in the course of observation that I am making.

The effect, therefore, we cannot now, perhaps, entirely determine. If this measure add $20,000,000 to the existing paper currency of the country, then, I suppose, it makes paper currency so much the more in excess. If it drive out $20,000,000 of that which is now in circulation, it substitutes the credit of the Government and the paper of the Government for the credit and the paper of the banks—the paper of the banks being now redeemable in gold at their counters, and the paper of the Government not being redeemable at any time, so far as is indicated in the bill that they are attempting to pass. So that, in one breath, the honorable gentleman at the head of the Treasury Department talks about the danger of an inflated currency, and of an inflated credit, and in the very same breath desires to throw on the country $20,000,000 excess of material, which, he says, ought now to be condemned by the operation of a bankrupt law, and by the operation of every measure of legislation that can be obtained to limit the issue of paper currency. I submit that there is a grave inconsistency between the direct intents of this bill and the policy of the Government with respect to its financial matters.

But, Mr. Chairman, we ought, I think, to inquire as to the effect of this measure. No one doubts—I certainly do not doubt—that there is a grave necessity now, for the credit of the country, to come to the rescue of its depleted Treasury; and whenever the form of so assisting it shall be adjusted in a manner that I consider to be proper, I will then most cheerfully give it my sanction; and if it shall appear that money cannot now be raised by a loan, but may be raised by Treasury notes, then, with additional limitations of this bill, I will be ready to favor it.

But it is proper, when a loan is asked for on the part of the Government—and that is the substance of this bill—that at least Congress should be heard to put the question, "Why the necessity of a loan?" While I am willing and free to vote all the means that Government may want for its purposes, I must be allowed to ask, Why is the Government going out again as a borrower? There was money in the Treasury three months ago; why has not that money been kept there? It was paid out, we are told, to relieve the necessities of the country. I presume that it has relieved the necessities of the country by transferring the necessities to the Government. I suppose that, if there was a necessity for specie in the country at that time, it scarcely comports with the theories of the other side of the House, or the relations of the Government to the country in its financial matters, to supply that currency. It is altogether a factitious necessity. They were driven to supply the currency because they had it locked up in the vaults. They had locked it up in the vaults because, owing to the system of tariff in the country, they had accumulated there more specie than the necessities of the Government demanded. Was it that people wanted money in the country, and that therefore the Government let it go? If so, then I say that the Government is responsible, to the extent of the money in the Treasury under the sub-Treasury scheme, for the necessities of the country. I suppose that that responsibility lies likewise on the side of the House that now proposes this loan.

Was there any necessity, or any justification on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury for purchasing United States stocks at fifteen or sixteen per cent. premium? It has been stated by a gentleman on that side of the House—though I am inclined to think he was perhaps in error—that it was purchased at nineteen, twenty, and even twenty-three per cent. premium. Was there any justification or necessity for that course of financial policy? Was not the Treasury Department responsible to know the condition of affairs in the country? Are they to be allowed to be so blind in financial matters as that, within three months, they can pass from a state where they can spend to relieve the country's necessities into a state of bankruptcy where they require a loan? Was there any justification for purchasing in the stocks of the United States at this great loss to the Government? Was specie wanted in the country? Then those who had the stocks of the United States could have brought it elsewhere. It was unnecessary that the loss should fall upon the Government of the United States. Men could have sent these stocks abroad and brought into the country the specie for them at a premium far less burdensome to the affairs of the country.

It strikes me, therefore, that the course pursued by them has brought upon the country that which is now its necessity. It may be that, if the Secretary of the Treasury had pursued a different course, hereafter, a loan would have become necessary. It certainly would not have been necessary now. I do not think that this storm is so rapidly passing away as the Secretary of the Treasury seems to suppose. I do not regard it as a mere temporary disorder in the country. I apprehend that it has affected the business of the country to its very foundations. I apprehend that it has prostrated not merely the credit, but in a great measure the resources of those who have conducted the business of the country. I apprehend that the fall of prices of every species of produce indicates something more than a mere temporary derangement of the currency of the country. I apprehend, from the recent fall in the prices of cotton, that the cotton of the South will not, as the Secretary of the Treasury thinks, afford sufficient material for the exchanges of the foreign trade. I apprehend that prices will, in all probability, remain low; that business will continue dull; that imports will be small, and consumption smaller than the imports; and that the revenue will be less rather than greater.

We shall, in my judgment, be called on to pass more than one bill of relief for the Government.

The Secretary of the Treasury has, in my opinion, been guilty of a great financial error; because he has taken the money which was in the Treasury, for the purpose of buying the Government securities at an enormous premium; when, if the money was wanted, it could have been obtained, on these securities, from abroad, which would have strengthened the hands of the business men, and added to the amount of specie in the country.

I hold that one cause of our necessity is our sub-Treasury scheme. It was that which brought, in part, upon the country the necessities which now trouble it, by withdrawing from the circulation of the country more gold than was required for the wants of the Government.

And another element which I suppose has contributed to the result at which we have arrived, is the speculative tendencies of the country, which have been pushed on by the tariff policy of the Government for the last four, five, or six years, until finally we are brought to another revulsion, analogous in cause, and to be cured in the same way, as the revulsion of 1837.

These are the observations, Mr. Chairman, which I desired to submit upon this bill. In closing, I have only to say, that I recognize the necessities of the Government, and I am not illiberal, I trust, nor have I ever been at any time, in my votes, to aid the Government in carrying out a most liberal policy in all its departments. And therefore, when this bill shall have been placed in a condition which I think will render it safe for the interests of the country, I shall most cheerfully give it my assent.

Mr. FLORENCE. As it is now three o'clock, I do not desire, at this hour, to make any remarks upon the measure before us. I therefore move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to. The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Phelps reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the House (No. 4) to authorize the issue of Treasury notes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the War Department, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, a list of officers against whom there is an unadjusted balance standing over for more than twelve months; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FLORENCE moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. GROW. I appeal to my colleague to withdraw that motion for a moment to enable me to offer a resolution of inquiry, which I have been trying to get an opportunity to do for several days.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I shall object to any resolution being offered if the motion is withdrawn.

Mr. FLORENCE. I would very cheerfully withdraw my motion, if my colleague could accomplish his purpose by it; but as the gentleman from Tennessee says, in advance, that he will object to his resolution, it would be of no avail.

Mr. GROW. I know the kindness of heart of my colleague, and will not ask him to withdraw the motion under the circumstances.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly, at seven minutes past three o'clock, adjourned until Monday next, at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 21, 1857.

Prayer by Rev. STEPHEN P. HILL.

The Vice President appeared and took the chair. The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of Washington Territory, communicating copies of the laws passed at the session of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Washington, begun and held at Olympia, December 1, 1856; which was ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KENNEDY presented the petition of Henrietta Carroll, widow of William Carroll, praying to be allowed bounty land for the services of her husband during the last war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. STUART presented the petition of Sarah Lovejoy, widow of Joshua Lovejoy, praying for remuneration for property destroyed by the enemy during the last war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of citizens of Copper Harbor, Lake Superior, praying for the establishment of a separate Indian agency for the Indians of Lake Superior; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MASON presented the petition of the Alexandria, Loudoun, and Hampshire Railroad Company, praying for the erection of a bridge on the piers of the Potomac aqueduct, and that the company may be allowed to extend a branch of their road into the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented the petition of members of the bar of the circuit and criminal courts of the District of Columbia, praying that the salary of the judges of the criminal court may be increased; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SEWARD presented the petition of R. S. Hamilton and J. E. L. Hamilton, heirs of Josiah Locke, an officer in the revolutionary war, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey, presented the petition of Albert G. Hopper and Nancy Baldwin, heirs of Garrett A. Hopper, a soldier in the revolutionary war, praying for the payment of a pension due to them; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FITCH presented a memorial of citizens of Allen county, Indiana, praying for the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of Niagara; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HUNTER presented a memorial of heirs of revolutionary officers of the continental line, praying for the repeal of the acts of limitation of 1792 and 1793, in order that the Court of Claims may pass upon their claims; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. GWIN presented the petition of Isaac Swain, praying for the payment of a balance of his claim for damages, in consequence of the loss of the ship Ellen Brooks and cargo, rejected by the Court of Claims; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented the petition of Joseph Morrow, a soldier in the last war with Great Britain, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JONES presented a petition of citizens of Sioux City, Iowa, praying for the passage of an act authorizing the entry of a portion of the lands on which that city is situated; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HARLAN presented the petition of Richard E. Randolph, praying to be allowed bounty land for services in the Florida war, in the year 1836; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SLIDELL presented the memorial of the National Institution for the Promotion of Science, at Washington city, asking for the aid of Government to enable that institution to retain and support in a suitable manner the collections in its keeping; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. FOSTER. I present the petition of Nathan Scofield, praying for the renewal of a patent. The petitioner states that some years since he invented an instrument called a "governor," or regulator used for the purpose of governing or equalizing the motion of machinery driven by water or steam power, but, for certain reasons stated in the petition, he has not derived from it that amount of compensation which is just and proper; and he therefore asks for a renewal and extension of his patent. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office. It was so referred.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. KENNEDY, it was Ordered, That the heirs of Andrew Leitch have leave to withdraw their petition and papers.

On motion of Mr. IVERSON, it was Ordered, That the petition of Charles F. Buckner, administrator of William White, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, it was Ordered, That the petition of Major E. B. Babbitt, the petition of Lieutenant James G. Benton, and the petition of Brevet Major James Longstreet, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. A resolution was offered some days since by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] to provide for the printing of the President's message and the accompanying documents. That resolution is now the basis of the Kansas debate, and a Senator has the floor upon it to-day. I wish some arrangement to be made by which that printing can be proceeded with. The resolution offered by the Senator from Illinois will not now answer. It is not in proper form since the election of a Public Printer by the Senate. I propose to offer now the usual resolution, and, in accordance with our rules, to refer it to the Committee on Printing. This cannot be done without superseding the right to the floor, which is held by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIGLER] for to-day at one o'clock; but it is necessary for the public service that the matter should be referred at once to the Committee on Printing, in order that a report may be made to the Senate under our rules, and that we may have these documents printed. The Senator from Illinois proposes to solve the difficulty by a motion which he will make, and then I shall ask leave to offer the usual resolution as a substitute for the proposition he has submitted.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Being desirous of expediting the printing of these documents, so that we can have them as soon as possible, I have consented to accept whatever amendment to my original resolution the chairman of the Committee on Printing may deem proper; but, inasmuch as that would take the subject on which the discussion has progressed from the presence of the Senate, I suggested that I would make a motion to refer so much of the message as relates to territorial affairs to the Committee on Territories. The Senator from Pennsylvania may proceed with his speech on that motion, the same as on the pending question. If that change will expedite business; I cheerfully accede to it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. With the understanding that the Senator from Pennsylvania shall have the floor on that motion, as he now has on the motion to print.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Of course.

Mr. BIGLER. That will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Then I will now offer my substitute for the proposition of the Senator from Illinois, in regard to the printing of the message.

Mr. DOUGLAS. After the resolution of the Senator from Arkansas is disposed of, I will make my motion, in order that the Senator from Pennsylvania may make his speech on it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The Senator from Illinois accepts my resolution as a substitute for the one he offered.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I withdraw the original resolution, in order that the Senator from Arkansas may make a new motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It can be withdrawn by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the usual number of copies, and fifteen thousand additional copies, of the annual message of the President of the United States and accompanying documents, be printed for the use of the Senate.

I move that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It must be referred, under the rule.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The standing rule requires it to be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

It was so referred.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I now move to refer so much of the President's message as relates to the Territories to the Committee on Territories, in order that the Senator from Pennsylvania may have the floor on that motion.

Mr. BIGGS. I understand that that motion will lie over until one o'clock.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Pennsylvania can call it up whenever he desires to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will be entered.

CHRISTMAS HOLIDAYS.

Mr. BIGGS. In the mean time I wish to call up a resolution I had the honor to introduce some days ago in relation to a recess. I believe it is conceded on all hands to be the former practice of both Houses of Congress not to do any business during the holidays. I think it, therefore, proper, particularly since the operation of the new compensation act, that we shall now set a precedent for adjourning over during the holidays. I can see no propriety in meeting here merely as a matter of form, for the purpose of adjourning. If the former practice obtained in consequence of the former mode of compensation, that reason is disposed of by the new compensation bill. Indeed, if that reason operated at all, the new compensation bill shows the propriety of the present resolution to adjourn over during the holidays, when we do not expect to transact any business. The resolution is well understood by the Senate, and therefore I shall not consume time on it. I hope the resolution will be taken up, considered, and adopted.

Mr. IVERSON. I rise to a point of order. On Saturday evening the Senate had under consideration a joint resolution from the House of Representatives making some change in the compensation law. We adjourned while that subject was under consideration. My point is, that that is the first subject in order this morning, and it cannot be superseded except by a vote of the Senate. I desire to have that measure taken up this morning, and disposed of. I think we can dispose of it before the hour of one o'clock arrives; and it is quite as important, perhaps more so to members generally, than the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina. If it comes first in order, I shall insist upon its being taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the point made by the Senator from Georgia is well taken; but the Senate may change the order of business.

Mr. IVERSON. I now ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of that joint resolution.

Mr. BIGGS. I will suggest to the Senator from Georgia that the point he makes, so far as the unfinished business is concerned, in my opinion does not obtain until one o'clock. It seems to me that one o'clock is the proper time, according to the rules, when the unfinished business undisposed of at the last sitting comes up regularly. Petitions, reports, and resolutions are the morning business for one hour, unless the Senate thinks proper to take up and dispose of other business. The joint resolution named by the Senator from Georgia was the business undisposed of at the last adjournment, and does not come up regularly until one o'clock. Then I admit it will come up regularly as the first special order, being the unfinished business undisposed of at the last sitting. That is my impression of the rules, with due deference to the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. IVERSON. I am willing to accommodate gentlemen in this matter. The Senator from Pennsylvania is anxious to proceed with his speech on the Kansas question; and if we take up either of these measures, we shall probably go beyond the hour allotted to him. I therefore suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that we lay both our propositions aside for the present, and that we allow the motion of the Senator from Illinois to be taken up, on which the Senator from Pennsylvania can proceed with his speech. After that, we can take up either one or the other of these propositions.

Mr. BIGGS. I would adopt the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Georgia at once, were it not that it is important, if this resolution is to pass at all, that it should pass immediately, in order that the House of Representatives may act on it. It has been postponed now for three or four days. The proposition is, that, when the two Houses adjourn on Wednesday next, they shall adjourn until after New Year's day. We must give time to the House of Representatives to act on it.

Mr. IVERSON. I will be amiable, and yield to the gentleman.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina, to take up the resolution indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, which directs that when the two Houses adjourn on the 23d instant, they adjourn to meet on the 4th of January.

Mr. GREEN called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 34, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Chandler, Clay, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Foster, Hale, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Kentucky, King, Mason, Pugh, Reid, Seward, Thomson of New Jersey, Trumbull, Wilson, and Wright—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Brown, Clark, Collamer, Fessenden, Green, Gwin, Hamlin, Johnson of Tennessee, Polk, Stuart, and Wade—12.

So the resolution was adopted; and the Secretary was directed to ask for the concurrence of the House of Representatives.

PRINTING OF THE TREASURY REPORT.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the finances, with the documents communicated therewith, be printed; and that ten thousand additional copies of the same be printed for the use of the Senate, and five hundred additional copies for the use of the Treasury Department.

NEW CUSTOM-HOUSES.

Mr. JONES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the construction of a custom-house at Keokuk, in the State of Iowa. Also, as to the propriety of making Sioux City a port of delivery; and of making an appropriation for the construction of a custom-house at the latter place.

COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. GWIN. I have been instructed by the select committee on the Pacific railroad, to present the following resolution; and ask for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the select committee on the Pacific railroad be authorized to employ a clerk at the usual compensation.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I offer the following resolution; and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That each of the standing committees of the Senate, enumerated in the 34th rule, be authorized to employ a clerk, with the exception of the four following committees, which shall not be entitled to a clerk; to wit:

1. The Committee on the Library.
2. The Committee on Engrossed Bills.
3. The Committee on Enrolled Bills.
4. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate; and that the clerks so employed, shall receive a compensation of six dollars per diem during the time of their actual service.

Mr. PUGH. I think this proposition had better be amended, so as to supersede former special resolutions in relation to several committees, and then it will be general. There are now, I think, standing resolutions of the Senate, authorizing the Committees on Finance, Printing, and Claims, to employ clerks at a higher rate of compensation than this resolution allows. If it is intended to reduce those compensations, it would be better to have a repealing clause. I am in favor of the resolution, but I do not wish to have the difficulty arise hereafter of a conflict between the orders of the Senate.

Mr. HUNTER. I think this resolution conforms to the practice. I do not think it enlarges it at all.

Mr. PUGH. Is it understood to repeal the resolution offered by the Senator from Virginia, at the last Congress, making the clerkship to the Committee on Finance permanent?

Mr. HUNTER. If it does, I ask that it may lie over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over if objected to.

Mr. EVANS. I will offer an amendment, which will obviate the difficulty, to add:

Except the Committees on Finance, Claims, and Printing, whose clerks shall receive an annual compensation of $1,850.

That covers the whole ground.

Mr. HUNTER. With that amendment I shall not object to the resolution.

Mr. BRIGHT. If I understand the proposition now, the object is to give to the three clerks just named by the Senator from South Carolina, an annual salary of $1,850.

Mr. HUNTER. It keeps up the old practice. It does give to these three clerks a permanent salary.

Mr. BRIGHT. I am opposed to making part of the clerks permanent, and not the whole. I think it would be much better to give the clerks to committees $1,500 a year each, than to give part of them a per diem and make a portion of them salaried officers. I prefer that the matter should lie over, at any rate, for the present. I object to the consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution will lie over under the rules.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. FOSTER gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to continue the improvement of the navigation of the river Thames, in the State of Connecticut.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 18) to appropriate one million acres of the public lands of the United States for the benefit of free public schools in the District of Columbia; which was read the first time, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill (S. No. 19) to continue the improvements in the harbor of Newark, New Jersey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GWIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to bring in a bill (S. No. 20) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 23, 1857.

NEW SERIES....No. 8.

holding the courts of the United States, in the case of sickness or other disability of the judges of the district courts," passed July 29, 1856; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JONES, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce the following bills; which were read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (S. No. 21) to divide the State of Iowa into two judicial districts—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. No. 22) for the relief of certain citizens of Sioux City, in the State of Iowa—to the Committee on Public Lands.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

On motion of Mr. BIGLER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the motion of Mr. DOUGLAS, to refer so much of the President's message as relates to territorial affairs to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. BIGLER. Mr. President, no one has regretted more than myself that the discussion on the Kansas policy of the Administration has been precipitated upon the Senate and the country. I preferred to avoid discussion until the result of the election on the slavery clause had transpired, and until Kansas should present herself for admission as a State; but the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] deemed a different policy necessary and proper, and no alternative was left to the friends of the Administration but to respond.

I think I am duly sensible of the important and delicate character of the subject to be discussed, and I am sure I never was more anxious to do my duty; never more willing to sacrifice pride of opinion, or to restrain passion and prejudice, in order to see clearly the public good. That other Senators are actuated by motives equally proper, I have no doubt.

The Senator from Illinois has delivered what may be termed a great speech against the Kansas policy of the Administration. No man who knows him will doubt his ability to make the most out of any state of facts and circumstances before him. Few men can equal him in this particular. For myself, I make no such pretension; but, as to our rights, privileges, and responsibilities, on this floor we are equals. Fortunately in our present difference, I think my cause the stronger of the two, and on it I can rely with safety.

Now, sir, it would be idle to attempt to answer the Senator's arguments, and controvert his conclusions, were I to concede the correctness of all his premises. This I cannot do, and I shall show why I cannot, at different points as I proceed. This great speech of the Senator, with all due respect, was, in my humble estimation, after all, only a huge structure, resting on a very unsound and insufficient foundation. He has applied the facts and circumstances with great skill in maintaining his case; but he will pardon me for the expression of the opinion that, in tone and temper, in enlarged and sound theory, in practical and useful suggestion, in generous tolerance of differences with others, it will not, in my judgment, command so much of public favor as any one of the many former efforts of that gifted Senator. It was his right—and no one will call in question his motives—but I do not believe it was wise in the Senator to precipitate the slavery agitation in this body and in the country; nor can I understand why he should have shown so much willingness to weaken public confidence in the policy of the men of his own party, whom he assisted to place in power, and who, at this critical moment, wield the only functions of Government capable of maintaining the public peace in Kansas; nor why he should have indulged in sarcastic ridicule when dealing with the views of the President. The allegation that that able and accomplished statesman had fallen into "fundamental error," as to the meaning of the Kansas-Nebraska law, and the purposes of its authors, because he was not in the country at the time of its passage, can be estimated in no other light, and can subserve no useful purpose for the Senator or the country. True, it answered to excite momentary gratification on the other side of the Chamber, and chagrin on this; but on neither side, nor in the country, will the sentiment meet even a respectful response, when the impulses of the hour shall have yielded to sober reflection. The honorable Senator from Illinois was not in the country when the Declaration of Independence was enunciated, nor when the Constitution was made; and yet he claims to understand both these instruments, and the purposes in view by their authors. Is this Kansas law more difficult of comprehension? Perhaps it is. At all events, it has certainly required more explanation at the hands of its author; and it might seem that, so long as he finds it necessary to explain what he meant every month in the year, he could afford to pardon the President for the commission of even "fundamental error." But enough on this point. When the Senator shall have persuaded the people of the United States that the President does not understand the subject, I shall recur to it again.

But what will the honorable Senator say as to the views of the late President, who was not out of the country when the law passed, but participated in every step of the struggle that gave it existence? He certainly understands the question; and I have sufficient authority for saying that he agrees with his successor on his Kansas policy, and consequently differs with the Senator from Illinois.

The most harmless part of the Senator's speech is that in which, whilst making a broad issue with the Administration, he has attempted to show that the President's views sustain those expressed by himself. He is certainly entitled to all he can make for his cause in this way; but if there was no great difference between the President and himself, there was then the less reason for making the issue. The President's character for candor and fairness forbade that he should withhold or give the slightest coloring to any fact in the case, with a view even of sustaining the conclusions at which he felt required to arrive. Nor could he approach the subject in a partisan spirit. He has not cared to deal with the follies, wrongs, and bitter feelings which have been manifested on either side of the question, in or out of Kansas; but he has preferred to consider the present and the future, and to determine what is best for the country. I do not claim for him infallibility of judgment, for that does not belong to humanity; but I do claim for him the highest degree of patriotism and disinterestedness in all he has said and done on this dangerous question. The idea that he would seek to oppress any class of the people of Kansas, or desire to impose upon them an odious Government, should not be, and I trust is not, entertained in any quarter; that he will not trifle with this, or any other great question; and that, having recognized the validity of the laws in Kansas, and the right of the convention to make a constitution and State government one day, he does not discard that view the next, is but consistent with his character for integrity of purpose, and clearness of perception.

But what does the Senator mean by assuming that the Kansas policy of the message is not an Administration measure? Does he mean that the Cabinet do not agree with the President? I understand differently. Or does he mean that the Administration, having laid down its policy, will hold that those who assail and denounce that policy do not oppose the Administration? There is surely no room for misunderstanding on this point, and it is certainly not difficult to discover from the message of the President what that policy is. The Administration recognizes the legality of the proceedings in Kansas, so far as they have progressed in the matter of making a constitution and State government preparatory to admission into the Union as a State. They hold that the Legislature of the Territory had the right to call a convention of delegates to be elected by the people to form a State constitution; that the convention, when so formed, had the legal right to form a constitution and submit their doings to the test of a popular vote, or send them to Congress and ask admission for the State under them; that the organic act having special reference to a controversy about slavery, which involved the whole country, the convention was morally bound to ascertain the sense of the people on this feature of their domestic policy, otherwise the spirit of the compromise on this angry feud would have failed of its true purpose so far as Kansas is concerned. They hold, further, that when the State shall ask admission, the constitution being republican in form, it will not be a sufficient reason to deny her admission, and thereby perpetuate the contest about slavery, that the ordinary forms of State government, about which there is seldom much controversy, and which can be changed at any time, had not first received the sanction of a popular vote; that this process is safest as a general principle, but that, under the clear terms of the organic law, it is a question for the people and their representatives in convention, with which the Federal Government has now no right to deal; that, if the delegates have acted in bad faith, they are accountable to the people who elected them, and not to Congress or to the Administration. So much for the views of the Administration.

Now I understand the Senator from Illinois not only to deny nearly all these positions of the Administration, and especially the right of the Legislature to call a convention—for he has said the law for that purpose was "null and void from the beginning;" but he goes further, and maintains that to admit the soundness of all the positions of the Administration, the State must not be admitted until the question of courts, corporations, banks, and railroads shall be settled by a vote of the people, and herein is the issue. As to the power of the Legislature to call a convention, it will be seen that the Senator comes in direct conflict with the views of Governor Walker, who, in his inaugural address, held that the Legislature was "the power ordained for that purpose." But the most startling doctrine involved in this position of the honorable Senator is the assumption that it is the right and duty of the Federal Government to interpose between the people of a Territory and their own local representatives. This never could have been a sound or safe practice as to any State or Territory; but it is utterly out of the question under the organic act for Kansas, which has committed all domestic and internal affairs to the people to be regulated "in their own way."

It is no matter of pleasure to me to recur to the unpleasant difference between the honorable Senator and myself, the other day, touching the consultation of Senators at his residence, in July, 1856, on the policy of the Toombs bill; but, however disagreeable the task, justice to myself requires that I should do so, especially since the character of that conference has been misunderstood in certain quarters. Nothing was further from my mind than to allude to any social or confidential interview. The meeting was not of that character. Indeed it was semi-official, and called to promote the public good. My recollection was clear that I left the conference under the impression that it had been deemed best to adopt measures to admit Kansas as a State through the agency of one popular election, and that for delegates to the convention. This impression was the stronger, because I thought the spirit of the bill infringed upon the doctrine of non-intervention, to which I had great aversion; but with the hope of accomplishing a great good, and as no movement had been made in that direction in the Territory, I waived this objection, and concluded to support the measure. I have a few items of testimony as to the correctness of these impressions, and with their submission I shall be content.

I have before me the bill reported by the Senator from Illinois, on the 7th of March, 1856, providing for the admission of Kansas as a State, the third section of which reads as follows:

"That the following propositions be, and the same are hereby, offered to the said convention of the people of Kansas, when formed, for their free acceptance or rejection; which, if accepted by the convention, and ratified by the people at the election for the adoption of the constitution, shall be obligatory upon the United States and the said State of Kansas."

The bill read in place by the Senator from Georgia, on the 25th of June, and referred to the Committee on Territories, contained the same section, word for word. Both these bills were under consideration at the conference referred to; but, sir, when the Senator from Illinois reported the Toombs bill to the Senate, with amendments, the next morning it did not contain that portion of the third section which indicated to the convention that the constitution should be approved by the people. The words, "and ratified by the people at the election for the adoption of the constitution," had been stricken out. Who struck these words out, or for what purpose they were omitted, is not for me to answer. But, sir, I cannot be persuaded that it was intended thereby to secure to the people of Kansas the right to vote on the constitution. I know the Senator assumed the other day, that wherever the law is silent on the subject, the inference is in favor of submission; but, sir, a full examination of the precedents bearing on that point has shown me that the converse of the proposition has the weight of authority, and that which he has laid down as the rule of precedent, has seldom, if ever, happened. Indeed, I failed to discover a single instance in which the people have voted on the preparatory constitution where the act of Congress was silent on the subject. But, yielding this point, how is the Senator to reconcile this position with the understanding of the subject he has so clearly indicated on other occasions? For instance, if it be an allowable conclusion, that where the law is silent on the subject, the constitution must be submitted to a vote of the people, why did the Senator insert the clause which I have already quoted in his bill of the 7th of March; and why did he insert a similar provision in the law for the admission of Minnesota? Then, again, if by striking these words out of the bill of the Senator from Georgia, its import was in no wise affected, why were they stricken out?

Such, sir, were the facts and circumstances which led me to believe that the Toombs bill was to bring Kansas into the Union without a vote on the constitution. Possibly my impressions are not warranted; but be that as it may, I cannot be persuaded that the Senator intended to secure to the people the right to vote on the constitution, by striking from the bill the words making that policy necessary, or that the convention would have been bound to extend that opportunity to the people, simply because the act of Congress said no such thing. But enough on this point. Now let me proceed to a more important branch of my remarks.

In order to a proper understanding of the subject under discussion, it is necessary to start with a clear view of the relations existing between the Territory of Kansas and the Federal Government. The organic law declares that "the legislative authority of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation;" and also that the people shall be left "perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

I hold that the extension to the people of the opportunity of so forming and regulating their institutions, by designating the times and places where they may meet and elect delegates, and where the delegates shall assemble when elected, and how they should proceed, is a rightful subject of legislation; and that the Legislature of Kansas was bound, as a matter of duty, to respond to the almost clamorous demand of the people for a change from their territorial to a State government, as manifested for two years past, a portion of whom had attempted to erect the Territory into a State in the most irregular and even unlawful manner; as they had also a right to take notice of the manifestations of willingness on the part of Congress, expressed in 1856, to receive the Territory into the Union even with her then meager population.

I hold also that there are but two sources of governmental authority for the people of a Territory—the one is Congress, the other is the people themselves; and that when Congress, as in the case of Kansas, has conferred upon the people all the legislative authority with which they were invested, the people are entirely unrestrained in the matter of institutions of government, except by the Constitution of the United States. It needs no argument, then, to show that the people of Kansas have a right, under the organic law, to adopt any measures they may deem proper to change their form of government; that in doing this they have a right to delegate their sovereign authority to representatives to any extent they please—to the extent only of preparing forms of government for their supervision, acceptance, and ratification, or to the extent of making and adopting a constitution and State government for admission into the Union; that where there is no limitation in the original grant of authority, the latter measure of power may be exercised; that the sovereignty of the people is inalienable, and must revert to them after having performed the functions for which it was delegated, and that therefore the people are at all times clothed with authority to alter and amend their forms of government; but to hold that the people cannot delegate their sovereign authority to make laws for their own use and enjoyment, is to discard our whole representative system, and the practice under it since the Government began. And to say that laws so made, unless the popular sense is taken upon them, are oppressive or wanting in authority, is to lay down a rule which would require the submission of all the statutes to the popular vote. Indeed, on this principle, the Declaration of Independence, the Bill of Rights, the Constitution of the United States, might be called acts of oppression, for neither received the sanction of a popular vote.

I maintain that the people of Kansas have the right to make a constitution and State government; that Congress cannot participate in that work, either as to its substance or form; that whilst Congress might attempt to prescribe how the people should do this, it would be optional with them whether they adopted that way or pursued some form of their own. Congress may invite the people to make their government in a prescribed mode, but cannot require compliance, except that Congress could refuse the Territory admission as a State; but this proceeding of the people must be in accordance with and under the direction of the laws of the Territory; it must be the offspring of law, and not of a spirit of rebellion, as in the case of the Topeka convention.

I do not understand the honorable Senator from Illinois to hold an enabling act to be indispensable in all cases. He cannot hold this in the face of the numerous precedents to the contrary; but he certainly does maintain that in the case of Kansas, all that the people have done shall be disregarded, not because they have not done it according to law, but for the reason that, in his opinion, they have not done it in the right way. Waiving for the present the question as to whether their way was right or not, the first question that suggests itself to the mind is, what has become of the great Kansas-Nebraska law; that new charter of rights to the people of the Territories, which declares that it is "not intended to legislate slavery into any Territory, or exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people perfectly free to make their domestic institutions in their own way?" Is it to be abandoned, and thus summarily pronounced a failure? Be that as it may, he cannot convince me that the people have not the right to make their domestic institutions in their own way, until he repeals so much of the organic act as says they shall do this precise thing.

It has conferred upon the people not only all the powers Congress possessed under the Constitution, as to the kind of institutions which should be made, but also, and just as expressly, as to the mode, manner, and way of making them. The Senator proposes to reject what the people have done, and confer upon them new grants of power; and yet, if there is any one thing clear in all this Kansas question, it is, that as to the kind of institutions the people shall have, and the way in which they shall be made, they already have complete authority. It is true that Congress still has the power to say that Kansas shall not come into the Union; but I cannot see how that body can confer any additional authority as to the way in which she shall be prepared to come in. I will not be contradicted when I say that the question between the friends and enemies of the Kansas bill, was, whether the people of the whole Union, acting through their representatives in Congress, should legislate on slavery in the Territory—no one ever claiming the right to legislate on any other domestic institution—or whether the question should be dealt with by the people of the Territory, in their own way, through local representatives of their own selection. This question was settled as no other question had ever been settled before—by the concurrence of all the departments of Government, by Congress, by the executive, by the judiciary, and by the people at the polls. And, Mr. President, I must confess to great amazement when I heard the honorable Senator assume, the other day, that the people of Kansas, acting under his boasted grant of "perfect freedom," could not, in the matter of making a government for themselves, rise above the dignity of suppliants to Congress to ratify their irregular and unauthorized proceedings; not on the ground, even, that what they had done was itself entirely inadmissible, but because it had not been done in the right way. The organic act says they shall do this thing "in their own way." Will the Senator say the way they have embraced was not the way of the people? Will he contend, in the face of his Springfield speech—to which I shall allude more particularly hereafter—that the people have not had a fair opportunity to reflect their will through the ballot-box; or, if a portion of them refuse to do this when invited, because they are determined to disregard their own local laws, that the responsibility is not their own? Certainly not.

Wherein, then, is the case of the convention defective? I deny in toto the Senator's right to go behind the legal and authorized aspect of the case. Congress is not hereafter to deal with the question of making institutions in Kansas, either as to their character or mode of formation. The rights of the people as to this matter are circumscribed by the Constitution only; and when an issue between their action and that instrument shall arise, it must be a question for the judiciary, and not for Congress; and so the Senator from Illinois has often held, especially on the question of squatter sovereignty. When, therefore, the people apply to Congress for admission as a State, through the agency of a convention of delegates selected by themselves in a legal and orderly manner, under the broad terms of the organic act, and in these days of non-intervention, having decided the slavery question by popular vote, the only proper inquiry for Congress will be: Is the constitution republican? Mr. Madison's discussion of the obligations of the Federal Government to guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government, to be found in the "Federalist," but which is too voluminous for use on the present occasion, is, to my mind, clear on this point.

The honorable Senator has resorted to musty authorities to sustain his new positions; but I am not disposed to resort to means of that kind to controvert them. Indeed, it would hardly be fair in these days of non-intervention. I had supposed that, after the era of this new doctrine, old relics would be forgotten, and that we were to have a simple, plain system for the Territories, to wit: that the people from all the States should go into the Territories with all their property, including slaves, and legislate for themselves up to the full measure allowable by the Constitution of the United States, without revision or interference by Congress; and that, in their own time and in their own way, they should be allowed to prepare for and ask admission as States. Besides, it is extremely difficult to tell exactly what the precedents of Congress, States, and statesmen, would teach on this subject. I have taxed my brain to the utmost to make a fair deduction from this complicated contest, and find it exceedingly difficult to show decisive authority for any of the points involved. I discover that the States of Maine, Michigan, Vermont, Arkansas, Tennessee, Texas, Iowa, Florida, and California, were admitted into the Union without what is called enabling acts; Ohio, Indiana, Mississippi, Louisiana, Illinois, Alabama, Missouri, and Arkansas, came in under acts of Congress; and that Vermont, Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, Missouri, Arkansas, and Wisconsin, according to the best authority I can find, came into the Union under constitutions which had not been submitted to the popular vote. Certain States, under enabling acts, may have submitted their constitutions to a vote of the people, and others have not. There seems to have been no uniformity of action on the part of the new States or of Congress. The precedents established by statesmen are still more dubious.

Even the honorable Senator from Illinois does not seem to have held the same views at all times on the questions under consideration. At present, he doubts the policy of admitting Kansas, because her entire constitution was not submitted to a vote of the people; yet he voted for an enabling act for Kansas, which did not require that any part of the constitution should be submitted. He denies the authority of a convention of the people of the Territory of Kansas to make a State government, even under the enlarged powers conferred by his own favorite law of 1854; and yet he voted to admit California as a State, she having made a constitution and State government without even the color of authority from Congress, the incipient steps of which had their origin in the orders of a military commander. I make no charge of inconsistency against the honorable Senator, and surely none as to the purity of his motives. I state these things to show the difficulty of the subject; but I do say, that when the Senator picked up the charge of inconsistency made against the President the other day, by his colleague, on the Michigan and Arkansas cases, and when afterwards, replying to a similar allegation against himself, he said: "I am not one of those who boast that they have never changed their opinion," "I do not know that a month has ever passed over my head in which I have not modified some opinion to some degree," he ought to have extended the same charitable rule to the President.

But he holds that when the people of Kansas move in the matter of establishing their government, that movement, though it may not be illegal, is irregular, and does not rise above the importance of a petition for redress of grievances. How will this sentiment be relished by the proud men who have gone to Kansas from all parts of the Union, believing they had been vested with the "great principle of self-government?" They will scarcely realize their new attitude.

But it is said they can petition Congress for redress of grievances. When was it pretended that individuals or communities could not petition Congress for redress of grievances? In God's name, who ever denied that right? Is that all the people have gained by non-intervention? Is that the full fruits of perfect freedom in Kansas? Is that what we have gained in this long struggle? If it be, then I must confess I have never understood the question; nor do I believe the people have understood it. If the right to make institutions in such a way as Congress prescribes, and send them to Congress in the shape of a petition for redress of grievances, is all the people have gained by non-intervention, with the moral and legal right in Congress to send that petition back for alteration, though the constitution be republican in form, then the Senator's law of 1854 is a bald imposture, a delusion, and a deception—"the word of promise to the ear to be broken to the hope"—"the thorn beneath the rose."

But let us pass to a more practical view of the subject. My own reflections on the dangerous controversy in Kansas, considering the sources and the character of the strife, satisfied my mind, even before I became a member of this body, that the surest, if not the only way of ending this bitter sectional struggle, and quieting the country, was to admit Kansas as a State at the earliest period practicable, thereby circumscribing all concern about her affairs within her own limits, where the differences, whatever they might be, could not fail of prompt and legitimate adjustment. Entertaining these impressions and views, I was rejoiced to perceive that the people of Kansas had determined to call a convention to form a constitution and State government preparatory to admission into the Union as a State. The propriety and validity of this movement for a convention, under direction of the territorial laws, had been promptly recognized by the President in his instructions to Governor Walker, and then again in his Connecticut letter. Governor Walker did the same thing in his first address, and urged the people to the performance of their duty under the law, in the following emphatic terms:

"The people of Kansas, then, are invited by the highest authority known to the Constitution to participate freely and fairly in the election of delegates to frame a constitution and State government. The law has performed its entire appropriate function when it extends to the people the right of suffrage, but it cannot compel the performance of that duty. Throughout our whole Union, however, and wherever free government prevails, those who abstain from the exercise of the right of suffrage, authorize those who do vote to act for them in that contingency, and the absentees are as much bound under the law and Constitution, where there is no fraud or violence, by the act of the majority of those who do vote, as although all had participated in the election. Otherwise, as voting must be voluntary, self-government would be impracticable, and monarchy or despotism would remain as the only alternative.

"You should not console yourselves, my fellow-citizens, with the reflection that you may, by a subsequent vote, defeat the ratification of the constitution. Although most anxious to secure to you the exercise of that great constitutional right, and believing that the convention is the servant and not the master of the people, yet I have no power to dictate the proceedings of that body. I cannot doubt, however, the course they will adopt on this subject. But why incur the hazard of the preliminary formation of a constitution by a minority, as alleged by you, when a majority, by their own votes, could control the forming of that instrument?"

"But it is said that the convention is not legally called, and that the election will not be freely and fairly conducted. The Territorial Legislature is the power ordained for this purpose by the Congress of the United States; and in opposing it you resist the authority of the Federal Government. That Legislature was called into being by the Congress of 1854, and is recognized in the very latest congressional legislation. It is recognized by the present Chief Magistrate of the Union, just chosen by the American people, and many of its acts are now in operation here by universal assent. As the Governor of the Territory of Kansas, I must support the laws and the Constitution; and I have no other alternative under my oath, but to see that all constitutional laws are fully and fairly executed."

Mr. Secretary Stanton, under the instructions of the President and Governor, addressed the people as follows:

"The Government especially recognizes the territorial act which provides for assembling a convention to form a constitution, with a view of making application to Congress for admission as a State into the Union. That act is regarded as presenting the only test of the qualification of voters for delegates to the convention, and all preceding repugnant restrictions are thereby repealed. In this light, the act must be allowed to have provided for a full and fair expression of the will of the people through the delegates who may be chosen to represent them in the constitutional convention. I do not doubt, however, that, in order to avoid all pretext for resistance to the peaceful operation of this law, the convention itself will, in some form, provide for submitting the great distracting question regarding their social institutions, which has so long agitated the people of Kansas, to a fair vote of all the actual bona fide residents of the Territory, with every possible security against fraud and violence. If the constitution be thus framed, and the question of difference thus submitted to the decision of the people, I believe that Kansas will be admitted by Congress without delay as one of the sovereign States of the American Union, and the territorial authorities will be immediately withdrawn."

These quotations are full of striking ideas, which invite special attention at this time. The first is the full recognition, by both the Governor and Secretary, of the validity of the law calling the convention; another is, that the convention, when formed, would have a right to make a constitution and submit it to a vote or not; and this is one of the reasons of the Governor for urging the people to attend the polls and vote. "Those who abstain from the right of suffrage," says the Governor, "authorize those who do vote to act for them." He says "the convention is legally called," "because the Territorial Legislature is the power ordained for this purpose." But what is most remarkable, and most to the point, is, that Mr. Stanton indicated, at that early day, that the submission of "the great distracting question" (slavery) was all that would be necessary to give Kansas peace and the dignity of a State. He even then indicated, most pointedly, the policy afterwards adopted by the convention.

The Senator from Illinois, in a speech delivered at Springfield, in his State, on the 12th of June last, said:

"Kansas is about to speak for herself through her delegates assembled in convention to form a constitution preparatory to her admission into the Union." "The law under which her delegates are about to be elected is believed to be just and fair in all its objects and provisions."

With all this mass of authority to sustain them, the people of the Territory, or those of them who were willing to sustain the laws which the President, Governor Walker, and the Senator from Illinois held to be proper and binding, proceeded to make a constitution and State government. But those who said the laws should not be obeyed refused to participate in this work, and from this spirit of insubordination, in my judgment, all the subsequent mischief has arisen. They would not attend at the polls, and vote for delegates to carry out their will in the convention; not because they did not wish to have a State government—for the same men had attempted to erect Kansas into a State in the most irregular and unauthorized mode—but for the reason that they had commenced rebellion against the laws, and were determined to persist in it! And it is, in the main, these very men who at this moment are clamoring most about oppression and usurpation, and about sacred rights, which they indignantly refused to exercise. Governor Walker labored zealously to bring these men to the performance of their duty, as is shown in the extract I have given from his address. But they were joined to their idol—the Topeka farce. The consequence was, that there was virtually no contest for delegates, and only about twenty-two hundred votes were polled. But still the convention, on the theory of Governor Walker, had been invested with the authority of nearly the whole population to make a constitution and State government.

This large class of the people who neglected to vote for delegates became clamorous against the convention, and even assembled at Topeka for the avowed purpose of putting their own bogus government into operation. I was in the Territory for some time prior to and after the election, and speak from personal observation as to the spirit of insubordination manifested by some, expending itself in bitter denunciations of the President and Governor Walker for attempting to administer what, in the chaste phrase of the malcontents, were the "bogus laws of a bogus Legislature," averring that they would have no form of government from the convention gotten up under these laws no matter how perfect it might be; that though that "bogus convention" should submit for their approval their own Topeka constitution, they would spurn it with contempt. This spirit was persisted in to the end. Governor Walker, as must be obvious to all, was not and could not be vested with any authority over the subject of making a State government. His functions were to administer the laws, and perform the executive duties generally, which he did discharge with great ability. But beyond this, he could not go. He had no connection with, agency in, or responsibility for the work of making a constitution. In the exercise of his discretion, and with the intention of doing what was best, he had at first advised the people to vote, but all would not do so. He also urged the delegates composing the convention to submit their work to the approval of the people, holding this to be right as a general principle, and especially necessary in view of the small vote cast for delegates. But the convention submitted only the article relating to slavery. That it ought to have submitted the constitution in some form to give the people the right to judge of its several parts, I agree; and as a citizen of Kansas I should have insisted on this policy, but I should certainly have desired a vote on the question of slavery as proposed by the late convention, disconnected from all other subjects, in preference to a vote on the constitution as a whole.

For its action, the convention has been most roundly abused; and I do not intend to come to its defense, for from many of the details of its proceedings I dissent. But it would not be candid to contend that there was nothing in the bearing of the enemies of the convention to impel it to fully exhaust, if not to abuse, the authority with which it had been clothed. The incessant menaces of the violent leaders of the Republican party, who, in my judgment, never desired to have the controversy settled, was calculated to do this. The declaration that they would not judge of the merits of any form of government it might make; but would reject it, if possible, at the polls, for reasons mischievous and rebellious, was also calculated to produce such action. Nor is it candid to contend that this class of politicians in the Territory, and others out of it, when they dwelt on the importance of submitting the constitution to the test of popular favor, had reference to disputes about railroads, banks, corporations, courts, or legislative functions. The question—the all-absorbing, and the only question—was, shall Kansas be a free or slave State? I believe Governor Walker went much further; and yet the very men who threatened to rebel on his hands at Topeka, and who put him through the shorter catechism of Kansas politics, never would have met him there, nor mentioned the name of constitution, had it not been for the question of slavery. They said "constitution," it is true; for the idea of a separate submission had not then been raised; but even they had no other question on their minds than that of whether Kansas should be a free or a slave State. Throughout this broad land, this has been treated as the question, and the only one.

That question the people of Kansas had an opportunity to settle in June last, by electing delegates to carry out their will. They are to have another to-day, by voting on so much of the constitution as relates to that subject. After all that has been said about fraud and trickery, touching this issue, the great overshadowing fact cannot be denied, that the people of Kansas have had two opportunities to make her a free State. I am aware, sir, that the registry of voters at the election in June was very defective; but that was no reason why those who were registered should not vote. That complaint, however, cannot be made as to the vote on the slavery article, for no registry is required, and every white citizen above twenty-one years of age can vote. I regard the registry as very imperfect, but I cannot understand the picture presented by Governor Walker, in a recent letter, addressed to the President. He undertakes to show that less than one half of the voters were registered when the delegates were elected, and yet the records show that over nine thousand names were registered in June, and that the whole vote for the congressional delegate, in October last, after an exciting contest, and a large increase of population, was only a little over twelve thousand. How this mystery is to be solved I cannot tell, but the statements are singularly contradictory.

What my action may be on the question of admission, should the new constitution be presented, I cannot precisely foresee. The case is not yet fully developed. No man can tell what a day may bring forth in Kansas. Those who are to conduct the election upon the slavery article have been vested with large and dangerous powers, the use of which they may, if they choose, abuse to such an extent as to forbid the recognition of the result whatever it may be. But if that election be fairly conducted, I shall feel required to vote for the admission of the State either with or without slavery. I should do this under the firm belief that it is the best mode possible of putting an end to the existing strife; for, after all, when we look at this question practically, it does not involve half so much as some would make us believe. When the State shall have been admitted, not only slavery, but all other institutions, will be subject to be changed and remodeled by the people. They can, if they please, do this within six months after Kansas becomes a State, and enjoy the same opportunity, whenever they desire it, forever thereafter. Why then contest the question as though the institutions under which the State may be admitted were to be, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, unchangeable? I know it is alleged that the constitution cannot be changed prior to 1864; but that view cannot be maintained. Without discussing the terms of the schedule, which simply prescribes the mode in which the constitution shall be amended after 1864, the bill of rights is conclusive on this point. It declares that:

"All political power is inherent in the people, [of Kansas,] and all free governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their benefit, and therefore they have at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government in such manner as they may think proper."

The mode of voting has also been a subject of criticism. The honorable Senator maintains that the elector must give his sanction to all the other provisions of the constitution before he can enjoy the opportunity of voting for or against slavery. This is clearly a mistake. The ballot, "constitution with slavery," or "constitution without slavery," involves only the slavery clause. It is simply the question of whether Kansas shall be a free or a slave State, under the general forms agreed upon by the constitution. That this was intended by the convention, is made clear by its proceedings, if they have been given to me accurately by a gentleman from Leecompton. His information is, that before the adoption of the form of voting, the sense of the convention was taken on the proposition to submit the whole constitution to a vote of the people, which was decided in the negative, and never reconsidered. Subsequently, a motion to submit the slavery article was agreed to by a majority of two votes. This view is clearly sustained by the proclamation of the president of the convention, in which he says the vote shall be for or against the introduction of slavery into the State of Kansas.

The voting shall be by ballot, and those voting for Kansas as a slave State shall vote a ballot with the words "constitution with slavery," and those voting for Kansas to be a free State shall vote a ballot with the words "constitution with no slavery." It must be evident that if it had been intended to take the sanction of the elector on the whole constitution, the ballot would have been "for" the constitution. The honorable Senator, and others who take his view, will be the first to deny, when the constitution is presented to Congress, that it has the sanction of the people.

But the honorable Senator has labored to maintain his position by confounding the slavery question with the ordinary institutions of a civilized community. Notice the extraordinary character of the following extract from his late speech:

"Sir, what would this boasted principle of popular sovereignty have been worth, if it applied only to the negro, and did not extend to the white man? Do you think we could have aroused the sympathies and the patriotism of this broad Republic, and have carried the presidential election last year in the face of a tremendous opposition, on the principle of extending the right of self-government to the negro question, but denying it as to all the relations affecting white men?" * * * "Sir, I have spent too much strength and breath and money, too, to establish this great principle in the popular heart, now to see it frittered away by bringing it down to an exception that applies to the negro, and does not extend to the benefit of the white man."

Now, Mr. President, can it be possible that the Senator from Illinois expected to make the Senate and the country believe that the people of Kansas are indebted to the famous organic act for their right to the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property, and the ordinary institutions of a civilized community? He scouts the idea that the great principle of popular sovereignty should be "frittered away by bringing it down to an exception that applies to the negro, and not to the white man." Whatever he may mean, his language is certainly calculated to make the impression that the Kansas-Nebraska bill settled some dispute about the ordinary institutions of government in the Territories. I cannot agree, sir, that that view is either candid or allowable. Who ever denied the right of the people to make their ordinary institutions? When was that a question which divided parties, or shook the Union to its foundation? The simple truth is, that the question of slavery, and that only, was involved and considered in passing the Kansas-Nebraska bill. It was to settle that dangerous sectional feud that the doctrine of non-intervention was adopted. The repeal of the Missouri line has in no way affected the right of the people to have all other domestic institutions either north or south of that line; and when the Senator asks what the boasted principles of popular sovereignty would have been worth if applied only to the negro, and "not to the white man," he utters a sentiment which is unworthy of the subject. What part are negroes to have in the government of Kansas, or who is proposing to restrict any of the rights of the white man, unless it be himself, when he denies them the right to make a government without the consent of Congress? I know how presumptuous it is in me to differ with that Senator; but I cannot forbear to deny that the question of railroads, courts, banks, legislative functions, &c., were in any way involved in the repeal of the Missouri line, and the inauguration of the doctrine of non-intervention; and yet, sir, the Senator has confounded the question of slavery, and that of the natural, inalienable, and undisputed rights of the people, in such a way as to make the impression, if possible, that all these had been granted, guaranteed, and protected by a new bill of rights, adopted in 1854, in the shape of the Kansas-Nebraska law.

Then, again, as to the vote on the slavery clause, he says:

"Let me ask, sir, is the slavery clause fairly submitted, so that the people can vote for or against it? Suppose I were a citizen of Kansas, and should go up to the polls and say, 'I desire to vote to make Kansas a slave State; here is my ballot.' They reply to me, 'Mr. Douglas, just vote for that constitution first, if you please.' 'Oh, no!' I answer, 'I cannot, conscientiously.'"

This, Mr. President, is hardly plausible; for I have already shown the fallacy of the Senator's assumption, that the elector is to be required to approve the constitution entire, before he can vote for or against slavery. I now propose to show that the Senator's plan would be liable to nearly the same objections.

He insists that the constitution, as a whole, should be submitted. Now suppose this had been done with the slavery article in it, and he had made his appearance at the polls as a pro-slavery man. Looking at the constitution, he finds that he cannot approve of the other provisions. He says, "I wish to vote for slavery, but it is not possible that I can swallow the bank and railroad scheme, and the plan for courts and corporations in this constitution. I cannot conscientiously do this; and I must be deprived of the right to establish slavery in the Territory." Then suppose he appeared again as a free State man; the constitution in the main is very acceptable to him, and he is exceedingly anxious to approve it, but it contains the provisions recognizing slavery, which he cannot approve; and again he is driven from the polls. It will thus be seen how easy it is to complain; but how will the Senator guard against the repetition of similar hardships, under any law Congress may pass? Certainly, he will not propose to prescribe all the action of the people in convention. This has never been done, and never can be done. The truth is, that the Senator in his ardor to maintain what he conceives to be a just position, has been driven into the use of abstruse technicalities, and, in more instances than one in this discussion, has dwelt upon alleged wrongs in the proceedings of the Leecompton convention, against the repetition of which he can in no way protect the people.

In another part of his speech the honorable Senator remarks:

"But I am beseeched to wait until I hear from the election on the 21st of December. I am told that perhaps that will put it all right, and will save the whole difficulty. How can it? Perhaps there may be a large vote. There may be a large vote returned." [Laughter.]

Here, again, it is difficult to determine what he means to allege. He says "there may be a large vote returned." His language would seem to imply an imputation upon somebody or power connected with the election. Upon whom is it to fall? Not upon his friend, John Calhoun, whom he has indorsed to one of the Departments in this city as a worthy and competent man for Surveyor-General. From whence, then, is the fraud to come? No department of the Government here will have an opportunity to do this, and none would embrace it. Then, where is it to be practiced? By those who conduct the election in the Territory? How they may act, I cannot say; but if there are no honest men in Kansas to hold the election, then the Senator cannot have a fair election under his proposed remedy; unless, indeed, he has concluded that the Republicans out there have more honesty than his own party friends. He will be slow to say, however, that men who have resisted the laws from the beginning, and so often incurred his just indignation for their folly, are more reliable than the Democratic party. I can only say that, if he thinks this, he has changed his estimate of the character of both parties within a brief period. But, be this as it may, the Senator has lamented an evil which he cannot remedy. Then, again, he says:

"I care not how that vote may stand. I take it for granted that it will be voted out. I think I have seen enough in the last three days to make it certain that it will be returned out, no matter how the vote may stand." [Laughter.]

Here is a second edition of anticipated fraud. I heard with pain and regret these words as they fell from the Senator's lips. How does he know that the slavery article will be "returned out," no matter how the vote may stand? What had the Senator seen within three days to force this conclusion upon his mind? If he has knowledge of a scheme of base fraud to cheat the people, or to impose on Congress, I know he is the man to develop it; and when so developed, no man will go further than myself to punish the offenders. If he cannot do this, then why allude to it at all? Why, in this unhappy manner and offensive spirit, cast imputation upon those who have been, and are still, his friends? I can readily perceive—and it is that which I most regret—how such a sentiment from so high a source is calculated to produce discontents and clamor about real or imaginary wrongs, when the result shall have been ascertained. It is virtually an invitation to malcontents to continue the strife.

The honorable Senator, in his diligent efforts to render the doings of the Lecompton convention odious, has even dwelt on that clause of the proposed constitution interdicting the migration of free negroes to Kansas. He was candid enough to admit that the constitution of his own State contained the same inhibition; and we all know that the Topeka party, by a popular vote, have instructed the Legislature to pass a law to the same effect. But the Senator should have done "the Lecompton concern," as he is pleased to term it, the justice to say, that on this point, at least, it had conformed to the popular will, for both parties have spoken against the admission of free negroes. Nor has he even told us that his native State, Vermont, practiced that great measure of wrong upon the people, if wrong it be, of asking admission for the State before the people had voted on the constitution; nor that his adopted State came into the Union without an enabling act half so good as the Kansas-Nebraska law; and that this same State, no longer since than 1848, set the example for the late action of Kansas, by submitting a part and withholding a part of the constitution from a vote of the people.

The Senator will pardon me for looking a little further into his views. In an address delivered at Springfield on the 12th of June last, touching Kansas affairs, he says:

"Kansas is about to speak for herself through her delegates assembled in convention to form a State constitution, preparatory to admission into the Union." "The law under which her delegates are about to be elected, is believed to be just and fair in all its objects and purposes." * * * "There is every reason to believe the law will be fairly interpreted and impartially executed." * * * "The election law is acknowledged to be fair and just, and the rights of the voters are clearly defined, and the exercise of those rights will be efficiently and scrupulously protected."

Then, again, he says:

"The organic act secures to the people of Kansas the sole and exclusive right of forming and regulating their domestic institutions to suit themselves, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

He denounces all neglect of, or resistance to, the movement for a convention, and says, that if any portion of the people refuse to vote for delegates, and Kansas should become a slave State through their neglect, upon them the responsibility should fall. I should prefer to give the entire speech, but I do not wish to extend my remarks to so great a length. Now let us turn to what he said in the Senate the other day:

"If you apply these principles to the Kansas convention, you find that it had no power to do any act as a convention forming a government; you find that the act calling it was null and void from the beginning; you find that the Legislature could confer no power whatever on the convention. That convention was simply an assemblage of peaceable citizens, under the Constitution of the United States, petitioning for the redress of grievances, and, thus assembled, had the right to put their petition in the form of a constitution if they chose; but still it was only a petition, having the force of a petition, which Congress could accept or reject, or dispose of as it saw proper. That is what I understand to be just the extent of the power and authority of this convention assembled at Lecompton."

How to reconcile these sentiments I cannot see. In the Springfield speech, he says, "Kansas is about to speak for herself through delegates assembled in convention to form a State constitution," and that the law under which her delegates were about to be elected is believed to be just and fair in all its objects and purposes. In the Senate, he says:

"You find that the act calling it [the convention] was null and void from the beginning; you find the Legislature could confer no power whatever on the convention."

Then, again, at Springfield, he says:

"The organic act secures to the people of Kansas the sole and exclusive right of forming and regulating their domestic institutions to suit themselves, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

In the Senate, he says that the convention, which was, from its very nature, an assemblage of the people, through their representatives, "was simply an assemblage of peaceable citizens, under the Constitution of the United States to petition for the redress of grievances;" which petition Congress could accept, or reject, or dispose of as it saw proper. Comment is scarcely necessary. If the right of the people in the matter of making a government for themselves be limited only by the Constitution, as claimed by the Senator in his Springfield speech, I should like to know where he finds the authority for congressional interference. Nor can I see how he could designate a law as just and fair in all its purposes, which he at the same time held to be "null and void from the beginning;" or what he could mean by saying that Kansas is about to speak for herself, holding at the same time that she cannot speak at all without the permission of Congress.

But this is not all, sir. I want to call attention to another view of this Springfield speech, which I have before me. The honorable Senator has maintained in this body that the failure on the part of the convention to submit the constitution to the approval of the people, is a reason why the State should not be admitted; and yet, in this Springfield address, though made after the appearance of the inaugurals of Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton, no reference whatever is made to a vote on the constitution. He made special note of the election for delegates, but nowhere hinted that there was to be an election on the constitution after it was formed by that convention. If he knew the law calling the convention to be "null and void," and that the convention would not be vested with authority to make a constitution and State government, I can hardly see how he could fail to say so. I may be mistaken; but it seems to me that, as the statesman above all others who has had this subject in charge, and the people of Kansas in keeping, he might have admonished them of the mistake they were about to make, or at least hinted to them that their proceedings, though not against law, were irregular, and could be of no avail. I can hardly imagine how the Senator could have refrained from doing this. Nor can I see how he could say to the free-State men that, if they neglected to vote for delegates, Kansas would become a slave State through their neglect, if he at the same time held that the delegates which were to be elected would have no right to make a constitution of any kind. Holding now that the question of railroads, banks, and corporations must be voted upon by the people before the State can come into the Union, is it not a little singular that, at the opportune date of his Springfield speech, he failed to drop the remotest hint that it was necessary that the people should vote on these questions, or on even the all-absorbing question of domestic slavery—the only question that ever was involved in the affairs of Kansas? Whilst the Senator was notifying the free-State men of Kansas of their rights and privileges, and the mode by which they could prevent Kansas from becoming a slave State, is it not strange that he failed to inform them that they would have an opportunity of voting down the slave constitution, when submitted to them for ratification, if at that time he held that such a submission was essential to its validity?

But where are our friends on the other side to be found on this new issue? They cannot object to the informalities and irregularities at Lecompton; for they have contended for nothing else at Topeka. They have urged the admission of Kansas as a State on the proceedings of a party convention gotten up without the color of law, and in derogation of the authority of the territorial and the United States Government. Nor, indeed, can they complain that all the people have not had an opportunity to participate in the decision on the slavery question; for it was an article in their faith, declared in the Fremont convention, that not only a portion, but all the citizens should be deprived of this right. They claimed the right for the people of the States, acting through Congress, which was virtually saying that those who did not go to Kansas should influence that decision, and that those who did go should have no representation on the subject.

Mr. President, I am nearly done with this subject. I have mainly followed the Senator from Illinois. Without sitting down to systematize my views, I have pursued the several topics pretty much as he presented them. On some points I may have fallen into error; on others perhaps I may have manifested too much feeling; but I beg to say to the Senate, and especially to the Senator from Illinois, that I have in this matter but performed what I conceive to be simply a right and a duty on my part as a Senator.

Whilst laying down those rules and principles which are the result of my humble judgment after all the reflection I could give the subject, I shall, above all things, be controlled by a desire to give peace to the country, and to silence forever a dangerous feud that at times menaces the stability of our great Government. What I mean to say is, that if the exigency arises, there shall be on my part no want of concession or compromise that will secure the adjustment of this unhappy controversy; nor will I agree to be placed in a wrong attitude upon the great question which is the leading idea in this discussion. No man shall say, because of the remarks I have made, that I am against giving the people the right to make their own laws, or that I would circumscribe the use of those great inalienable and fundamental rights which lie at the foundation of our republican system. I intend no such thing; but considering this question in all its bearings, I have been impressed with the belief that it was an exigency which should be disposed of at the first reasonable opportunity, by admitting Kansas as a State.

Sir, it is painful to reflect on the aspect of this question. I do not know what may be in progress in Kansas at this moment. If anything I have said on any occasion, has ministered to the agitation which exists there to-day, and which some fear may approximate to civil war, I pray forgiveness. I stand pledged to unite with the Senator from Illinois in the patriotic sentiments which he uttered when he declared his desire to secure to the country peace on the slavery agitation. It has been magnified at every step; it has been aggravated every hour; and now, after a struggle of four years, the aspect is worse than ever. How are we to settle it? One party in Kansas is acting in a rebellious spirit, without authority of law; another has attempted to make a constitution by authority of law, and under the supervision of the Federal Government. We are to have, perhaps in a very few days, a contest between these propositions. When that contest shall come, I know where the Senator from Illinois will be. He will go with those who have acted according to law. I think I know him well enough to know that he estimates the recognition of resistance to law or rebellion, as one of the most unhappy incidents that could be connected with legislation at Washington.

I have said all that I desire to say, except, simply, that whatever is to come out of this unhappy embroglio in future, I feel authorized to pledge myself first to the maintenance of justice and principle, and then to every reasonable concession to give peace to the country.

Mr. STUART. I propose to submit some views to the Senate on this subject, when it shall be agreeable to the body to hear them. If it will suit their convenience, I will say to-morrow.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will ask the Senator to yield the floor to me for a few moments.

Mr. STUART. Certainly.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have listened attentively to the reading of the well-prepared speech of the Senator from Pennsylvania, and find but one or two points which I deem it necessary for me to notice.

I do not intend to be drawn into a reply to each speech that shall be made, even if it does appear to be the object to make a series of attacks on my consistency, and on the whole history of my public course, in order to avoid thereby the arguments which have been submitted on my side of this question. I shall not offer to repel those attacks. I am willing to leave my public record to speak for itself. I may sometimes be induced, on the spur of the moment, to repel them, but I do not choose to recriminate. I could have amused the Senate and the Senator from Pennsylvania with passages in his speeches and votes, if I chose. Some of his constituents, persons unknown to me, have been liberal in furnishing me with his votes for the Wilmot proviso, his movements to defeat the approval of the Kansas-Nebraska bill when it was pending, his speeches through Pennsylvania against the measure, and I do not know what various things, in order to show up his inconsistency. I know not whether they are true or false; I have thrown them aside. It matters not, in this argument, whether he has been consistent or inconsistent. That is a question between him and his constituents, and I leave it to them. Two members of Congress, who heard his speeches in Kansas last spring, have come to me and told me of his pledges there, that, if the constitution was not submitted to the people, he would resist it. Whether that be true or not, I know not; I care not. I do not think that enters into the question whether this constitution should be submitted to the people or not. I hardly understand the motive for ransacking the newspapers, the journals, and every scrap of information, to see what my course for twelve years has been on the slavery question.

Suppose it to be true, as it is, as stated by the Senator from Pennsylvania, that in 1848 I was desirous of abiding by the Missouri compromise, and extending it to the Pacific ocean, as recommended by Mr. Buchanan in his letter of the year previous; and suppose it to be true, as it is, that in 1854 I brought in a bill to repeal that Missouri compromise, which the President of the United States now approves of. When he establishes these two facts, he only shows that Mr. Buchanan and myself stood together in that inconsistency; but I do not think that is a material argument on the question whether popular sovereignty, to which he and I are both pledged, shall now be violated in Kansas. I am not going into a discussion of the point whether the President and myself were both right in 1848, in being for the extension of the Missouri line to the Pacific, or whether we were both right in its subsequent repeal; I have discussed those questions heretofore. I am willing that my record shall stand, and let the public judge whether I was right or wrong, on either or both those occasions.

The Senator has taken pains to hunt up a speech which I made at Springfield, Illinois, on the 12th of June last, and to read passages from that speech bearing on one part of the subject, and then to read paragraphs from my speech here on another branch of the subject, and hold them both up as if there was an apparent inconsistency between them. It may be so. What does it prove, if it be so? Does it prove that I am wrong now? I ask the gentleman to answer the argument I have presented now, whether or not the people of Kansas ought to be permitted to vote upon the adoption of their constitution. The quotation which the Senator has made from my Springfield speech goes to this extent: that in my opinion the Kansas law providing for a convention, was fair and just in its provisions; that I had faith that it would be fairly executed; that I thought it was the duty of the citizens to vote, and if they stayed away, it would be their own fault. That is the substance of what he quoted. If he had quoted what I said in my speech the other day, on the same subject, no explanation from me would have been necessary. Here is what I said in the Senate a few days ago:

"So far as the act of the Territorial Legislature of Kansas calling this convention was concerned, I have always been under the impression that it was fair and just in its provisions. I have always thought the people should have gone together en masse and voted for delegates, so that the voice expressed by the convention should have been the unquestioned and united voice of the people of Kansas. I have always thought that those who stayed away from that election stood in their own wrong, and should have gone and voted, and should have furnished their names to be put on the registered list, so as to be voters. I have always held that it was their own fault that they did not this go and vote; but yet, if they chose, they had a right to stay away. They had a right to say that that convention, although not an unlawful assemblage, is not a legal convention to make a government, and hence we are under no obligation to go and express any opinion about it. They had a right to say, if they chose, 'We will stay away until we see the constitution they shall frame, the petition they shall send to Congress; and when they submit it to us for ratification we will vote for it if we like it, or vote it down if we do not like it.' I say they had a right to do either, though I thought, and think yet, as good citizens, they ought to have gone and voted; but that was their business and not mine."

If, when the Senator quoted my Springfield speech as to the fairness of the law, he had quoted what I said the other day on the same point, he would have found that they were in perfect harmony, instead of being in antagonism. I confess it struck me that there was a want of fairness, a want of candor in bringing in from one speech remarks on one point of the subject and then bringing them in antagonism with remarks in another speech on a different branch, and applying the extracts as if they related to the same subject.

If the law was fair in its terms, as I supposed it was, what was my objection? I will tell you. At that time it was understood that the convention was to assemble for the purpose of framing a constitution to be submitted to the people for acceptance or ratification; hence I said I believed it was fair, not only in its provisions, but in its objects; for its avowed object was to frame a constitution, to be submitted to the people for ratification. I had seen at that time the inaugural address of Governor Walker, in which he said the constitution was to be submitted, in which, in substance, he said that he was instructed by the President and Cabinet to insist upon its submission, and in which he said that if the constitution were not submitted he would use every effort to cause it to be rejected by Congress, and that he spoke for one higher than himself when he made that pledge. Thus I had been informed that the executive Administration, including the President and every member of the Cabinet, had given a pledge to the people of Kansas that this constitution should be treated as null and void unless it was submitted to them for ratification. That being the object, the provisions of the law being fair on their face, I did not doubt that the President intended to redeem his pledge. I did not doubt that Mr. Walker was instructed to do what he had done. I did not doubt that Mr. Walker was acting in good faith. I did not doubt that the President was acting in entire good faith in giving the instructions. I therefore believed that the pledge was to be redeemed, and that the constitution was to be submitted to the people for acceptance or rejection. Under that belief, I did not hesitate to say that not only the provisions of the law were fair, but its objects were fair, and that I believed it was to be carried out in good faith. That was my opinion, and under that state of the case I expressed that opinion.

I am not going into a discussion of the question of how far the President has redeemed the pledges given through his instructions to Governor Walker, and repeated by Governor Walker in his inaugural. I hear men here denouncing Governor Walker for his interference in the local affairs of Kansas. I am not aware that Governor Walker has interfered in the slightest degree, except in pursuance of instructions given by the President of the United States, and admitted and acknowledged by the President in his message. I have never supposed that the agent was to be denounced for obeying instructions, and the principals to be applauded for giving the instructions. I admire the manliness of the President of the United States in stating that he did give those instructions to Governor Walker, and assuming the responsibility of them now. I only regret that he considers that perhaps it is wise, from motives of expediency, to accept this constitution without ratification, when he says he thinks it ought to have been submitted, and expresses his disappointment that it was not submitted. The Senator from Pennsylvania tells us it ought to have been submitted. Then let us do what ought to have been done. If it was right to submit the constitution to the people, why not let us do right, and let the policy and expediency of the measure take care of itself?

But the Senator from Pennsylvania takes pains to repeat what my friend from Missouri [Mr. GREEN] so well said in his speech in regard to the number of States which had been admitted into the Union without enabling acts, and the number which had been admitted into the Union without their constitutions having been submitted to the people for ratification. The Senator from Missouri had reason for stating those cases, for he understood me to make it a point, a sine qua non, that there should be an enabling act in each case, and that the constitution should be submitted to the people. But after the explanation I then gave, correcting the Senator from Missouri for the error into which he had unintentionally fallen, I did not expect to hear the Senator from Pennsylvania repeating the same argument, and assigning me the same position as if I had not disavowed it. I said before, and I say now, that the great cardinal point is, that the constitution must be the act of the people, and embody the will of the people of the proposed State. If it has been formed, and there is no dispute as to its embodying their will, if it is received by unanimous consent, as a fair expression of the popular will, it may be received in the same way as a court enters judgment by default, or judgment by confession, where the parties have had an opportunity of being heard, and nobody objects. I admit there have been cases where a State has been received into the Union without submitting its constitution to the people, because there was no dispute as to the constitution being the popular voice. As I said before, the true test is, is the constitution an embodiment of the popular will? If it is not, it must be rejected. If it is, it may be received, although the proceedings have been irregular.

I repeat that the best mode of ascertaining the disputed fact of its being the expression of the popular will, is submission to the people at a fair election, where the voice of every bona fide voter may be heard. The President of the United States agrees with me in his message that that is the fairest and best mode of ascertaining the popular voice. Then why not adopt that mode of ascertainment in this case, it being denied that this convention does reflect the popular will, or that the constitution embodies the popular sentiment? The principle is that the constitution must be the embodiment of the popular will. Submission is a means and the fairest and best means of ascertaining that fact, and hence that general rule ought to be adhered to in all cases whatsoever. I did not doubt that it would be adhered to in regard to Kansas, when this convention was called.

The Senator quotes that part of my speech in which I referred to the opinion of the Attorney General, and of General Jackson's administration in the Arkansas case, to show that a convention called without authority of Congress was null and void, so far as it assumed to be a body having authority to institute a government. The Senator does not deny that such was the opinion of the Attorney General in that case. The Senator does not deny that such was the opinion of the President of the United States at that time. He pleads the statute of limitations as to the President; and I said the other day that if he would show me the authority of the President for saying that the President had changed his mind since, I would never repeat that authority upon him; for a wise man will change his mind if he thinks he is wrong. But I deny the right of the Senator to come in and quote the President of the United States as against me on this point, if he stands on the record saying, with me, that a Territorial Legislature has no power, no authority, to call a convention having a right to institute government, without a previous act of Congress. Does the Senator now say, will he say, that he is authorized expressly or impliedly by the President to state that he has changed his opinion on that question? I apprehend not. I referred to that record because it stood uncontradicted and unchanged. There is nothing in the message, so far as I have seen, which now reverses that opinion of the President. The President has a right to recommend that the constitution formed at Lecompton shall be received, and Kansas admitted under it into the Union as a State; but he has not done so. The President has refused to say that the Kansas convention was a legal convention authorized to institute government. The President may have used words which may have misled the Senator from Pennsylvania. The President has said that convention was called by a Legislature which had been repeatedly recognized by Congress. True, the Legislature has been recognized, but the convention has not been; and the President does not say that the Legislature had the legal authority to call a convention which was authorized to institute government. The Senator is determined that he will not understand the distinction between a convention having authority to petition, as in the Arkansas case, and a convention authorized to institute government, as in the cases under enabling acts.

Mr. BIGLER. Will the Senator allow me to say a word?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Certainly.

Mr. BIGLER. I maintained throughout the whole of my speech that the people of Kansas have an enabling act; that the law of 1854 has conferred on the people of Kansas legislative power on all rightful subjects of legislation. I went on further, to say that, in my opinion, to make provision for the preparatory steps to a convention for the formation of a constitution by the election of delegates by the people, was a rightful subject of legislation. Furthermore, that bill expressly clothed the people of Kansas with full authority to make their domestic institutions, and to make them in their own way. It is because of this language, that I hold, that in the case of Kansas, there is an enabling act.

One point more. The honorable Senator from Illinois must have omitted to catch a remark or two which I made. I said, expressly, that the Senator did not hold an enabling act to be indispensable in all cases; but he does so hold as to Kansas, and he proposes to send back to the people all they have done, and to institute proceedings here which they must carry out. I have said that, in my judgment, under his law, the people there can adopt their own mode. They can do that, because the law of Congress says they can do it. I said further, that the Senator could not convert me to his views until he repealed that part of the act of 1854 which said they might do this precise thing.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then the Senator holds, as I understand, that under the Kansas-Nebraska act the people of Kansas have a right to form a government whenever they please, in whatever mode they please, and to demand admission into the Union as a State. He says that because the law provides that they are to establish their own institutions in their own way, they may adopt just such way as they please; and as they have power to legislate on all rightful subjects of legislation, they may legislate on just such subjects as they please. I do not so understand it. Under his doctrine of allowing them to come in in their own way, I suppose the Topeka people would come in very easily, that being their way. I hold that the Kansas-Nebraska act was not intended as an enabling act; and I hold that no man in this body ever dreamed, a year ago, that it was so intended.

The Senator has told a long story which I do not intend ever to discuss, about his consultation with me at my house, to get up an enabling act to authorize the people of Kansas to form a constitution. What was that grave consultation of which he speaks for, if no enabling act was necessary? Why were we meeting in these consultations to get up an enabling act, if there was already one in the organic law? Why did President Pierce recommend in his message an enabling act if he understood the organic law to contain one? Why did the Committee on Territories report an enabling act if they understood the organic law to contain one? Why did we sit here day and night to weary out the Republican members on the other side, and pass an enabling act so as to get Kansas into the Union, if it was unnecessary? We made it a party measure; we concerted upon it as a party measure; we passed it by a strict Democratic vote; with every vote on the other side of the Chamber against it; we were then struggling for an enabling act; and I undertake to say that it was not hinted, so far as I know or believe, from any quarter, at that time, and never dreamed that the Kansas-Nebraska bill was an enabling act giving a right to the people to come into the Union when they pleased.

Mr. BIGLER. If the Senator will allow me I will answer that point for myself. I was inclined to do it in my regular speech. I have given the motives which impelled me to action on that occasion. I have said that I disliked the proposition, because it was, to some extent, an infringement upon the doctrine of non-intervention. I said so on this floor, when a Senator from Delaware, not now with us, [Mr. Clayton,] submitted a bill in reference to Kansas. I supported the Toombs bill, not as an ordinary enabling act, but in view of the peculiar circumstances which surrounded the case. There had then been no regular movement made in that direction in Kansas; the population was far below what anybody would deem proper for the admission of a State; but I was impressed with the idea then, as I am now, that Congress would do the country and Kansas a service by getting that Territory into the Union as a State at the earliest hour possible. I went for the measure, because it was an invitation to those people which they might not have anticipated under all the circumstances. There was one portion of the people, it is true, attempting to get into the Union in some form or other. I thought in view of the excited state of the public mind there, such a measure might be justified. It was a peculiar measure; the Senator will agree with me that it was no ordinary enabling act. It furnished even the officers to execute the law. But, sir, what views the Senator may have had in reference to it, is not for me to say. I have only given the impressions that were on my mind. I think I intimated very clearly, that it should not be my purpose to sacrifice anything to the mere idea of consistency, in an exigency so critical as that which surrounds us.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I did not refer to that measure for the purpose of arraigning the Senator's consistency. I have nothing to do with the gentleman's consistency. I do not attach so much importance to that, as others do. I only referred to it for the purpose of showing the understanding of the Executive branch, evinced by a special recommendation; the understanding of the Committee on Territories, shown by a special report to this body; and the understanding of the Senate, as evinced by the extraordinary exertions used to carry through an enabling act for Kansas, in order that a State might be legally formed. The fact was, that a movement had then been made to form a State in Kansas irregularly. We thought it was better to have it done regularly than irregularly; and as there was no authority of law by which the Legislature could call a convention without our interposition, we reported a bill, in pursuance of the President's special recommendation to pass such a law; and the Senate made it a party measure. What is more, it was specially made a party measure on which to fight the presidential election. We were not satisfied to go before the people fighting the Topeka movement, without ourselves authorizing the people to form a State government legally. This was got up as a party measure upon which to elect Mr. Buchanan; and when we forced it through the Senate as a party measure, we said to the Republicans on the other side of the Chamber, "If you do not take it this year, you will have to take it the next." But I find there is not much disposition to stand by the measure for twelve months, and have them take it now. I only ask my friend from Pennsylvania now to stand by the same measure after the election, that we did before the election. I only ask my Democratic friends here to help me to carry out now, the same identical bill to which we stood pledged before the election, and which we formed as the basis on which the presidential election should be fought.

Mr. BIGLER. The Senator is clearly insisting that I shall be consistent in all that I do on this subject. That is a very unreasonable request. The Senator has disposed of that subject for himself, by frankly saying that he does not claim to be, nor pride himself on being, always consistent; that not a month passes over that he does not change some impression upon his mind. Now, he should give me the benefit of that charitable rule; but I do not want it. In this case, I do not think I need it. I have stated the peculiar circumstances which impelled me to favor that measure, although at the same time believing that, if the people acted according to law, and by authority of their own Legislature, in an orderly way, they would have a perfect right to make a State constitution, and come here and ask for admission under it. The people who made the Topeka constitution had not done that. They had proceeded without the color of law, in disregard of the territorial law and the law of Congress. If they had had the law and the order of the Leecompton convention, as much as I dissented from its details, I think I should have differed then with the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Pennsylvania falls into the mistake of supposing that I was alluding to him rather than to the whole party of the Senate, when I was urging the acceptance of the measure which we supported in 1856. I was speaking of the united Democratic party of last year having, as one man, come together on the bill called the Toombs bill.

Mr. MASON. The Senator will indulge me for a moment. There was one member of the Democratic party who did not vote for that bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the Senator had waited a second, he would have heard me finish the sentence by saying that the Democratic party had united as one man on this Toombs bill, only two or three voting in the negative, not because an enabling act was not necessary, but because it contained a bill of rights which was supposed to repeal what were called the odious laws of Kansas, and that was regarded by some as an interference with their domestic institutions. The negative votes therefore were predicated on the express ground that the bill of rights contained in the Toombs bill was inconsistent with the organic act in annulling some of the "bogus" laws; but I undertake to say that no man voted against it on the ground that an enabling act was not proper and necessary.

Mr. MASON. Will the Senator indulge me for a moment?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Certainly.

Mr. MASON. I speak for none but myself. I did not vote against the bill; I did not vote at all. I refrained from voting because I found from the current of debate that it was believed on the part of those with whom I acted politically that such a law was necessary to extricate the Territory of Kansas from the condition in which it was, by forming it into a State. That was the current of the debate as I understood. I should have voted for the bill in order to carry out this policy of extricating the Territory from the condition in which it was by giving to it a law to create a State, but that I believed the passage of such a law by Congress, was in derogation of the whole principle and policy of the Kansas act; and therefore I did not choose to separate myself from my friends by voting against it, but I refrained from voting. That is my recollection.

Mr. DOUGLAS. When the Senator says such a law was in derogation of the Kansas act, does he mean that part of it which authorized the convention, or that which annulled the "bogus" laws?

Mr. MASON. I mean the whole of it. I considered that the intervention of Congress, in passing a law authorizing the people of Kansas to form a State constitution, was taking from them, by implication, the power granted to them in the Kansas act. I am free to admit, that the other provision to which the Senator has alluded was even more obnoxious, because it interfered with their domestic legislation.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then I understand the Senator from Virginia to occupy the position that the Kansas-Nebraska bill itself was a sufficient enabling act. By it, the people were authorized to form their institutions in their own way; and, therefore, they were authorized by that act, whenever they pleased, to call a convention and form a constitution, no matter whether they were five thousand or ten thousand people, with such boundaries as they saw proper, and fix it all in their own way, and come here and demand admission into the Union as a State!

Mr. MASON. That may be the Senator's construction, but it is not mine, by any means.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Let us see. The Senator understood that the Kansas-Nebraska bill contained an enabling act. If it did, it gave the authority to the people of Kansas to form a State constitution and come into the Union then, when there were not two hundred inhabitants in the Territory, or at any subsequent time when there should be five thousand, or ten thousand, or fifteen thousand, or twenty thousand inhabitants in the Territory. The same construction would authorize the people of Nebraska to-day to call a convention and demand admission into the Union, either with their whole empire, or with curtailed boundaries, as might suit their convenience. I did not understand, and I never supposed that anybody who voted for the Nebraska bill understood, that we were giving our consent that a few people rushing in there, without numbers sufficient for a community, without organization, had a right to come and demand admission into the Union, until Congress should first authorize it.

Mr. MASON. I suppose not.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Well, I will not carry on the discussion with the Senator from Virginia. My object is not to place any man in an inconsistent position, or to criminate any one. My object is to defend the right.

Mr. MASON. I did not interrupt the Senator from any fear in the world of any position in which he would place me by his argument. I did it only because the Senator said the whole Democratic party in the Senate had united in the policy of passing the bill designated as the Toombs bill; each member being governed, as I presume, by his own reasons. He said, amongst other reasons, that one great object was to make use of that measure in the presidential election, and he assigned other reasons. I wanted only to put in a disclaimer for myself, and for myself alone, that I refrained from voting for the bill, and had various reasons for doing it, the chief of which was the one I have mentioned.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I had no idea that the Senator would be afraid of my putting him in a false position. He is not a gentleman who is governed by any fears or apprehensions on that score. But he has furnished me with confirmatory evidence of the truth of my declarations that the Toombs bill was passed as a party measure by the friends of the Nebraska bill, by the same men who passed that measure, for the purpose of bringing Kansas into the Union as a State under that bill. There were two or three Senators who did not vote at all. The Senator from Virginia says he was one, and the reason he did not vote at all was this: he was not willing to depart from the policy of his party in passing it, and would not vote against it; but he could not, with his views, vote for it, and hence, would not vote at all. This shows that he sympathized deeply in that party movement which required the Toombs bill to be passed last year as a party measure, to bring Kansas into the Union as a State. Now, what I ask is, why can we not, as a party, stand this year where we stood last year, and pass that bill?

Gentlemen complain that I am dividing the party. How? Because I will not change and oppose now a measure upon which we stood when we adjourned last year; because I will not now abandon the measure that we strenuously advocated before the election. I am called upon now to abandon that position. Why? Not that there is any party obligation. If so, where is it? In the first place, as I have said, the President has not recommended it in his message. Of course he would not have recommended it in his message. The President did not intend, I apprehend, to change the party issue, and if he did, he had no authority from the party to do so. The Senator from Pennsylvania says that the admission of Kansas, under the Lecompton constitution, is an Administration measure. What is his authority for that statement? The message does not say so. Has he any higher source of information than the message?

Mr. BIGLER. I have no doubt on that subject. The Senator from Illinois, it seems to me, can scarcely entertain a doubt as to the views of the Administration on that question. I endeavored to give them distinctly, as I understood them.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The point is, whether he understands them from the message, or from higher sources.

Mr. BIGLER. I make the deduction from the message, and from what I know in addition. I did not say it was an Administration measure in words. The Senator is mistaken. What I did say was this: he assumed to be in some doubt as to its being an Administration measure in his former speech, and I said I could hardly understand what he meant; and asked him whether he meant to say that the Cabinet did not unite with the President, or that the Administration having adopted and indicated its policy, those who differed from and denounced that policy were not against the Administration on that question? It seemed perfectly simple. What else could I say? I have not said that it concerned anything else. I have not said it involved any question of party fidelity. What I did say was, that the Administration held the Lecompton movement to be legal so far as it has progressed; and that when Kansas asks for admission, it will not be a sufficient reason to deny her admission into the Union because the constitution was not entirely voted on.

Now as to the recommendation of the President: I heard the Senator's statement on that point before; and I have heard it now with some surprise. The Senator from Illinois understands the relations of the Executive to this question better than I do. How could the President, with any propriety, recommend to Congress to admit a State that had not made any such application? Furthermore, how could the President ask for the admission of Kansas as a State prior to the result of the vote which he said, in the message, he held ought to be taken? These things had not transpired, and therefore there was no recommendation on the subject.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Pennsylvania deduces from the message that this is an Administration measure, and also from other sources of information within his knowledge. Now, sir, I should like to know what are those other sources of information, as he has, to that extent, the advantage of me?

Mr. BIGLER. If the Senator will take my definition of that policy, the question is clearly settled; but I am not at liberty to say that it is an Administration measure, and allow him to define what it is.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I want to know what those "other sources of information" are that have satisfied him, and authorized him to say that it is an Administration measure. He says in the same breath that inasmuch as the constitution has not been sent here, inasmuch as it has not been voted on in Kansas, inasmuch as there was nothing before the President, how could it be an Administration measure?

Mr. BIGLER. No, sir. I asked how could the President recommend the admission of a State that had never applied? I said the Administration held that the proceedings were legal as far as they had progressed, and so far it is an Administration measure. What has not occurred cannot be treated of.

Mr. DOUGLAS. We are now told that no question being before the President, no constitution having been sent to him from Kansas, the President could not have made a recommendation in regard to it. I can understand that very well. Under these facts, he ought not to have made any recommendation. I admire his wisdom and prudence, in refraining from committing himself when he had not the facts before him, and hence it was that I desired to know from my friend from Pennsylvania what those "other sources of information" were, [laughter,] that authorized him to read men out of the party for not supporting the measure.

Mr. BIGLER. Now, Mr. President, an experienced and skillful debater like the Senator from Illinois will not claim the advantage of an unpracticed debater like myself, by putting words in my mouth. I said not one word about reading any man out of the party.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is true.

Mr. BIGLER. I laid down no such rule. That being true, why did the Senator say I read men out of the party? Sir, does the Senator make no issue with the Administration? When he has made an issue, can he not tell what that issue is? Whatever it may be, is not that the point of difference between him and the Administration? Is not that point about which there is difference, an Administration measure? There is the whole of my answer.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator says he made no remark about reading persons out of the party. It is true he did not use these words, but he did insinuate very distinctly that the Black Republican side of the House rather congratulated me, and that certain gentlemen on this side were not so well pleased. In other words, he carried out the same system that has been carried out here for the last two weeks, of requiring every pensioned letter-writer to intimate that Mr. DOUGLAS had deserted the Democratic party and gone over to the Black Republicans!

Mr. BIGLER. Does the Senator intend to make that imputation against myself, that I have encouraged or sought letter-writers to make a charge against him?

Mr. DOUGLAS. When the Senator gets through, I will answer.

Mr. BIGLER. I shall distinctly deny any such allegation. I have not proceeded in that spirit. I alluded to what I regarded on his part as uncalled-for criticism of the President's views. Long ago, when I was a boy, and before anybody talked of non-intervention, the President expressed views which the Senator undertakes to show are in conflict with his present opinions. I said that excited a momentary gratification on the other side of the Chamber, and regret here. If, in all I have said with regard to the Senator, I have not, from the other side, the same measure of response, the fault is not mine.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I certainly did not intend to intimate, and I do not think my language could possibly bear that construction, that the Senator had suborned letter-writers to assault me. I said that he was insinuating here what those letter-writers were charging me in the country with doing.

Mr. BIGLER. I made no such insinuation.

Mr. DOUGLAS. There are men here personal enemies of mine—men who would be willing to sink an Administration if they could kill off northern men, and get them out of the way in the future; such men are getting their tools to denounce me as having abandoned the party. Why? Because I do not desert my principles as freely as the masters of these editors desert theirs. I have seen this attempt—not sanctioned by the President; he scorns it; but there are men under him busy at work to convince every one that I have betrayed my party and my principles, in order to see if they cannot crush me among my Democratic friends. That every press which can be controlled, is thus controlled, is beyond denial or dispute. Nineteen twentieths of all the independent Democratic presses—those who do not depend on certain departments of the Government for support—are with me in sustaining the credit of the Democratic party, and the Democratic platform, as adopted at Cincinnati; but the few who are not allowed to speak for themselves are endeavoring to drive me where they cannot drive me—to desert the principles affirmed and proclaimed by the Democratic party at Cincinnati.

Mr. BIGLER. The Senator is very denunciatory of those few who he says dare not speak for themselves. I presume he does not intend to intimate that there are any such holding seats on this floor. I dare express my views.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I spoke of editors. I do not understand the Senator to be an editor of one of those papers that I spoke of.

Mr. BIGLER. No, sir; but the Senator sees me clearer than he sees himself, as he runs in this discussion. Only a moment ago, he said that I insinuated just what these editors said. I do not intend to insinuate anything. What I know, if I know it, I shall speak in the best language I can command. If I believed the Senator from Illinois was talking or thinking about breaking down his party, or leaving any principle he ever embraced, I should bemean myself, and despise myself, if I did not so state. I have neither said that here nor elsewhere.

The Senator has, I think, been unnecessarily severe upon me, as to those matters where I quoted him as authority at one time, for what would not answer at another. I made the application and the analogy not between him and me; but I dignified him, and made the analogy between him and the acts of Congress and of States. What I said was, that in all this, I experienced a difficulty in finding conclusive authority on any proposition at all. It was in that spirit that I referred to his Springfield speech, and for that opinion in its whole weight I must be accountable, simply because I had taken the impression, that if the Senator at that time thought the law calling the convention was null and void, he could not have said what he must have known would have gone to these people in the terms in which he said it; nor could he have held that a vote of the people on their constitution, was indispensable to the admission of a State. Whoever else have understood the Senator from Illinois, this I say, that I always put the construction on it that I put on it to-day.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not mean to procrastinate this debate; but I must say a word or two more on this point as to party measures. We are left to understand that a measure, not recommended by the President—one which it is said he could not recommend, because he did not know what the facts were—is a party measure, or that if I do not stand up to it there is a doubt whether I am not leaving the party. Now I wish to go further, and inquire whether every man is ranked out of the party who does not stand up to the distinct recommendations of the President?

Mr. BIGLER. I deny such a rule.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is every man to be driven out because he does not coincide with the President exactly on the Pacific railroad bill?

Mr. BIGLER. Certainly not.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is a man to be driven out because he may not agree with the President on the subject of banks? The Senator shakes his head. Is a man to be read out of the party if he does not agree with the President as to a bankrupt law applicable to the banks? I am told, "certainly not." Is he to be read out of the party if he does not agree with the President on any and every other question in the message, except the slavery question?

Then, if each one of the gentlemen around me is at liberty to dissent from the President on the bankrupt law, or the tariff law, or the bank issue, or the Pacific railroad issue, and on each other measure, am I not permitted to judge for myself as to the admission of Kansas on the Lecompton constitution? I do not understand the extraordinary desire to strike a blow that shall either cripple me, or drive me from the party, or make the country press believe that I have left the party. I see men all around me here, who do not agree with the President in all his recommendations. I doubt whether there is a man on this side of the House who will rise in his place and say that he agrees with the President in each of the recommendations of his message. If there is, I should like to see him. I should like to know from the Senator from Pennsylvania whether he indorses each recommendation, and is prepared to carry it out.

Mr. BIGLER. It is not probable that I agree with every sentiment in the message.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I said every recommendation.

Mr. BIGLER. But I must interpose my protest, at this point, against the Senator's argument. He assumes to be answering something which I have said, and as though I were to be held accountable for some rule which the Administration had laid down. Now, sir, I have not used the terms "reading anybody out of the party," unless it was to explain what the Senator had said. I said that his difference with the President on this one point was all the difference between them. I did not say it was to be a party difference. The Administration has nothing to do with that. It is doing what it believes to be right in this exigency. The Senator from Illinois is doing what he believes to be right. I have not claimed that either should be read out of the party. I lay down no such rule. I have no authority to impose such a rule. Such a rule must come from the mass of the party in convention, or speaking through some organ.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then I understand the Senator to express the opinion that the Administration does not make any issue, as far as gentlemen differ from them on this question.

Mr. BIGLER. Of course they make an issue as far as they go on this question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But they do not regard it as involving party fidelity?

Mr. BIGLER. It is a proposition too simple for argument, that wherever the party may be found on any question, if a Senator makes an issue on that question, of course he is not in the party; but the Senator cannot get me now to go any further on this subject; I have said all that the English language, I think, is capable of expressing fairly and justly, so as to state my meaning. If he will have it his own way; if he will announce to the country that it is a party measure, and that there is an effort making to put him out of the party because he differs with the Administration on this subject, it is his own business; I cannot help it. I lay down no such rule, and do not recognize it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I certainly should not have put these questions to my friend from Pennsylvania, but for the fact that he told the Senate he had "other sources of information" in regard to party measures, from those which I possessed.

Mr. BIGLER. Not with regard to party measures.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then in regard to the purpose of the Administration on this question.

Mr. BIGLER. I must insist that the Senator shall not put language in my mouth which I did not use.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the Senator will state what he did say, I will accept it exactly as he said it.

Mr. BIGLER. I say, distinctly, that I never referred to a party issue in anything that I said.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But the Senator said he had other sources of information in regard to the purposes of the Administration as to making this an Administration measure; and as he had sources of information not open to me, I desired to know whether those outgivings in the country were authorized, that I was to be read out of the Democratic party, and denounced as a Black Republican, because I was in favor of leaving the people of Kansas free to form their own institutions to suit themselves. I desired information on that point. I did not believe these gross charges that had been made were authorized. I believe they are made by men under the influence of others—men hostile to me, and equally hostile to the Administration now in power. I believe there are persons who desire to get me into a false position with my party, for their ulterior purposes. I do not intend that men whose claims to the support of the Democratic party, or its confidence, I do not recognize above my own, shall read me out of the Democratic party.

My object was to elicit from the Senator from Pennsylvania, through his "other sources of information," the authority to deny that the President and Cabinet intended to make an issue with their patronage, with their favors, against any man, merely because he opposed the Lecompton constitution. I desired to extract from him a denial of that fact. He cannot but be aware that the report is being circulated everywhere that the President intends to put the knife to the throat of every man who dares to think for himself on this question, and carry out his principles in good faith.

Mr. BIGLER. I will guaranty the President will touch no man's throat. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOUGLAS. No, sir; but I am not satisfied with that mode of trifling with such a question. If the Senator had no peculiar sources of information, I should not press for an answer. I believe that those who use the President's name, as threatening to proscribe with his patronage every man who is in favor of giving the people of Kansas the right to vote on their constitution—those who represent the President in that light, slander him. I believe they are his enemies. I wish to give his friends an opportunity of denying the charge.

Mr. BIGLER. Who makes the charge? Let us have that. That is the proposition—who has made the charge? I simply ask the Senator to state distinctly who makes that charge, and how it comes to be the subject of discussion here?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will tell you. The newspapers throughout the country are full of it.

Mr. BIGLER. I am not accountable for that.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It comes to me the subject of discussion here, because the Senator was following a line of argument which seemed to intimate that I was outside of a healthy Democratic organization. I do not recognize the right of that Senator—I do not recognize the right of any body of men to expel me from the Democratic party.

Mr. BIGLER. I do not intend that the Senator shall either put language into my mouth, or assign positions for me. In no manner or form have I been laboring to show that he was outside the pale of the party. It is true I did show, and in order to do justice to my subject, it was necessary to show, that on this particular question of slavery in the Territories, the Senator had not always held the same opinions. I did say that so far as he differed with the Administration on this one point, there was a difference between him and the Administration; but at the very same moment I discarded the idea that it was to assume a permanent shape, or that I had any authority for saying that every man who did not think with the Administration on this particular fleeting issue was not a Democrat. I certainly made no such proposition, and have not warranted an answer to it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am aware that the Senator's effort was to show that I had changed my opinions on the slavery question. I have answered that already by showing that I changed just when Mr. Buchanan did, and was with him in regard to those alleged changes. If that fact turns me out of the party, I am in very good company with the President. I think that ought to be a sufficient answer to this point.

Now, sir, I do not wish to pursue this debate; it is unpleasant to me. I am sorry that there is an attempt to apply here, on these occasions, a tyranny not consistent with free Democratic action. The slightest variance of opinion with the President upon this question is deemed a cause for suspicion at least; when open variance as to the Pacific railroad, or the tariff, or the proposed bankrupt law for the banks, is no cause of disagreement here at all. I do not understand who it is that puts up this test. I do not understand the motive for it.

It has been intimated frequently that I acted rashly in entering into the debate and expressing my opinions at so early a period. It is said that I should have waited; that I should not have thrust this question on Congress; that I should not have forced an issue. Sir, who has thrust this question upon us? We have been told by the Senator from Pennsylvania that the President had nothing before him on which to base a recommendation in regard to Kansas, because the constitution had not been sent to him, not having been finally disposed of by the election in Kansas. If the President could not make any recommendation on the subject, why the necessity of putting in his message a clause differing totally from every speech and report I had ever made on the Kansas question? Why the necessity for devoting two columns of the message to the subject? If the President had seen proper to wait until he received the constitution from Kansas, I too should have waited; but when he forces on the Nebraska bill a construction in contradiction of all my speeches and reports, I am bound respectfully to dissent. If there is any fault in thrusting this question before Congress prior to the vote in Kansas, the President is responsible; but I do not arraign him for it. It was his right to express his opinions, and it was proper and right for him to determine when and how he would exercise that right. When he presented those opinions to us, I was forced in self-defense to speak against the assault made on my Kansas reports and speeches. I did this in a manner respectful to the President. I believe he had no unkind feeling towards me; I had none towards him. There were no private grievances, no causes of irritation between the President and myself, but simply a difference of opinion on this one question.

If gentlemen can tolerate differences of opinion, we can act in harmony; but I shall maintain my views of right, whether there be harmony or not. I shall avail myself of all proper opportunities to vindicate the great principle with which my public life is identified—the right of the people of each State, old and new, to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way. If, in doing so, I shall happen to come in collision with any of my friends on this floor, I shall deeply regret it; but still, if they cannot tolerate differences of opinion—and I am glad to say that I have seen very little disposition here to be intolerant on this subject—then I must maintain my independent course of action inside of the Democratic party, standing by its organization and its principles until the party shall reassert its true and original principles. I have no fears of the party being divided. Gentlemen will see that they cannot perpetrate what I believe to be a great wrong, by forcing a constitution upon Kansas against the will of her people; and when gentlemen come to understand the facts as I understand them to be, I have faith that they will be frank and candid enough to act on the facts as developed before them.

I should have been delighted if this whole discussion could have been postponed. I should have rejoiced if it had not been necessary for me to participate in the discussion until all the facts were before us. I believe there would have been none of these unpleasant exhibitions for our opponents to smile at, or for others to frown at, as the Senator from Pennsylvania has intimated, if there had been no attempt from any quarter to force tests on men. I trust that there is no authority for any such efforts, and that it will be shown in the end that they have been totally unauthorized.

Mr. President, it is with extreme regret that I have felt myself constrained to engage in this debate. I hope we shall discuss this question hereafter on its merits, without reference to my consistency, or to the consistency of any other gentleman. Instead of speculating on my political position in the future, I hope people will leave time to work out the problem and answer the question. Time will give a more satisfactory answer than any protestations, or pledges, or promises, from me. If gentlemen can discuss this question and let me alone, certainly I shall have no controversy with any one; and I am not sure that I shall answer them often, even if they think it wise to keep up these constant assaults on me and my political course, instead of discussing the question on its merits.

Mr. BIGLER. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan had the floor, and he yielded to the Senator from Illinois. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. STUART. I will yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania; but I wish to suggest that there is a common desire in the Senate to take up the measure alluded to this morning by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. IVERSON,] as soon as this matter shall be disposed of. I move to postpone the further consideration of the subject before the Senate till to-morrow.

Mr. BIGLER. I shall not complain of that. I do not feel that this is an occasion when I have, perhaps, all the right to claim the indulgence of the Senate that I might have under other circumstances.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania allow me to say a word?

Mr. BIGLER. Certainly.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I desire to say distinctly, that when I referred to attempts to strike at me through the press, I alluded to nothing that had occurred in the Senate, or emanated from the Senate. I say this, lest there should be any doubt as to my meaning.

Mr. BIGLER. I unite with the expression of regret made by the Senator from Illinois, so far as the consequences of any arraignment of the consistency of any of our public men may be concerned; but the Senator himself unhappily invited it. I think he was the first to make reference to the consistency of any statesman in the country on this question.

A word, now, as to the message, and I shall have done. When I ask the Senator from Illinois whether it was not the President's duty to discuss the Kansas question in his message, he will undoubtedly answer in the affirmative. It being his duty to discuss it, will the Senator say that the President ought not to discuss it in his own way and give us his own doctrines. The President is under a constitutional obligation to communicate to Congress information concerning the state of the Union. What Senator will say that these matters in Kansas did not, above all other matters, concern the state of the Union? When the President communicated it he was bound to say what he thought.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator misunderstands me. I acknowledge that the President was bound to communicate so soon as he had anything to communicate to us; but the Senator said he had nothing to communicate as to Kansas.

Mr. BIGLER. If the President did not communicate anything, why did the Senator make an issue with him?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator said the President had no information on which to base a recommendation as to Kansas, and I objected to the enunciation of opinions without information on which to base them.

Mr. BIGLER. That is a much narrower proposition than the Senator laid down before; that is not a platform large enough to build his speech on. Now I make this proposition in reference to the President and the Senator, for both of whom I have the highest respect; and above all for their ability to comprehend and dissect such questions. The President was bound to send his message to Congress; but I cannot agree that the Senator from Illinois was required instantly, as soon as the last words of the message dropped from the lips of the clerk who read it, to make this issue and inaugurate this discussion. I regretted this, and I am frank enough to say so. As to the Senator's views on the subject, nobody will deny him the ability to comprehend and elucidate it; I am the last man to cast an imputation on his motives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is the motion to postpone the further consideration of this subject until to-morrow. The motion was agreed to.

PAY OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. IVERSON. I move to take up the House joint resolution (No. 2) to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate the compensation of members of Congress," approved August 16, 1856.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair regards that as now in order without any motion, it being the unfinished business of Saturday. The joint resolution is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. IVERSON. When I moved on Saturday, at a late hour, to take up this resolution, I supposed there would be no difficulty in its passage; and as there were considerations of expediency calling for its immediate passage, I asked the Senate at that late hour to dispose of it. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] made objections to the principle of the resolution, and other considerations urged the Senate to adjourn at that time without final action. I do not propose now to go into a discussion of the merits of this proposition. The Senator from Delaware presented objections to the resolution itself upon principle. I think he was very well answered by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] and I am not disposed now to occupy the time of the Senate, in presenting other considerations in reply to the Senator from Delaware. I will barely say, however, that, if he carries out his principle to its legitimate conclusion, the law is wrong in allowing mileage to sitting members whose seats are contested.

His argument, I understand, is that this pay ought not to be given to members at the commencement of a session, because a seat may be contested, and, finally, a sitting member be ejected, either by one House or the other; and, therefore, he not being legitimately entitled to compensation, the compensation will have been improperly and illegally paid to him. That argument would exclude a member from taking mileage; and yet the law gives to every member his mileage on the first day of the session. It has been the invariable practice of both Houses, ever since the formation of the Government to the present time, to pay the sitting member, who comes with a certificate of election, all the amount of salary and mileage to which the law entitles him; and also to pay to the contestant, if he succeeds in obtaining the seat, the same amount of mileage and compensation. The House of Representatives have gone even further than this. They have not only paid the sitting member the mileage and compensation, but they have actually paid to a contestant the mileage and compensation, although he has not obtained the seat for which he made a contest. To carry out the proposition of the Senator from Delaware, you must repeal the law in relation to mileage, and take away from every man the mileage, because he may finally be decided not to be entitled to a seat; but I will not press that point any further.

I merely wish to throw out a suggestion or two as to amendments which have been notified are to be proposed to this joint resolution. The resolution does not change the features of the original compensation law. It does not enlarge or diminish it in any way. It simply changes the time at which a portion of the compensation which is admitted to be due to members shall be paid. It merely stipulates that it shall be paid on the first, instead of the last day of the session, as the compensation law required. Now, if you introduce an amendment such as has been suggested by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] to pay members of the Senate their mileage when they are called upon to attend a special executive session, under a proclamation or summons of the President, that is an entirely new and distinct feature. Any attempt to introduce it as an amendment to this resolution will necessarily open the door for discussion and difference of opinion, not only in this Chamber, but in the House of Representatives. That is an extension, an enlargement of the compensation law. It is the introduction of a new principle, a new feature altogether, which would probably give rise to a protracted debate.

Now, sir, I say to Senators that any amendment of this sort on this resolution must necessarily endanger the passage of the resolution in the other House, or at least must postpone it until a subsequent day. This is the only day during the week, under the rules of the House of Representatives, when a proposition can be taken up by a suspension of the rules of that body. If we amend the resolution in this body and send it back to the House of Representatives, it will require a vote of two thirds to take it up. Such a motion can be made only on this very day, and we all know that at this late period of the day it would be impracticable to have such a motion as that entertained and carried in the House of Representatives; and another motion to suspend the rules and take up cannot be made until next Monday. Thus it will be seen that any amendment of this resolution will necessarily postpone its consideration in the House of Representatives until next Monday, because after to-day a single objection in the House will prevent the resolution from being taken up, and will prevent any motion to suspend the rules, in order to take it up and consider it.

Now, so far as regards the proposition to pay mileage to new Senators who are called here to a special session, at the incoming of an Administration, I yield to the propriety, justice, and policy of such a provision. I admit that provision ought to be made for such cases; but so far as regards those Senators who were called here at the executive session, in last March, their mileage can be provided for in one of the appropriation bills. So far as their case is concerned, there is no necessity for incumbering this resolution with an amendment. It may be put on one of the appropriation bills. That is a more appropriate place for it than this proposition. Let us wait, therefore, until one of the appropriation bills comes from the House of Representatives, and then we can do justice to those Senators. I do not say that I will vote for the whole mileage. On that subject there seems to be a difference of opinion; but I would certainly go for compensating them to an extent commensurate with the time and trouble and risk and expense of their journey to the seat of Government. That can be done on an appropriation bill. Justice can be done to them in this way at the appropriate time. I have consulted with several of those gentlemen, and they are contented to leave the subject until it can be arranged in an appropriation bill. I think that is the best policy.

If we incumber this proposition with any amendment we endanger its passage; we open up the whole question in relation to the compensation bill and the new elements which may be introduced by the amendments that may be offered; we open up a discussion in the House of Representatives and endanger the whole proposition, or at least postpone it to a time when it may be seriously inconvenient to members. If the resolution we passed here to-day, adjourning Congress from the day after to-morrow until the 4th of January, should meet the concurrence of the House of Representatives, then necessarily this proposition must go over until Congress meets after the adjournment. I hope that no amendment will be presented, and if any should be presented, I suggest respectfully to Senators, that it is best to vote them down and let the original proposition be concurred in as it came from the House of Representatives.

Mr. BAYARD. I confess myself unable to appreciate the force of the remarks of the honorable Senator from Georgia. There is no public interest connected with the passage of this resolution now, or a month or two months hence. The whole exigency or emergency connected with it, must be purely personal, in which the country at large has no interest whatever. This resolution came to us but on Saturday last, and the attempt was made to pass it then, even almost before it could be read for the information of Senators. Being myself opposed in principle to the change sought to be made by the resolution, I opposed it then. I am perfectly satisfied, from what occurred at that time, that the change will be made; but if I can by an amendment prevent that change from working what is an abuse in my judgment, I hold myself bound to do it.

It is true that the honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. MASON] differed with me as to the construction of the existing law which this resolution seeks to amend. He thought I was too confident in my manner of asserting that, under the existing law, no member was entitled to any portion of his pay but the $250 a month, until the end of the session. Sir, I asserted that so positively simply because the House of Representatives had judged legislation necessary in order to make the change. If it were not so clear, we should not have had this resolution before us. I assumed, therefore, what agreed with my own conviction, what, until I heard the honorable Senator from Virginia, I supposed no one doubted, that, under the language of the existing law, no Senator or Representative is entitled to receive any pay other than the $250 per month, and his mileage, until the end of the session.

When I looked at the character and object of the compensation law, as I understood it, hurriedly as it was passed, I supposed that was a necessary and proper provision, and I am sorry to see that a change is to be made now. There was, as I presumed, a double object to be attained; at least, according to the current of the debate I had that conclusion, and I know it operated in my own mind. The change was twofold. It was generally admitted that the compensation of members of Congress was too small, and therefore it was to be increased. The other question of changing it from a per diem to a salary depended upon a different principle. The idea connected with that was that the effect would be to prevent the unnecessary prolongation of the sessions of Congress; and the very object with which the compensation is made payable in the mode in which it is made payable would be defeated by repealing that part of the law which postpones the payment until the end of the session. I considered, and I think others did, that the principle of a salaried compensation was desirable with a view to shorten the duration of what is called the long session. I thought it would hold out an inducement if the increased compensation was not payable until the end of the session. Take that away, and you withdraw in part the inducement, and I think alter one of the intents of the original law as to the benefits to be derived by the country from this mode of compensation.

Now, sir, it is very indifferent to me whether an amendment changes the features of a bill, in the language of the honorable Senator from Georgia, entirely, or not, or whether it changes the general scope and character of the provisions of a bill, or whether it only makes a slight change apparently even in the time and mode of payment. I consider that material, for I think it relates to the right and propriety of the matter.

With these convictions in my mind, that the change had better not be made at all, and also with the further conviction that a change will be made as to the time of payment, though I think that may in part tend to frustrate one of the objects of the law, I intend to move two amendments. The first divides itself into three separate branches, though all depend on the same fact. The idea in my mind is, that a Representative or Senator who has taken his seat in Congress, which is claimed by a contesting party, ought not to receive compensation for a period of time when he rendered no service, if he has not been validly elected. I am perfectly aware, and I so stated the other day, that beyond all question the member of Congress who is returned prima facie in either body as a member, and takes his seat, is entitled to his mileage. He has performed his travel, and the mileage is based on that.

I am aware, also, that it has been the habit of Congress, where a contest has been made in good faith, to allow to the contestant, out of the contingent fund, mileage and compensation during the progress of the contest. It seems to me that, under the change of the law now proposed, this will grow into an abuse. By making the whole amount of arrears, as they are called, payable on the first day of the session, you enable the man who has obtained the first return to receive, not only the mileage, to which he has some shadow of right, having performed the travel, but pay for nine months, when no service has been rendered, and when he was not entitled to a seat. My first amendment is to prevent this being carried into an abuse.

There are many defects in the present law, but I do not desire to go any further now than I think mere justice to the body of which I am a member demands. I cannot suppose that the House of Representatives will refuse to yield to the second amendment I mean to propose. It is not to give mileage to Senators for attending at a special called session, but it is to provide that when a Senator has attended such a session and dies before the next regular session, his representatives shall receive his compensation up to the time of his death; and, also, that where a new Senator attends at a special session and dies before the next session, his representatives shall be entitled to mileage. I propose to apply this to those Senators who died since the last session. Though they would not be entitled to mileage for the special session, I think their representatives ought to receive the amount of their compensation.

My first amendment is to insert after the word "and" in the twelfth line of the first section, "on the third Monday in December thereafter;" and in line eighteen, after the word "and," to insert "at the expiration of fifteen days after the commencement of such session;" and to add to the first section this proviso:

Provided, That this resolution shall not be held to apply to any Senator or Representative whose right to his seat is contested by another person claiming the same, when the claim is made within twenty days after the commencement of the first session, and remains undecided.

The Senate will observe the effect of this amendment. I am satisfied that this change in the mode of compensation will be made; but if it is to be made, I wish to exclude the impropriety of paying for services never rendered, and making payment for a period of time, in many cases, when the person was not in official existence. If you do not adopt this amendment, you will be frequently paying two members from the same district. The amendment only postpones the right of a member whose seat is contested by another to receive pay for the recess until the contest is decided. It only excludes cases where the claim is made within twenty days from the commencement of the first session of a Congress. I propose to leave such cases to the operation of the law, as it now stands. I do not think there is anything unreasonable in that. If we choose to alter the time of payment as to those members whose seats are uncontested, and I think that is a material alteration of the law, we ought certainly to do it in such a manner as not to make double payment for services never rendered during a period of time when no one was in existence to perform the service. I desire to avoid what I think will be an abuse.

Mr. STUART. I am very anxious to have a vote on this resolution, and but for the very great respect I have for the opinions of the honorable Senator from Delaware, I should not say a word in reply to what he has stated; and certainly I shall not be supposed to entertain anything but the highest respect for him, in the remarks I shall now submit. I beg, however, to submit to him that his argument must be unsound. It may be that the practice of Congress has had something to do with producing his impressions. The practice has been almost universal in cases of contested seats, to pay both parties. But I propose to say a word as to the true construction of this act. Under the Constitution of the United States, each State has a right to two representatives on this floor—and I shall confine my remarks to the Senate, because the illustration is a fair one. An election is held, and the State authorities certify that a certain citizen of that State is regularly elected a Senator. He comes here and takes his seat; he performs the duties and receives the emoluments incident to a Senator of the United States. If another individual comes to contest his seat, the Constitution has conferred on this body the right to review the question, and say whether the State authorities have decided properly or not. If the Senate declare that the State authorities made a wrong decision, they oust the man holding the certificate, and seat his competitor. From the time he is thus placed in his seat as a Senator of the United States, he has power to act and power to receive the pay. He has no power to act before that time; he has no authority to receive the pay which accrued before that time.

I think an examination of the law will render this clear; and if it were a new question that had never been embarrassed by the former custom of both Houses in paying member and contestant, I hardly think there would have been another opinion expressed on the subject. To say that a man has the right to receive pay during a time when he was not a member, is not only to advance an anomaly, but it is to advance a doctrine against which the Judiciary Committee of the Senate decided at the last session. The question was solemnly referred to them by the Presiding Officer of this body, and they reported that a man could not receive pay for a time when he was not a member. No such retroactive effect is given to the action of the Senate in ousting one Senator and seating another.

Mr. BAYARD. I cannot agree with the honorable Senator from Michigan as to the view he takes of this law. To me it seems clear that if a man takes a seat in Congress on the faith of the prima facie return, and his right is contested by another person, who is finally decided to have been validly elected, the person who received the return ought not to be paid for a period of time when he rendered no service. Gentlemen ask how you can deprive him of the arrears? It is not arrears in the proper sense of the word. It is paying him $3,000 for a whole year during a part of which he was not even a sitting member. The object of the present law is to put the representatives of all the States on the same footing, no matter at what period of the year they may have been elected. If a member takes his seat on the usual prima facie evidence, but, a contest being made, it turns out that he was not duly elected, but that the contestant was, I do not conceive it possible that the contestant could be deprived of the compensation which the law meant to give to the person really elected. The argument of the Senator from Michigan is that the member who succeeds in the contest and shows that he was validly elected, shall be cut short in the compensation to which he is entitled, and that the person who has been unseated shall be entitled to the compensation though he may not remain here long enough to perform any service. I cannot understand that. The compensation is given not in reference to the period of absence, but it looks to the whole year. To give to the law a construction which would enable a person who was never validly elected to take a great portion of the pay from the person really elected, does not seem to me to be rational.

I think the amendment I have offered will prevent difficulty. It does not interfere with the general idea of advancing the time of payment. It simply prevents an abuse which will grow up under the resolution if adopted without the restriction which I propose.

Mr. PUGH. I will suggest to my friend from Delaware, that there are now two Senators whose seats are contested, and it would seem to be rather an unkind thing to vote ourselves this amount of money and cut them out.

Mr. BAYARD. If the honorable Senator will look at the amendment he will find that it does not touch such a case. It applies to a case where one person claims the seat of another within fifteen days after the commencement of the first session of a Congress. There is no Senator in this body in that position. It refers to the case of a double claim.

Mr. PUGH. I apprehend no difficulty about the claimant. We have never paid a contestant out of the appropriation for paying members of Congress. We have always paid him out of the contingent fund. It is not done by joint resolution, but by order of the Senate. If we think the contestor has not presented a frivolous claim, but a fair ground of contest, we order him to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The difficulty in my mind was in the case of a contestee. All the rest of us come here on the first day of the session and draw our pay, but if anybody presents a frivolous or causeless petition against any member, he is to be prevented from receiving his compensation, and he will never get it until the Senate disposes of the case. They may dispose of it or not. They may postpone it for other matters. All this time you make the gentleman attend as a Senator. If he does not attend you dock him of his pay. If he does attend you do not pay him. If this resolution is to construe the salary law of the last Congress, it seems to me the less you put in it the better; I was not in favor of the salary bill, because I anticipated exactly some of these troubles. I was for an increase of the per diem; but Congress having taken the opposite course, I see no difficulty in this joint resolution, as a construction of the law, except that I am apprehensive that it will give us mileage for every session.

Mr. BAYARD. The honorable Senator certainly misunderstands the effect of my amendment. It does not deprive the sitting member of his pay. It leaves him under the operation of the existing law. He will get his $250 a month and his mileage; but it prevents the law from being so altered that he can claim as of right, when his seat is contested within the first twenty days of the first session, pay for nine months of recess.

Mr. PUGH. Yes. We get $2,250, and he does not. If I presented a petition to contest the Senator's seat, I would prevent him getting $2,250, although every other Senator got it.

Mr. BAYARD. I concede that, as to that portion, it has that effect; but are we to assume that a seat will be frivolously contested, and remain undecided? The claim must be made within twenty days after the commencement of the first session. It is not to be presumed that Congress will entertain, in either body, a frivolous claim on the part of a contesting party, and leave it undecided for twenty days. It is not a rational presumption. There must be ground to go on, or they would not do it. This amendment deprives the party of no ultimate right; because if it remain undecided, the man who is the sitting member at the end of the session would then get his whole pay under the existing law. It leaves him, under the existing law, as the Senator would stand, and I would stand, in a contest as to our seats. There would be no hardship, if you left the existing law standing. You get as much pay under the existing law, during the progress of the session, as you got under the old compensation law. The only difference is, that the additional sum we have voted to ourselves is not payable to us until the end of the session. Is it any great hardship, in a case where a member's seat is contested, to say, that if it is contested within twenty days, the original sum shall not come into his hands until the end of the session? That is all. It only prevents that anticipation, which it is the object of this bill to provide for with reference to members of Congress. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I believe there is really but one question before the Senate, and that is whether we shall pass the bill without amendment, or go on and perfect the whole law in regard to compensation. I have no doubt, and I have not met a single person who has a doubt, that the minds of Senators are made up on that subject. The hour is very late. I hope that we may have a vote and dispose of it. Gentlemen will vote as they please, but let us decide whether we shall take the resolution as it is or amend it. If the intention is to amend it, we may as well adjourn now and take time to perfect the law; for if we are to go into it, it will certainly require time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to suggest to the Senate that there may possibly be a mistake in the resolution as it stands now. I understand that it is not the intention to change the law with regard to the mileage; but as it stands now it is clear to my mind that the resolution gives to each Senator and Representative mileage for every session, no matter how many sessions there may be during a Congress. The law now allows mileage for only two sessions of each Congress; but this resolution will, I think, allow mileage for every session, whether there be three, four, or five during a Congress. I do not suppose that is the intention, but I think that is the effect. It now reads, "on the first day of the second or any subsequent session, he shall receive his mileage as now allowed by law." I propose to obviate the difficulty by striking out the words "or any subsequent," and inserting "regular."

Mr. IVERSON. I do not understand that this resolution will have the effect which the Senator from Maine apprehends.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do; and I think I can satisfy the Senator that it is so.

Mr. IVERSON. The resolution says mileage shall be paid as now provided by law, and the present law prohibits mileage for more than two sessions of a Congress.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senate will observe that the act of 1856, fixing the compensation of members, said that each should receive a salary of $6,000 for a Congress, and mileage as then provided by law; and it went on to make provision that mileage should be received but twice during a Congress. This resolution either unwittingly or cunningly adopts the old language. In the first place, it provides that, at the beginning of the first session of a Congress, each member shall receive the amount of compensation due for attendance, and his mileage, as now provided by law. It goes back behind the law of the last Congress, because that made no provision for mileage. The provision by law for mileage was made long ago. The act passed last year allows the mileage provided by law, with a proviso that it shall only be received at two sessions of a Congress. This resolution provides that, at the beginning of the first session of a Congress, each member shall receive mileage, as now provided by law; and then it further says, that on the first day of the second or any subsequent session, he shall receive mileage as now provided by law. So you see it gives mileage, as provided by law, for every session, no matter how many there may be during a Congress. This brings us back to the old law.

Mr. PUGH. The old law was that mileage should not be given for a session called within ten days of the adjournment of another session.

Mr. IVERSON. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Maine will postpone the bill just as effectually as any other.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I cannot help that.

Mr. HALE. The last act we passed on this subject, reads:

"The compensation of each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress, shall be $6,000 for each Congress, and mileage as now provided by law, for two sessions only."

Then, when that act of 1856 became a law, the mileage was paid for two sessions only; and when this subsequent bill refers to mileage as now provided by law, it takes the existing law and it takes this law too; so that the old law is modified by this law, and when this resolution says "mileage as now provided by law," it means mileage for two sessions only; and, therefore, the objection of the Senator from Maine, begging his pardon, is without any foundation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the Senator is mistaken. I know that when this matter first met my notice, I had some doubt about it; but I examined it carefully, and I suggested it to Senators around me, particularly to the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER.] He has no doubt about it, and I think there can be none. At any rate, it certainly is a doubtful matter, and if it is doubtful we ought to exclude the conclusion, because, at this time to pass an act which is possibly increasing our compensation, would, in my judgment, be very unwise. The Senator will allow me to say, with all respect, that if he will look at the joint resolution carefully he will see he cannot be right, because the last section of it repeals everything passed before inconsistent with this resolution.

Mr. STUART. It is precisely the point last mentioned by the Senator to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate. I agree entirely with what was said by the Senator from New Hampshire. The present compensation law is in force, except in so far as it is repealed by this resolution. The language of the present compensation law is, "mileage as now provided by law for two sessions only." The language of this resolution is, "mileage as now allowed by law," these words, "for two sessions only," remaining in the law, and remaining in force. That called my attention to the repealing clause of this resolution. It is not a general repealing clause; it is only a repealing clause in regard to the postponement of pay and no further. It is in this language:

And be it further resolved, That so much of said act, approved August 16, 1856, as conflicts with this joint resolution, and postpones the payment of said compensation until the close of each session, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

There is no other part of it affected, and none other intended to be affected. The sole object of this resolution is to cure a single difficulty, and that object is rendered definite and explicit by the peculiar words of the repealing clause. After providing a new manner by which the members should receive the pay that had accrued up to the first day of the session, it then repeals all parts of the former act which exclude that. That is the sole effect of the repealing clause.

Mr. BROWN. I feel no especial interest in the passage or non-passage of this bill; but it seems to me we are discussing here a question which has very little in it. Beyond all dispute, at the close of the present session of Congress the members of both Houses will be entitled to the pay accruing from the 4th of March up to the commencement of this session. About that there will be no dispute. On that day they will be entitled to come forward and demand their pay, and receive it. If there be any difficulty, growing not of the pay due to deceased members, to members whose seats have been disputed, or disputes of other kinds arising, they will exist then. This resolution, as I understand it, does not profess to take cognizance of any such disputes, but simply to pay now what the officers of the Government will be required to pay at that time. Whatever would be the right of a member at the close of a session, the bill proposes to give him now. That is all, as I understand, that there is in it.

If, then, a member would be entitled to come forward and get his pay at the close of the session, the bill simply proposes to give him the right to come forward and receive it now. If he would not be entitled to receive it at the close of the session, he will not be entitled to receive it under this bill, if it passes. So that, notwithstanding all the Senator from Delaware has said, this bill does not profess to settle any matter of dispute as to whether the deceased member or his estate shall receive pay, or whether his successor shall receive it; or, in the case of a contest, as to whether the sitting member or the contestant, if he succeeds, shall receive pay. It settles no such dispute, but leaves everything of that kind where we find it, and proposes to pay now what we can undoubtedly receive at the end of the session.

The question is simply whether we shall take our pay at the close of the session or receive it immediately. Other questions, which I admit to be matters of dispute, must become the subject of legislation hereafter; and in their proper time, and in their proper place, they ought to receive consideration. I can see no possible difficulty to the Government or to ourselves, or to anybody else, arising out of the passage of this measure. If the Senate think proper to pass it, very well; if not, I am quite content, so far as I am concerned; but as to the difficulties raised in the way of its passage, they seem to me to amount literally to nothing.

Mr. BAYARD. It seems to me that a great deal of confusion is thrown into the case by passing from one amendment to another, without disposing of any of them. The honorable Senator from Maine suggests an amendment, with a view to prevent what would be very improper on the part of either House, if his construction of the language used be the legitimate one. Certainly we ought not to allow mileage to a greater extent than the original law contemplated. I confess that the remarks which he has made leave me in doubt. I do not say my convictions are strong on this point; but I think it at least doubtful whether mileage may not be claimed for more than two sessions under this provision.

I do not read the repealing clause of this resolution as it is read by the honorable Senator from Michigan. It repeals all that is in conflict with this resolution, and postpones the payment of the compensation. You may give to that the meaning that anything in the law proposed to be amended, which is in conflict with this resolution, is repealed. Now, the very thing in conflict is as to the mileage, which, by the law proposed to be amended, is restricted to two sessions. The resolution provides for mileage at the first, and at every subsequent session of a Congress. Here, then, is a conflict. Without speaking positively on the subject, I think it at least doubtful whether this does not allow mileage for more than two sessions of a Congress. If it does, it certainly ought to be amended.

But I pass from that to my own amendment and the remarks of the honorable Senator from Mississippi in regard to it. It is true, the only difference this resolution makes in the law is to provide that the sum which is now to be paid at the end of the session shall be paid at the commencement; but in that very difference consists the danger of abuse. If you pay the whole sum at the commencement of a session, you are holding out inducements to obtain improper prima facie returns, because the moment a man takes his seat he is enabled to draw back pay on the first day of the session, before it is possible for Congress to decide on the validity of the returns. If he is not paid till the end of the session of course it will be decided during the session, whether the prima facie returns are sufficient to entitle the person to a seat or not.

The danger of abuse arises from the time of payment, and it becomes material for that reason. I think that if you put the law in the position in which it is sought to be put, you will find the abuses under it will become so great that you will have to adopt a provision like that which I suggest, to put a check on fraudulent returns which may be made in order to get $2,000 at the commencement of a session. Such things have occurred in this country, and I am sorry to say that I think there is a strong tendency to increase in matters of that kind. At all events, the legislation of Congress ought to hold out no inducement to them.

Mr. FOSTER. If this were a bill to provide for the payment of any other class of public servants than members of Congress, I should be quite willing to sit here and hear it discussed as long as gentlemen were disposed to discuss it, and to vote, I hope, on the liberal side of the question; but as it concerns ourselves only, and as it seems to me we are suffering more than we are gaining, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD called for the yeas and nays on his amendment; and they were ordered.

Mr. BROWN. I shall vote against this amendment, because I think it is improper to this bill, for the reason I assigned before. This bill only proposes to pay now, what every member as a matter of course could draw at the close of the session. I recognize the principle embodied in the amendment as a proper subject for legislation. At a proper time and place I shall vote for it, but I shall not vote for it here.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Under the circumstances which have transpired in the Senate, I shall feel constrained to vote against the amendment; but I do so with the confident expectation that a bill will be presented by which the law in relation to the compensation of members will be perfected. I know of no case now pending, to which this particular amendment might apply; of course, when a bill is presented and perfected, it can apply to any case which may arise hereafter.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Clay, Davis, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Foster, Harlan, Pearce, Polk, Seward, Trumbull, and Wilson—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Biggs, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Foot, Green, Hale, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Kennedy, King, Mason, Pugh, Reid, Sebastian, Simmons, Slidell, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, and Wright—25.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BAYARD. I have another amendment to offer:

And be it further resolved, That where a Senator who has attended a special session of the Senate convened by the President during the recess of Congress, shall die before the commencement of the next regular session, his representatives shall be entitled to receive the compensation which may have accrued from the end of the last preceding session of Congress to the time of his death; and if such Senator so dying shall not have been a member of either House of Congress at such preceding session, his representatives shall also be entitled to receive the mileage to which he would have been entitled if he had attended the next succeeding regular session; and the provisions of this section shall be extended so as to embrace the representatives of those Senators who attended the last special session of the Senate convened by the President, who have since died before the commencement of this session.

The object of this amendment is to remedy a clear and decided defect in the present law which affects its justice. I am perfectly aware the objection will be made that this is not the time and place to do it, and that it will be done hereafter. If there is no time to do it on this proposition, where is the necessity of the passage of this resolution now. What wonderful necessity is there? We shall get our pay. Why is it rushed now, as it was on Saturday, and pressed so eagerly? What object is there of national moment, of national importance, or any real interest, whether we are to pass this resolution now, or pass it ten days or two weeks hence? If a resolution comes from the House of Representatives, in reference to a bill that contains manifest error, and manifest injustice to others, ought we not to amend it? Why wait, in order to have some other bill gotten up for this purpose? Is not the exigency of justice as great as the exigency of hastening time, where money is to be put into our own pockets?

This amendment has a double aspect. First, it provides for what is defective in the bill. A Senator elect of the United States, attending at the special session in his seat, and dying before the first Monday of December following, is entitled to nothing under the law, as it now stands. That certainly is wrong—wrong on every principle. All the amendment provides is, that when he so dies, his representatives shall be entitled to the pay up to the period of his death.

The amendment then goes on to remedy another defect in the law. There is no mileage allowed, except at the regular session; but if at a called session, where it is the duty of a Senator elect to attend, he being not a member of either House, he must necessarily travel to come here; and if he travels and comes here, he not only gets no pay under the existing law, but he gets no mileage; and if he dies before the next session, his representatives can claim no mileage. That is neither just nor right. The truth is, the bill was framed in a hurry, and passed amidst the confusion and excitement of appropriation bills. Its general object is good enough, but it is very defective in many of its provisions.

Many other amendments might well be offered to the original law, but I have forborne to press or offer any of them, though I know of several that might well be offered. I have only offered those which I thought justice to others (and in which I have no possible interest myself) demanded should be passed. I think this is one imperatively calling on the Senate and House of Representatives for its passage. It goes a step further to provide that, as to three of our deceased colleagues, who died much to the misfortune of the country and to the regret of the Senate, since the last regular session, they should be entitled to their compensation up to the time of their death, because, by the terms of this law, their representatives would not be entitled to anything, though they were all here in attendance with us, and performed their duties at the special session.

Mr. HALE. I stand in the relation of a colleague to one of those deceased members, and one of the last things on earth I would be guilty of, would be withholding from the family of my deceased colleague anything to which he might be legally, equitably, or honorably entitled; but I am free to confess that I do not look on this resolution as the place for that sort of legislation. I am not entirely certain that it is required. Indeed, I have the opinion of gentlemen as well conversant with the construction of these laws as anybody, that this money can now be paid to the representatives of those deceased Senators, without any additional legislation. But, whether necessary or not, I do not think this is the place for it. I believe a great many amendments ought to be made to that law; but as this is a mere resolution fixing and altering the time of payment, I do not think this is the place for them. I have simply made these very few remarks to relieve my colleague and myself, who, I think, concurs with me in the propriety of the vote I shall give, from the imputation or suspicion of withholding justice from the family of his deceased predecessor.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, my predecessor, Mr. Bell, died on the 26th day of May. I was elected to fill his place in the following June. I do not propose, nor do I understand that I shall be entitled to take pay for any time before I was elected. I propose to leave what he would be entitled to where it is now. Any future law may dispose of it as Congress thinks fit. I do not understand that that would make any difference in regard to this resolution.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I now move the amendment I suggested in the seventeenth line, to strike out the words "or any subsequent," and insert "regular," so that the clause will read, "and on the first day of the second regular session he shall receive his mileage as now allowed by law."

The amendment was rejected.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, shall the joint resolution be read a third time?

Mr. BAYARD. I ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

Mr. MASON. I hope the yeas and nays will be granted.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Biggs, Broderick, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Doolittle, Durkee, Fitch, Foot, Green, Hale, Harlan, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Kennedy, King, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Simmons, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, and Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Clay, Davis, Dixon, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Foster, Reid, Seward, Slidell, Trumbull, and Wilson—13.

So the joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BIGGS, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 21, 1857.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. P. D. GURLEY.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

CLERICAL INVESTIGATION.

The SPEAKER appointed Messrs. MAYNARD, DAVIS of Indiana, RICAUD, CURRY, and HORTON, as the committee, authorized on Friday last, to investigate into the accounts and conduct of Hon. William Cullom, late Clerk of the House.

TREASURY NOTE BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the Treasury note bill. Mr. J. also moved the usual resolution for closing debate in Committee of the Whole in one hour after it shall again resume the consideration of said bill, and demanded the previous question upon the latter motion.

Mr. GROW. What is the regular order of business?

The SPEAKER. The call of States for resolutions.

Mr. GROW. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Both motions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] are in order.

Mr. GROW. Do they take precedence of the regular order of business?

The SPEAKER. They are privileged motions, and will take precedence.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. As it seems to be the wish of gentlemen around me, I will fix the time for closing debate two hours after its consideration shall be resumed, instead of one. I demand the previous question upon the motion.

The house divided upon seconding the demand for the previous question, and there were—ayes 89, noes 72.

Mr. BILLINGHURST demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BILLINGHURST and HAWKINS were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 80, noes 83.

So the previous question was not seconded.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE STATE OF MAINE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Maine, that they may be laid upon the table, and printed.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FLORENCE. I ask my colleague to withdraw his motion a moment, to allow me to introduce a bill of which previous notice has been given.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES declined to withdraw.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I trust there will be no objection to my presenting the joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Maine.

No objection being made, the joint resolutions of the Legislature of Maine, in relation to indemnity for French spoiliations, were presented, laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FLORENCE. I now ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill of which previous notice has been given.

Mr. PHELPS. I object to anything but the regular order of business.

Mr. FLORENCE. Is it not a privileged motion?

The SPEAKER. Certainly not.

Mr. FLORENCE. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that it will take but a moment.

Mr. PHELPS. I insist upon the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The question is upon the motion that the debate on the Treasury note bill in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be closed within two hours after the committee shall again resume its consideration.

The motion was not agreed to.

The rules were then suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PHELPS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the

TREASURY NOTE BILL.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the question was upon the following amendment, offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] to the first section of the bill:

Provided, That the power to issue Treasury notes, conferred upon the President of the United States by this act, shall cease and determine on the 1st day of January, 1859—

Upon which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLORENCE] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. LETCHER. Will the gentleman allow me the floor?

Mr. ABBOTT. I desire the floor, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not occupy it.

Mr. FLORENCE. I have no particular anxiety to occupy the floor at this time, and I will yield it to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I object to the gentleman farming out the floor to any one.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield the floor?

Mr. FLORENCE. I do not desire to occupy it at this time.

Mr. ABBOTT obtained the floor and said: I have waited, Mr. Chairman, since this discussion commenced, for the purpose of hearing some gentleman of this House express the views which I entertain, in reference to the bill now before the committee. No gentleman has yet expressed the views I entertain, and I deem it my duty to express them myself.

Gentlemen on the other side of the House, and the Secretary of the Treasury, demand the passage of this important measure upon the ground, as I understand it, of relief to the Treasury—a mere relief bill. Gentlemen on this side of the Hall—my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS] and my friend from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS]—have expressed their assent, as I understand it, to the provisions of this bill, provided they can be qualified and limited in a certain manner.

Now, sir, I am opposed to this bill in toto; I am opposed to it upon principle, and I am opposed to it, also, because I believe it is not necessary, at the present time, as a relief bill. I am not in favor of converting the General Government of this country into a great national bank for the purpose of circulating a paper medium to the extent of $20,000,000; neither do I believe that this measure is necessary as a measure of relief. If this Government is at the present time destitute of means for the purpose of carrying on the Government, I am in favor of furnishing the necessary means, whether the Government is destitute from its own folly and extravagance or from any other cause. I would endeavor to protect the national honor and the national credit; but I would protect it in that way which I consider the least injurious to the public.

[Here the committee rose informally, and a message was received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed a bill entitled "An act to authorize the issue of Treasury notes," in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House. The committee then resumed its session.]

Mr. ABBOTT. What, sir, does this bill propose? It proposes, in the first place, to increase the national debt $20,000,000. It proposes, in the second place, to flood the country with $20,000,000 of circulating medium, which, if the President is right in what he says in his message in reference to banks, will tend to aggravate and prolong the present commercial embarrassment.

Now, sir, I propose as a relief to the Treasury at the present time, that we curtail the expenses of the General Government by lopping off some of the unnecessary expenditures to which the Government is now subjected, or, in other words, by abolishing, or, at least, suspending, some of the sinecures of the country. If we can relieve the Treasury $20,000,000 by lopping off some of the expenditures of the Government which are unnecessary, it will be far better, in my humble judgment, than to issue $20,000,000 of Treasury notes. Well, sir, how can it be done? I will say to gentlemen of this House, on the one side and the other, that if there has been the same creation of unnecessary offices all over the country as there has been in the town in which I reside, and you will lop off those unnecessary expenditures, you will relieve the Treasury from more than twenty million dollars per annum. In the little town where I reside there is a population of only five thousand inhabitants. In that little town, since President Pierce's administration came into power, in 1852, there have been two offices created, at an expense to the General Government of $4,100 per annum. One of these offices was named aid to the revenue for the towns of Northport and Lincolnville, and the officer was appointed from Belfast, at a cost of $1,100 per annum. The other of these sinecures—I will not call it an office—was given to a gentleman in California, at an expense to the General Government of $3,000, or more, per annum; making in all $4,100.

Now, sir, what are the duties of those officers? The aid to the revenue has no duties whatever to perform. Before the collection district was divided, only three officers were required to discharge the duties of the customs—a collector, a deputy, and a tide-waiter. After that district was divided, the same number of officers, at the same expense, was retained. The duties involved in the collection of the customs at that port are only about half as much as they were before the division of the collection district, and yet the same number of officers has been retained. Shortly after the inauguration of President Pierce, in 1852, the Democratic paper in my town came out, because of certain circumstances and of certain positions which the Chief Magistrate then took against the renomination and reelection of Franklin Pierce. It was then thought necessary to establish another paper, and another paper was established, and it was necessary that the paper thus established, to sustain the views of Franklin Pierce and his fallen fortunes, should be maintained. But, in order to support it, it was necessary to create a new office, and that office has followed the publication of the paper to this day. There have been several changes in the publishers of that paper, but at every change this office has descended to the incumbent. It is a sort of heir-loom, going with that paper, and the incumbent has nothing to do with the duties of the customs. Now, sir, in relation to this appointment of the Californian, I do not know that that office has any name; I know of none. I do not know that it is worthy of a name. But, at any rate, the office was created, and as I understand it, the incumbent is a sort of general political agent for all California. Now, sir, what are his duties? He has duties to perform, I suppose, but I know of none. I have heard of no duties which that gentleman has to perform in California, except to act as an agent to superintend everything in general and nothing in particular.

Strike off these sinecures, if they exist all over the country as they do in this little locality, and you will relieve the revenue of more than $20,000,000—all that is required, according to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. Take the question thus, which is the fair way of stating it: If there be expended in a territory which contains only five thousand inhabitants, $4,100 per annum, how much will be expended in a territory which has thirty millions? You will have, Mr. Chairman, $24,600,000, or $4,600,000 more than is wanted to meet the estimated deficiency in the Treasury for the present fiscal year.

This, Mr. Chairman, is the proper, legitimate mode of relieving the Treasury. I would not have the Treasury embarrassed; I would not have the national credit dishonored; but I would have this deficiency in the national Treasury furnished in some better way than by converting this Government into a great national bank, and flooding this country with $20,000,000 of paper currency, in addition to what is now in circulation, to inflate the currency and aggravate the present commercial embarrassment.

Sir, with what propriety can gentlemen ask us on this side of the House to vote for this bill, when, by lopping off these sinecures, they can relieve the Treasury from all the estimated or contemplated deficiencies? I do not know, Mr. Chairman, that the appointment or creation of these sinecures—to be paid out of the national Treasury—is a fraud upon the people of the country; but I say this much, that, in my humble judgment, it comes so near a fraud, that I should like to see some gentleman point out to me the slightest difference between it and a fraud. I can see none. And yet we are asked to vote for a bill which I think, to say the least of it, is inexpedient and improper under the circumstances. If it is necessary to raise money to meet the immediate wants of the Government, let us resort to a small temporary loan, instead of resorting to this measure.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to allude to one other matter in connection with this subject. The President, in his annual message, as I understand it, charges the whole difficulty now existing in the monetary affairs of this country, wholly and unqualifiedly on the banks of this country. Now, so far as that is concerned, the banks are no more chargeable with the present financial condition of the country, than they are chargeable with the extravagance that has depleted the Treasury of the United States. The banks are no more chargeable with these embarrassments that now exist, than they are chargeable with having corrupted the national Government. Have the banks excited the national Government to this extravagance that we see everywhere existing? I am no friend of banks or of paper money, but still I do not wish to hear the banking institutions of this country branded, if I may use the term, without saying a word in their favor. I have never been the friend of banking institutions, or of paper money, and I have been especially opposed to the extravagant issue of paper money; but I do not wish to see the banks of the country placed in a position by the Executive to which they are not entitled. The President, in his message, says:

"In all former revulsions, the blame might have been fairly attributed to a variety of cooperating causes; but not so upon the present occasion. It is apparent that our existing misfortunes have proceeded solely from our extravagant and vicious system of paper currency and bank credits, exciting the people to wild speculations and gambling in stocks. These revulsions must continue to recur at successive intervals, so long as the amount of the paper currency and bank loans and discounts of the country shall be left to the discretion of fourteen hundred irresponsible banking institutions."

That paragraph contains two distinct errors. In the first place, the banks are not irresponsible. They may be irresponsible to the national Government, and I am glad, Mr. Chairman, that they are; for if they were not, I should be afraid that they would be corrupted. They are responsible directly to their own State governments. Their charters limit and qualify and regulate all their actions. Neither are they responsible for this embarrassment that has come on the commercial interests at the present time. What, Mr. Chairman, is the true cause of this commercial revulsion, under which we are now laboring? It is, in my judgment, simply this: the community has traded with foreign Governments more than the amount of their exports. The present revulsion is an ordinary one, common to all commercial countries that trade with foreign communities beyond the amount of their exports. In other words, when the imports of a country exceed the exports, then that country is going behindhand—precisely the same as when the expenditure of an individual exceeds his income, he sinks deeper and deeper into embarrassment. If a country imports more than it exports, then it is sinking; and, by-and-by, comes pay day; and when pay day comes the specie is drawn from the country, and then comes the revulsion. This is the true cause, and the only true cause of the commercial revulsion in all commercial countries. It is here as everywhere else.

One word further. This message, as I understand it, charges on the banks all these commercial troubles; thus making the banks exceedingly potent for evil. And turning over a few pages more of the message, we find the President, in that portion of the message that relates to Kansas, intimating that banking institutions are of no consequence whatever, that none of the local or domestic institutions of the North are of the slightest consequence whatever, and that the only institution which is of any sort of consequence to the people of the country is the slavery institution. The banking institutions, literary institutions, common schools, and all the other institutions of the North, are of no sort of consequence when the President comes to discuss the Kansas question; but when he discusses commercial revulsion he shoulders the responsibility from the national Government to the banks, and then it is that the institutions of the North are of some importance, then it is that the banking institutions are potent for evil.

I would say one word more in relation to the banking institutions of the country. I know but little about those of the West. I know but little about those of the South. But I know that the banking institutions of New England, and the banking institutions of the middle States have been, for the last four or five years, as solvent and as prudent in their operations as any banks ever were in any country.

And I will say further, that the banking institutions and the people of this country have not been half so extravagant as the national Government have been. I have here a few statistics, for it may be said that the national Government has not run into this extravagance. Figures sometimes give us some light on these questions. In 1831, the expenditures of the Government, I find from the Treasurer's report, were $25,044,358 40. The expenditures of the Government for the year 1830 were about the same. In 1852, they were $46,007,896 20. Then, in twenty-one years the expenditures of the Government were increased from a little over twenty-five millions to more than forty-six million dollars per annum.

Again, as I have stated, the expenses of the Government, in 1852, were $46,007,896 20; but for the fiscal year of 1857, the expenses ran up to $70,822,724 85. Here, then, in a period of only five years, we have an increase in the Government expenses of $24,814,828 65.

Sir, how did this happen? I have shown to you that this enormous increase has taken place in consequence of the extravagance of the national Government. I have shown you, by reference to my own little town, that in that town have been expended, in purely sinecure offices, more than four thousand one hundred dollars per annum. If there have been expenditures in the same ratio for the same useless purposes all over the Union, the amount would reach $24,600,000—more than the estimated deficiency of the Treasury. It would have paid the $20,000,000 now asked for, and have left a surplus of $4,600,000 in the Treasury.

Mr. Chairman, I am not going to ask gentlemen on the other side of the House to abolish these sinecure offices, if they wish to keep them up; but I am going to ask them, if they will not abolish them, to at least suspend them for one year, that the Treasury may be relieved. I do not know but gentlemen may find it necessary to keep up these sinecures, which began shortly after the commencement of the administration of Franklin Pierce, and have continued to the present time. There may have been a necessity for these sinecures, an absolute necessity, in order that the national Government might sustain its political power. It is well known that politicians want place, and that they will have place or abandon the Administration. Place they must have, and places they have had, until, within the last five years, they have increased the expenses of the national Government from $46,000,000 to over $70,000,000.

Now, sir, I do not know how gentlemen who have the control and responsibility of the Government—for they will not allow us on this side of the House to have any control in the matter—I do not know how they can ask us to go into the passage of this bill, and thus increase the national debt $20,000,000. Sir, I would have this House begin the work of retrenchment here; I would have this House set the example of reform to the other branches of the Government. Instead of providing additional messengers and additional pages; instead of creating additional clerkships for all your standing committees to do the work proper for members themselves to do; instead of increasing our expenses by these various means, I would commence by lopping off our expenses, or, at least, suspend their increase, at any rate, until the Treasury has been relieved from its necessities. When these necessities have been relieved, then there may be some excuse for these sinecures. Then the gentlemen who wish to sustain power and to ingraft upon this country a policy which is obnoxious to a great portion of the people of the country, may, if they choose, continue these sinecures. I care not for them.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, its Secretary—the Speaker having temporarily resumed the chair for that purpose—informing the House that the Senate had passed a resolution for the adjournment of the two Houses of Congress, in which he asked the concurrence of the House.]

But, sir, it may be asserted that, owing to the troubles in Utah, more money may be necessary to meet the expenses of the present current year than has been required for preceding years. We are now, at the present moment, at peace with all the world—at any rate, we are at peace with all foreign Powers, and might be at peace with ourselves, if we would take the army now stationed in Kansas for the purpose of crushing out freedom in that Territory, and transfer it to Utah. If we put that army to work in Utah, we might not only be at peace with all foreign Powers, but we would be at peace with ourselves.

Mr. Chairman, I have made these few remarks not with any design of going into all the details of the question. I wished only to state these few points to the committee. While I shall vote against the bill without the amendment of my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] I am not opposed to it in toto. I am opposed to it in its present condition; but I shall not be opposed to it if it shall be so amended as to bring it to what I believe to be judicious and necessary. I am ready to meet the wants of the President; and if they cannot be met in any other proper manner, then I may be induced to agree to this bill. But, sir, for the present, I deem this bill injudicious and unnecessary; and I hope, therefore, that this House will look into it, and carefully consider its features before they take the responsibility of passing it.

Mr. LETCHER. I am very glad to learn that the somewhat distinguished firm—HOUSTON, JONES & Co.—is likely to receive some important accessions. We have heretofore been charged with being very illiberal in our votes, and whenever any proposition has been brought in here which we thought proper to oppose, gentlemen on the other side have regarded our opposition as a sufficient ground for voting in favor of it. I find now that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. ABBOTT] has come upon our platform, and that he has commenced to lecture Government upon the subject of extravagance. But there were one or two things in connection with that lecture which struck me as a little remarkable. The gentleman tells us that in his town, in Maine, the Government has expended a vast deal of money unnecessarily, and that it has somehow or other been connected with a newspaper establishment existing at that place. Now, sir, if the officers are unnecessary; if their salaries ought not to be paid; if it is profligacy and extravagance to have the officers, why does not the gentleman signalize his advent here by introducing a bill to abolish those offices which he knows to be useless?

Mr. ABBOTT. I will state to the gentleman that I have an amendment to that effect, which I shall offer to this bill.

Mr. LETCHER. Such an amendment to this bill! An amendment to reduce the number of officers to be added to a Treasury note bill! [Laughter.] I apprehend the gentleman will find, after he has been here a short time, that he will never get a man in that chair who will not rule such an amendment out of order, under such circumstances. Let him bring in a bill, so as to repeal not only the law which gives officers there, but repeal all other laws which establish useless offices elsewhere—

Mr. ABBOTT. I have it in my hand.

Mr. LETCHER. A bill?

Mr. ABBOTT. No; an amendment.

Mr. LETCHER. But I do not think the gentleman's amendment will fit this bill. That is all. If he can get it in, and the officers are useless, I will vote with him.

But we had a little chance for economy the other day, when it was proposed to allow clerks to various committees of this House. It seems to me that there was a chance where the gentleman might have shown a regard to economy by voting with us, who voted against them.

Mr. ABBOTT. I voted against all those propositions.

Mr. LETCHER. I am glad to hear it, for it is still better evidence that he is coming to our side. Now, sir, the gentleman tells us that the Government expenditures for the last year have reached upwards of $70,000,000, and intimates that that expenditure is chargeable upon the present Administration. How can that be? Who had the majority in this House in the last Congress?

Several VOICES. Nobody.

Mr. LETCHER. Nobody! ah, I thought the Know Nothings had it. [Laughter.] At any rate, the majority was not a Democratic majority. That is plain and clear; and if anybody is responsible for the expenditures voted in this House, it is not the Democratic party, which were in a minority in this Hall at that time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. You had possession of the Senate.

Mr. LETCHER. We had possession of the Senate! I will attend to that soon. By the way, what has become of that court-house of yours in Galena? [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. All right.

Mr. LETCHER. He was for the expense of building a court-house where no court was held, yet he holds the Democratic party responsible for profligacy in spending the public money.

And, then besides, if I recollect right, my friend from Illinois not only was not content to take his own, but in order to get it was willing to go into partnership with fifteen or twenty others for similar purposes.

It seems to me, then, that we are not exactly the persons, nor is the President exactly the person, to be taunted with this course of expenditure. Does not the gentleman from Maine [Mr. ABBOTT] know the fact that not a dollar of the public money can be drawn from the Treasury unless an appropriation by Congress is first made? Does he not know that a bill for that purpose must originate in Congress, pass both Houses, and be sent to the President for his approval, before it becomes the law of the land?

Enough for that. I have no doubt the gentleman will find the Democratic party of this House ready at any time to vote with him—I can answer for one, at least—upon every proposition that proposes to reduce the expenditures of the Government without prejudice to the public service and interest, and without in any manner affecting the power and responsibility of the Government itself.

But let me come to the consideration of this bill. Gentlemen say that they do not see any necessity for the introduction of this bill at this time, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania over the way, [Mr. RICHIE,] who addressed the House last Saturday, read certain portions of the President's message referring to the Treasury note bill, which is the subject of consideration now. He stated that the President did not seem to be exactly certain that these Treasury notes were needed at the present time—that he supposed they might be needed at some period of the present session, but not at a period so early. Now, I understand the President to refer to that matter in the extract correctly reported as the gentleman quoted it; but I understand, at the same time, that the President calls the attention of this House to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, as presenting his views upon this and other questions connected with the Treasury Department. Well, let us see what the Secretary of the Treasury says in his report upon this subject; and we will see there, perhaps, the necessity for it, and I shall endeavor to adduce some reasons to show why the necessity exists.

On the seventh page of the Secretary's report he says:

"The efficiency of the public service, as well as the security of the public credit, requires that this Department shall be provided with means to meet lawful demands without delay. During the remainder of the present fiscal year, it is estimated, as before stated, that sufficient revenue will be received in the course of the year to meet the ordinary outstanding appropriations. But the great bulk of the revenue being derived from duties on merchandise, payable only when it is entered for consumption, the period when such duties will be realized is entirely uncertain, being left by law to the option of the importers during three years. The present revulsion has caused a very large portion of the dutiable merchandise imported since it commenced to be warehoused without payment of duty. To what extent this practice will be pursued during the present fiscal year is too much a matter of conjecture at present to risk the public service and the public credit upon the probability of an immediate change in this respect. It may be safely estimated that, in the course of the present fiscal year, a large portion of the merchandise now in warehouse will be withdrawn and duties paid thereon; but, in the mean time, adequate means for meeting lawful demands on the Treasury should be provided. Such provision should be made at the earliest practicable period, as a failure of sufficient means in the Treasury may occur at an early day. The exigency being regarded as temporary, the mode of providing for it should be of a temporary character. It is, therefore, recommended that authority be given to this Department, by law, to issue Treasury notes for an amount not to exceed twenty million dollars, payable within a limited time, and carrying a specified rate of interest, whenever the immediate demands of the public service may call for a greater amount of money than shall happen to be in the Treasury, subject to the Treasurer's drafts in payment of warrants."

There, sir, is the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, and there are the reasons upon which the recommendation is founded.

Now, let us look at the state of trade, and see whether those reasons are not justified by the facts which are upon the records of the Treasury Department, and that establish clearly and conclusively that, at this moment, there is a large amount of dutiable goods in the warehouses of the United States, and that those goods are lying uncalled for because this commercial revulsion has cut off the parties from the means of withdrawing them at present, and turning them into the channels of trade.

I have here a comparative statement showing the amount of importations into the district of New York, during the months of October and November, of the years 1856 and 1857, classified respectively under the following heads: "Specie and bullion;" "free, (exclusive of specie and bullion);" "dutiable, entered for consumption, and warehoused." In the month of October, 1856, within that district, there were imported $13,825,592, and in November of the same year, $14,468,545. Now, sir, let us compare that with the importations in the months of October and November, in the present year. We shall discover that the importations are very nearly the same for the two months in each year; and yet we will find, when we come to examine the quantity of goods retained in warehouses during the two periods, that there is an essential and a very wide difference. In October of this year, $14,439,867 worth of goods were imported, and in November, $13,417,960. Of the $13,825,592 worth of goods which were imported in the month of October, 1856, $12,768,782 worth were withdrawn during that month, and went into the consumption of the country; in the month of November, of the $14,468,545 worth imported, $13,049,271 worth were withdrawn, and went into consumption. Now, sir, we come down to the same period of time in this year, after this commercial revulsion took place, and we find that out of the $14,439,867 worth of goods imported in October, $10,148,324 worth were withdrawn for consumption, and the balance remains in warehouse, a large portion of it even up to this time. In the month of November, the disparity was still greater; for of the $13,417,960 worth of goods imported in that month, but $8,613,777 worth were withdrawn for consumption. Then, sir, is it not palpable that this commercial revulsion has produced an effect, and a very great effect, upon the commercial intercourse of the country; and that, owing to this fact, the amount received from duties has been essentially diminished, and that there are now, of the importations of those two months, something like nine million dollars worth of goods uncalled for on this 21st day of December.

But let me go still further. Do gentlemen know what amount of dutiable goods was warehoused within the district of New York, up to the 30th day of November last? The returns to the Treasury Department show that there were upwards of $28,000,000 there, then under bond; and since that time additions have been made to it, so that it is fair to estimate that there is at the present time not less, in that district alone, than $30,000,000 under the warehousing act—which allows goods to remain for a period of three years—uncalled for, and that will not be called for until later in the winter, or possibly in the spring. If that is the case in New York, how is it if you take all the importing districts of the United States? There are a multitude of these districts—at New Orleans, Charleston, and elsewhere—and it would be fair, I suppose, if there are $30,000,000 in New York at this time, to estimate the amount under bond in the various other collection districts, at from ten to fifteen million dollars. So that here would be, of dutiable goods uncalled for, and upon which the duties will not be paid until called for for consumption, between forty and forty-five million dollars, which will pay into the Treasury duties to the amount of about ten or twelve millions. Is not the Secretary of the Treasury right, then, when he says that this is only a temporary deficiency, and that, in consequence of the temporary character of this deficiency, it would be advisable to issue Treasury notes instead of negotiating a permanent loan? But gentlemen say in this connection, and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. ABBOTT] indicated it, as well as other gentlemen on the other side of the House, that the Secretary of the Treasury has managed these affairs very badly; that he has undertaken to redeem public stocks; and that, using the money for that purpose, he has squandered the means which would have deprived him of the necessity, at the present time, of recommending the issue of Treasury notes.

Now, let us see how that is; under the act passed in 1853—for which I voted, and, I doubt not, most of the gentlemen here, who were then upon this floor, voted—the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to purchase, at the current market prices, any of the outstanding stocks of the United States, as he might think most advisable, from any surplus funds in the Treasury, provided that the balance in the Treasury should not be at any time reduced below $6,000,000. There was the instruction of Congress to the Secretary of the Treasury, given in the month of March, 1853, directing him, if there should be any surplus money in the Treasury, to apply that surplus money to the purchase of stocks.

And, sir, does it not come with a bad grace from any gentleman on the other side of the House now to arraign the Secretary of the Treasury upon this floor, when he voted for House bill of the last session of Congress (No. 816) to deposit the entire surplus in the Treasury on the 1st day of July last, with the exception of $2,000,000, with the States? When that bill was up here, it received the strength—almost the entire strength—of the then Opposition to the Democratic party; it was passed through the House, but failed to be successful in the Senate; and that bill proposed, as I have said, to take all the funds in the Treasury on the 1st day of July, with the exception of $2,000,000, and to distribute them (or deposit them, if you please) with the States upon the conditions therein specified. Now, suppose your proposition had been successful, that your bill had become a law, and that all the money in the Treasury on the 1st of July last, had been taken and deposited with the States; in how much worse a position would the Government have been than it is at present? But that bill failed, and now the Secretary is arraigned, for doing what? For taking the $16,000,000 and applying it to the purchase of stocks, which would have been taken from the Treasury under that law? No, sir. He has applied in the purchase of stock, including principal and interest, from the 13th of July, 1857, to the 17th of October, 1857, $4,520,104 47. I complain of no gentleman for voting for that bill, but I do complain that gentlemen who voted for it should arraign the Secretary now for applying to the purchase of stock only one fourth of the amount which would have been taken from the Treasury, under that bill, in the way of deposits to the States.

Well, sir, the banks suspended, I believe, somewhere between the 12th and 20th of October, and the amount of stocks redeemed, after the 12th day of October, was only $212,513 31; an amount that was then on its way to the office of the Secretary of the Treasury for redemption. What was the condition of the Treasury after this redemption had taken place? The Secretary had left in the Treasury $12,258,531 01, after all the stocks had been redeemed that had been presented, and that he chose to redeem. You will observe that the ninth section of the act of 1853 provided, that the Secretary should reserve $6,000,000 in the Treasury; but, instead of reserving $6,000,000, he reserved upwards of $12,000,000; and he reserved it upon the principle that $6,000,000 was necessary to carry on the current operations of the Government, and that a like sum of $6,000,000 was necessary for carrying on the coining operations at the Mint, to meet the charges upon the Mint in the way of returns for the bullion deposited there for coinage. The Secretary, not content with sticking to the letter of the law requiring him to hold $6,000,000, out of abundant caution had in the Treasury of the United States a sum beyond $12,000,000, to meet the contingencies that might arise.

Now, sir, with this statement of the case, can it be pretended that the Secretary of the Treasury has gone beyond the line of his duty? Here is the law laying down that line of duty for him. He followed that law except in regard to the amount to be retained in the Treasury, and in that regard he protected the Treasury to the extent of $6,000,000 beyond what Congress, in 1853, regarded as a sum sufficient for its protection. It seems to me, then, that he ought not to be complained of; but, on the contrary, that he ought to be regarded as having performed his duty, and performed it faithfully, under the law given to him for his guidance. If you take the receipts and expenditures for the period of time commencing in July last, and running down to the present time, you will find how the revenue has fallen off, and you will find that it confirms the tables which I have heretofore presented in regard to the amount of goods on bond in three warehouses, as one of the causes that have cut off this revenue. For the week ending July 13, the receipts in the Treasury were $3,761,553 11, while the expenditures were $2,700,942 48. It runs on through the month of July, never getting below $2,059,000. In the month of August the average receipts per week were $1,500,000. In the month of September the revenue for the first week was $1,041,765 74, and on the 28th it had run down to $660,257 14. In that descending scale you will find the revenue reduced in proportion as the market became more stagnant from the suspension of specie payment, and at one time it ran down as low as $441,192 78.

There is another fact that appears from this table, that for the last week the receipts of the Treasury, from revenues, have increased upwards of $100,000. The receipts for the week ending 7th December, were $562,473 81, and for the week ending 14th December, $676,903 67. I account for that increase in this way. Here were articles that were imported to be consumed in the approaching holidays. These articles were required to be taken out of bond for the purpose of bringing them into market, and it is the demand thus created that has run up the revenue at New York from $562,473 to $676,903 in the week that closed the 14th of the present month. So much, then, for these statistics!

But, say gentlemen on the other side, "We are opposed to Government paper money. We dislike the idea of making the Government a great bank, and investing it with the power and authority to circulate notes throughout the country, while the President himself is denouncing the banking institutions of the States." Now, I maintain, in the first place, that this bill does not create a bank. I think there is one fact which clearly and conclusively settles that point. How many of our friends on the other side, who have engaged in this discussion, are in favor of a bank of the United States? Are they not all for it?

Mr. LOVEJOY. No, sir.

Mr. LETCHER. How many of you are opposed to it?

Mr. LOVEJOY. Three fourths.

Mr. FOSTER. It is an obsolete idea.

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman says it is an obsolete idea. Then, I suppose, the gentlemen have embraced a new idea, and that they are now for a hard-money currency.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. LETCHER. And yet, strange to tell, the gentleman who just closed his remarks [Mr. ABBOTT] wound up with a eulogy on stock banks; and my friend from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS], who spoke on Saturday, arraigned the President and Secretary of the Treasury for the suggestion of a bankrupt law intended to be applied to the banks that have suspended, or failed to redeem their obligations! Now I cannot exactly understand how it is that while gentlemen are in favor of hard money, they are yet disposed, whenever the question comes up as a State measure, to rally to the standard of the paper-money banks in the several States of the Union, and insist that every man shall stand with hands off so far as they are concerned, although these banks may be at the time in a state of suspension, refusing to pay their debts, while they are coercing payment from

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1857.

NEW SERIES.....No. 9.

every man that has had the misfortune to borrow a dollar from them.

Now, I profess to be as much a hard-money man as any one; and if gentlemen can convince me that the issue of these Treasury notes—which I regard as nothing more than a means of effecting a loan—leads to the establishment of a Government bank of any kind whatever, I pledge myself to go against it. I do not go exactly so far against banks as a distinguished politician of my State—John Randolph—did when he pronounced all banks “houses of ill-fame.”

But while I do this, I think that the banking system has been carried to a very ruinous extent; and I have no hesitation in saying now, that if I was in the Legislature of my State at this crisis, I should go for a divorce between bank and State, for selling every dollar of stock that the State of Virginia has in banking institutions, and for the collection of revenue in gold and silver.

What is the issue of Treasury notes but a mere loan? What else is it? The money is to be raised. It is to be raised in some way, either by a permanent loan, or by this temporary expedient—the issue of Treasury notes. Gentlemen say, give us a loan. What do you want with a loan? Do you want this to be a permanent debt? Do you want the Secretary of the Treasury to say that what he has regarded as a temporary necessity shall require the permanent medicine of a loan for years? Do you want to couple with this not only the loan itself and its permanent establishment on the Government for years, but do you want also to create the necessity for revising the tariff, and for increasing the rates of duty? Now, sir, if a loan is to be established, if it is to go in as part and parcel of the national debt, what will be the next cry? Do gentlemen want any further indication than has been furnished on this floor here by some gentlemen who have addressed the House, and alluded to the tariff act of last session? I take it that this is, perhaps, one of the causes of dissatisfaction with the President of the United States on the part of some of the gentlemen who are known to favor the doctrine of protection for protection's sake.

The President, on the thirteenth page of his message, says:

“As stated in the report of the Secretary, the tariff of March 3, 1857, has been in operation for so short a period of time, and under circumstances so unfavorable to a just development of its results as a revenue measure, that I should regard it as inexpedient, at least for the present, to undertake its revision.”

Now, I take it that it is that position, taken by the Secretary of the Treasury, and sustained by the President, that has aroused a vast deal of the opposition of those known to be protective-tariff men in this House, against the introduction and adoption of this measure. If the Secretary of the Treasury would come forward and propose a loan to run for eight, or ten, or fifteen years, I doubt not that that would be more agreeable to the gentlemen on the other side of the House than the temporary issue of Treasury notes, as proposed. It is not so to me. I think this recommendation is preferable to theirs. It is temporary only, and is intended for nothing more. It is not to extend beyond the year. It is intended to serve until the goods are withdrawn from the warehouses and the duties received. But, said the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Banks,] I am opposed to your proposition, because you have no provision there for funding this debt. Why does he want it funded, unless he wants to make it permanent? What other reason can there be for providing that it shall be funded, than to give it the character of permanency and settled stability as the policy of the Government with regard to the debt itself.

But let us see how the gentleman's idea is going to work out. The gentleman has referred to the act of 1847, authorizing the issue of Treasury notes. Let us call his attention to the fact that the House was at that time presided over by the distinguished gentleman, Mr. Winthrop, of Massachusetts, and that the House was an Opposition House. But, sir, under the act of 1847

Treasury notes were issued, some of which are unredeemed to this day, and are supposed to be lost. There are something like $100,000 of them outstanding still. During the past summer some of those Treasury notes have been presented at the Treasury, and, instead of being redeemed, under the operation of that law, they were funded; and in some instances, in less than one week they were sent back to the Treasury, and the Government was compelled to pay the premium of sixteen dollars on the $100.

Now, sir, if there had been no law for funding the debt, the Government would not have been compelled to pay this premium of sixteen dollars. But under the operation of that provision, which the gentleman wants to have incorporated into the present bill, they had the right to come in there and have them funded, and then take the premium. I know the gentleman from Massachusetts does not desire to adopt a policy which shall impose upon the Government an additional burden of sixteen dollars on the $100, but I call his attention to the fact that he may have the opportunity of meeting the point in regard to this feature which he seeks to ingraft upon the bill now before us.

Mr. BANKS. If the gentleman from Virginia desires an answer now, I will give it.

Mr. LETCHER. If the gentleman will not take too much of my time, I will yield to him certainly.

Mr. BANKS. The proposition which I made, Mr. Chairman, with regard to this bill, and the objections which I made to the bill as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, are not answered by the suggestions of the gentleman from Virginia. There is no necessity, under the proposition I have made, that the Government shall go into the market for the purpose of buying up stock at fifteen, twenty, or twenty-one per cent. premium. That is the objection which the gentleman makes, as I understand it. You may limit the issue of stock to one, two, or three, years—for as short a time as you please—and the Government will never be under the necessity of purchasing stock at a premium. There are plenty of people who desire nothing so much as a safe investment for their funds, whether they be much or little; and therefore, if the stock of the United States be issued at six per cent. interest, it will be taken up for one year, two years, or three years, just as gentlemen choose. There will then be no necessity for purchasing this stock at a premium, as heretofore.

If the gentleman asks whether the Secretary of the Treasury was justified in paying a premium for the stock purchased in the three years past, I answer that I think he was justified. But I say to the gentleman from Virginia that the Government of this country ought never to have placed the Secretary of the Treasury in a position which obliged him to purchase stock at a high premium. It was the fault of Congress in not adopting the recommendations of the late Administration. The adoption of the course of policy recommended by the Administration which has recently expired would have relieved the Secretary of the Treasury from the necessity of such purchases.

That Administration commenced with a recommendation by Mr. Guthrie for the revision of the tariff, for two purposes: first, to reduce the surplus money in the Treasury, and, second, to relieve the industrial interests of the country from burdens imposed by the previous policy of the Government. Congress did not act upon that recommendation. I am willing to relieve the gentleman from Virginia from any responsibility for the course pursued. The gentleman advocated measures which, if successful, would have relieved, three years since, the Treasury of its surplus. But, sir, the Government did not adopt that policy. Instead of revising the tariff laws, as recommended by Mr. Guthrie in 1853 and 1854, it devoted its entire energies to the settlement of those questions in which the country has been involved, ever since the repeal of the Missouri compromise. It was for that reason, because the energies of the country have, for the last four or five years, been devoted exclusively to sectional questions, that the industrial interests of the country have suffered. It was for that reason that the surplus in the Treasury was permitted to accumulate as it did.

Now, sir, I say to the gentleman, leave the question to us and we will relieve his friends of their difficulty. We will take the negro out of the Government and allow it to give its attention to this matter. Let gentlemen give some attention to the industrial interests of the country for a few years. Give us a little legislation for the benefit of white men, and there will not again a surplus accumulate in the Treasury, such as has been there for the last four or five years.

And let me say another word to the gentleman from Virginia. He declaims against the issue of paper money upon the part of the States, reechoing the sentiment of the President upon this question. Now, sir, I do not stand here to defend the paper money system of the country as carried on by the States. On the contrary, I desire as earnestly as any man in this country, to see a proper and judicious reform. But I take issue with the President and with the gentleman from Virginia, if he follows the lead of the President in this matter, in the assertion that the issue of paper money by the States is the sole cause of those commercial revulsions which have swept over the country with so terrible an effect. But I have to say that we cannot go to the people of the States and ask them to forego their privilege of issuing paper money when the same Government which he defends in the denunciation of that system have taken up the business of issuing inconvertible paper money, as proposed by this bill. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to allow us to appeal to the people of the States to restrict their issues of paper money upon some sound and judicious plan, by refusing to the Government the power which they now ask of issuing inconvertible paper money, without any limit in respect to the time of redemption, or when its authority shall cease.

Mr. LETCHER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman will soon be in the gubernatorial chair of the State of Massachusetts, and I shall look with some interest to his first message, to see what reforms he will recommend for the banking system of that State. I trust he will recommend an alteration, as far as the banking system of his own State is concerned, and that that alteration will be radical—that his reforms will go to the bottom of the system.

Mr. BANKS. If the gentleman desires me to answer, I will answer now. Wherever I am, I shall advocate, and, as far as I have the power, sustain, every judicious—or, if the gentleman pleases—radical reform, in the banking system. But, I repeat again, that if I go to Massachusetts and ask them to restrict their issues, I shall be met by every banker in the State with the declaration that the gentleman from Virginia, and the hard-money men here, propose that the Government of the United States shall resume the business of issuing paper money. If the Government will not forego the advantage of issuing paper money, why should individual bankers forego that privilege? And I think it will be very difficult for the gentleman from Virginia, to answer their argument.

Mr. LETCHER. I do not see the slightest difficulty in answering it. What are these Treasury notes but an acknowledgment in writing, upon the part of the Government, that it owes so much? As I understand it, the gentlemen upon the other side, for the purpose of making these Treasury notes a currency, propose to provide indorsements, by which they are to pass from hand to hand, and in this way make the national Treasury responsible for every indorsement in the chain of indorsement, from the issuing of the notes down to the time of payment. Now that is one of my very reasons for going for it—that it neither establishes a debt, nor does it make the Government paper currency. But if it did, is not it remarkable that, under the issue of Treasury notes in 1837, 1840, 1843, 1846, and 1847, a regular paper currency was not then established, and when, in that latter year, Treasury notes to the amount of $36,263,000 were issued? Was that a currency? Did it go into the ordinary channels of circulation, and pass from hand to hand as ordinary bank bills did?

Again, these Treasury notes provide for the payment of interest. Do your bank notes provide for the payment of interest? Not at all. You cannot get the principal even upon a bank note, a large portion of the time, to say nothing about the interest.

Mr. BANKS. I beg leave of the gentleman from Virginia to say that the very feature which he states as the distinguishing characteristic between a Treasury note and a bank bill has been taken from bank bills, by special enactment. Banks in this country have been prohibited from allowing interest on their notes.

Mr. LETCHER. So much the worse.

Mr. BANKS. So much the better. Interest gives them legs by which they walk off to the distant parts of the country. The difficulty with banks is to get their bills out. They would be glad to pay interest upon bank bills so that they might walk off, and perhaps never come back. But the United States gives to its paper money that characteristic power to walk off so that under this bill they may never come back again.

Between the paper money he proposes to issue, and the paper money issued by the banks of the country, there will be no difference, except as to the degree of credit attached to the one and the other. First, this Government money is inconvertible on demand; it is receivable for public dues; the creditors of the Government are required to take it for their dues—at their option I admit, as to creditors. It is the same as to bank bills. Creditors in no case are required by the law of any State to accept bank bills in discharge of their dues. It is left to the option of the creditors to take this Government paper, it is true; but the option comes to a man under such circumstances, that it results in little less than that he may take that or nothing. The creditor may have the right to refuse the paper money; but if he does refuse, he runs the risk of losing the favor of the Government. So he has the right to refuse a bank note, and if he does, he incurs the risk of losing the favor of those who issue it.

Mr. LETCHER. When the gentleman talks about bank paper in the States not being a legal tender, he knows that the Legislatures of the States have made it a virtual tender, by declaring that it shall be received in payment of State dues, and paid out accordingly. There is not a State in this Union, that has a bank system ingrafted upon it, that does not receive these identical bank notes, created under these State laws, in payment of taxes, save the States of Arkansas and Mississippi, which have no banks.

Now, sir, if this is a convertible currency, how does it happen, when the Congresses which I have specified undertook to issue those notes from 1837 to 1847, a period of ten years, to the amount of $80,732,000, they never became a part of the currency of the country? Does he believe, at that time, that these notes went into the country as a circulating medium, and passed from hand to hand?

Then, sir, so far as the gentlemen on the other side are concerned, their past practice, and the practice of the past party friends with whom they are connected, and the Administrations they have sustained, conclude them from this objection. My own belief is, that if it were a bank, we should hear a very different note from that sung on this occasion. The very fact of its being a bank would recommend it to their consideration, while it would array against it those upon this side. It is the very fact that it is not a bank; that it does not possess the features of a bank; that it does not issue the currency of a bank, that makes it objectionable to them.

But I was glad to hear the gentleman say that so far as the Secretary of the Treasury was concerned in regard to this stock matter, he believes he has acted properly, and in accordance with the requirements of the law. That was not his complaint; but his complaint was against those who passed the law under which he acted. I was astonished to hear the Secretary of the Treasury arraigned here upon that ground. At the time when ruin seemed inevitable to all from the pressure of the crisis, the Secretary, with the noble spirit that became him, undertook, so far as lay within his power, to relieve the distresses of the country by an act which was within the range of his constitutional authority—by the payment of these stocks. Then it was that the whole country, from the North to the South, rang with his praises; and the press upon all sides, even the party press, proclaimed that he had done a great duty, and an act of kindness to the country; and even just now, upon the 18th of this present month, the National Intelligencer, the organ of the Whig party in this city, came out in praise of his efforts. Why is it, then, that he is arraigned here now? Is party feeling so strong, is party prejudice so overwhelming, that what was proper and right two months ago is not proper and right now? No, sir; if it was right then, it is right now; and I am glad to hear the gentleman from Massachusetts come out and accord to the Secretary the meed of praise for what he has done.

Mr. Chairman, I believe I have concluded what I have to say upon this subject. There were other thoughts that I intended to have presented to the House; but in this running discussion between the gentleman from Massachusetts and myself, my order of discussion has been somewhat deranged; and I now yield the floor.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I have, Mr. Chairman, several objections to this bill, which I propose to present to the committee; but, lest I should forget it, as I have taken no notes of what the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] has said, I want to allude, in the first place, to his remarks in regard to the Secretary of the Treasury deserving the praise of the country for stepping in so benevolently to relieve the distresses of the land. I suppose, sir, that people must have been sorely distressed when they had to be induced to sell their Government obligations at a premium of twenty per centum! If they were in distress, why were they not willing to bring in their notes and receive their par value for them? That is the question; and I would like the gentleman to answer it. The Secretary of the Treasury had to present an inducement of from sixteen to twenty per cent. premium to get the notes in to relieve the distresses of these men, and, therefore, he is to be made President for his benevolence.

I object, Mr. Chairman, in the first place, to the movements in regard to this bill, that it is pressed with such hot and indecent haste. An attempt has been made three or four times, if I remember rightly, by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to screw us up to a vote upon it under the previous question, without scrutiny and without analyzing and sifting this measure—the most important measure, probably, that will come before the House during the present session.

A MEMBER. Except Kansas.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Yes; of course. I always except the "peculiar institution" and its expansion. That is the one paramount thing.

Now, sir, it looks a little suspicious that the friends of this bill should be so urgent to bring it to a vote under the party drill, with which I have no doubt they will secure its final passage. They cannot let us discuss it. Will not they let us have time to study and understand and present the subject? I am glad that there is a little searoom to-day.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LOVEJOY. Yes, sir.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Has the Secretary of the Treasury paid out a single dollar at a premium, except in accordance with the law passed by Congress?

Mr. LOVEJOY. I have no doubt that the action of the Secretary was legal. I did not deny that, Mr. Chairman. I simply met the eulogistic assertion of the gentleman from Virginia, that it was a beneficent movement towards those who were in distress. I did not deny that it was in accordance with law.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I understand the gentleman to say, then, that all the Secretary has done in this matter, has clearly been in obedience to law.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I do not remember the particular terms of the law. I was not here when it was passed. But I judge from hearing it read, that his action was not contrary to law. The matter was left optional with him, and, as I understand, the Presidency dazzled him a little, and he said to himself "Now, I will bless the country;" and he blessed it. I would like to be blessed in that way too.

My first objection, Mr. Chairman, to this bill is, that it is a deceptive bill. I do not say that it is fraudulent, in the legal sense of the term, but I do say that it is a deceptive bill. It proposes to do a certain thing, under concealment and disguise. It professes to be one thing, when it is really another thing. It will be called a loan, but in reality it is converting the Government into a great shipplaster machine, to flood the country with an irredeemable currency, which has, as I supposed, always been as the broth of abominable things to the Democratic party, and which is so to me now.

The gentleman from Virginia seemed surprised that there were any members on this side of the House in favor of a hard currency and against banks. I will tell him how it has happened. I presume he has read the Metamorphoses of Ovid, and is familiar with them, and he will remember there a great many transmogrifications and changes and transmutations. Now, I will tell him how this has happened. The real, genuine soul of Democracy has left the party that bears the name, and has come to animate the Republican party. It has left a soulless carcass in the one place, and a youthful giant, animated with the spirit of Jeffersonian Democracy, in the other.

I was saying, sir, that this measure is a deceptive measure. It proposes to convert the Government into a great banking concern. And, sir, I venture to say that the engravings for these notes are already made. I venture to say that the head of the venerable President is at one end of the notes, and that the Secretary of the Treasury will ornament and beautify the other end; and as a motto, there will be traced on it in legible characters, "Thanks to the sub-Treasury, the Government has not failed; we have not become bankrupt; we pay specie."

Sir, if this Government has become bankrupt, contrary to the declaration of the President, then I say let us stand right up before the nation and the world and own it; let us say we have failed; and then if you want a loan to the extent of your necessities, I will vote a loan; though while I have my senses I never will vote for this bill. If you want a loan, I will vote you a loan. Just let the Secretary of the Treasury, if he needs a loan, ask for a loan. Do the honest, plain, frank, above-board thing; say the Government has failed, and we must borrow money, and go into New York and pledge the faith of the Government. If that will not do, mortgage the Capitol, and the other public buildings; and if that does not bring the coin, pledge the immaculate and inviolate faith of the Democratic party, and the gold will begin to move towards you. [Laughter.] That would be the honest thing, sir. And what will be the result? The result will be that you can borrow this money, whether it be five, ten, fifteen, or twenty million dollars that you need. You can obtain it in New York. It is lying there unused in the vaults. The credit of the nation will bring it out. Go and advertise for it; and you will get it. If you can get it for one per cent., do not give six per cent. to save the country and bless the poor people in distress. If it requires two per cent., give two, and so on up to six per cent. Make the best bargain you can, and agree to pay at a certain date, and then take that money and put it into circulation through the country. That is Democracy—genuine Democracy, I mean, which is Republicanism now—and I will vote for it.

I object again because I do not perceive, at present, the necessity for this loan. Why, even the friends of the measure say that they do not know that they will be obliged to issue the amount. It is a kind of contingency that they are contemplating. Gentlemen have said on this floor, and I want the House to take notice of it, that they did not know that there should be a single dollar of this loan needed. Well, then, how can we perceive the necessity of it, if its friends cannot? Why do they not come forward and make a frank statement here, and tell us why they want the money, and for what they want the money, and just how much they want, so that we can vote understandingly on the subject?

But suppose the money is actually necessary, which perhaps we must admit, is this the only mode of raising it? Go sell half of the custom-houses of the land, where the income does not meet the expenses. Go to Pensacola, and all along the coast, and do it. Go to the interior, where officers were appointed to receive railroad iron, away out on your inland rivers and lakes, so as to save the importers from paying the duty for a few months, till the iron was actually delivered to them. These officials swarm over the country. The railroads are now built, and the necessity for these offices has ceased; but the officers are there, and the salaries are there. Why not retrench? Mr. Cobb's report struck me as if it was enough to excite a smile upon a grave stone almost. Says he, "the Government ought to practice retrenchment. The Government ought to economize." Yes; I think so too.

Now, supposing the Government do retrench, do economize; suppose we call in nine tenths or ninety-nine hundredths of our foreign diplomatic corps. Are they doing anything now? Have they any business to negotiate? As the gentleman who represents this Government at Madrid is to be removed, that place, for one, can be left vacant. We will save something there. The probability is that our Minister and Envoy Extraordinary there, (and he was certainly a very extraordinary envoy,) will be recalled, for I suppose there is nothing to be done there, inasmuch as the depleted state of the Treasury will prevent the purchase of Cuba for the present. I do not know what our Minister to St. Petersburg has to do either. Rather than borrow, I think an individual ought to retrench. Rather than borrow, I think a Government ought to retrench. I do not know of any foreign nation where we require a minister now, but one, and that is Great Britain. Let us have consuls to look after the commercial interests of the country, and after the interests of our citizens who may be abroad; and let us cut off all these ministers plenipotentiary. We will save something in that way. I hope that my friend from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] is as radical on retrenchment as I am.

I say, therefore, I do not see the necessity of this loan. I am not convinced yet that the amount might not be saved by retrenchment. I understood the report of the Secretary of the Treasury to state that he had, on the 1st of July, $17,710,000, and that the collections for the quarter ending September 30, were over twenty millions; making in all $38,500,000. Now, if he collect $12,000,000 for the current quarter, which is his estimate, he will have had $50,000,000 to cover the expenses of six months. Is not that enough? The income of the present fiscal year, for six months, according to the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury himself, will amount to about fifty million of dollars—and this has actually come into the Treasury. Are we going to push the expenditures of the Government to $100,000,000? I should like to know that. That is a new way of retrenchment and economy.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The necessity for this measure arises from the fact that, instead of dutiable goods being withdrawn from the bonded warehouses and the duties paid, they are still kept in the warehouses. In consequence of consumption having ceased, the Secretary has called on Congress to give him the power to issue these Treasury notes in the contingency of a continuation of this state of things. Does the gentleman not know that although estimates may be correct, yet, in case goods are not withdrawn from the warehouses, the duties are not paid into the Treasury? And does he not know that there is danger of a deficiency in less than a month from this time?

Mr. LOVEJOY. I take the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, as to what has already accrued and come into the Treasury; and it amounts to $38,500,000 up to the 30th of last September, and now he wants to pile $20,000,000 more on that.

Another objection that I urge is to the amount proposed to be raised. I would like to call the attention of the House to this fact, that I have not heard any gentleman urge anything that squinted towards the necessity of this $20,000,000. They do not know that a dollar will be wanted. And yet they want to give the Secretary of the Treasury the privilege of drawing for $20,000,000, more than half enough to support the Government, economically administered, during the entire fiscal year. I object, therefore, to the amount. I want to propose an amendment to insert "six," in lieu of "twenty," in this first section. If I understood the Secretary aright, he proposes to issue $6,000,000 right off, on these plates that are already waiting to have the stamp, and then he proposes to borrow the rest if he can. I move to amend the first section of the bill, by striking out the word "twenty," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "six."

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment will take precedence of the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.]

Mr. LOVEJOY. I object to the bill in the fifth place, Mr. Chairman, because there is no mode provided to repay this loan. It seems to be a matter of common economy, that when a man runs in debt he shall have some idea of how he is to pay it, if he means to be honest. There is no provision here, and no allusion to any mode of repaying this indebtedness. How is it going to be done? The Secretary of the Treasury says that this state of things is temporary; that this revolution will pass away, and money will flow into the Treasury, so that he can repay the debt. He wants some seventy or eighty millions to carry on the Government. Add to that this $20,000,000, and you have $100,000,000. Does any sane man believe that $50,000,000 will come into the Treasury during the year? And how is the Government to be carried on at the expense of $80,000,000, and then this $20,000,000 additional to be paid? I should like to know that. There is no way of doing it. There is nothing more certain—and I venture to predict it—than that the Secretary of the Treasury will be here next winter asking a loan of $40,000,000 at the close of that year. And soon the Government will get used to it, and the people will get used to it, and by-and-by it will slide into a monster bank, compared with which, the United States Bank was a mere pigmy. The little finger of this movement will be thicker than the loins of the United States Bank, although I rejoice at the destruction of that institution.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask what are the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury worth? Not three months ago he was in the market, with a surplus in the Treasury, purchasing United States stocks at a premium of fifteen or twenty per cent. And what was his opinion then? That the affairs of the Treasury would go on prosperously and securely, as his own actions show in the readiness with which he was prepared to purchase the stocks of the Government at this high rate of premium. What, I say, then, are the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury worth, looking at his conjectures for the future by those in the past? I tell you that there will be nothing in the Treasury with which to redeem these $20,000,000 of Treasury notes, and to enable the Treasury to meet its current obligations, which you now propose to authorize it to incur. I propose to further amend by adding, at the end of the first section, the following:

And that there shall be a tax levied, in the mode prescribed in the Constitution, for the redemption of the loan herein provided for.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not in order at this time.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Then I merely read it as a part of my speech.

Mr. BISHOP. I merely wish to ask a single question. The gentleman states, as the ground for offering his amendment to strike out $20,000,000 and insert $6,000,000, that there is really no necessity for a loan—that the Government will have ample funds on hand to meet all its expenses. But now, in his second proposition, he says there will be no money in the Treasury with which to pay this loan, and he proposes to resort to direct taxation to meet the deficit. I should like to know how he will go to work to reconcile these conflicting statements.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I reckon about as easily as the gentleman from Connecticut and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] will reconcile their views in reference to these notes. One says they will be currency; the other, that they will be a funded debt, and not pass into the currency. I stated that there was no necessity of a loan if a proper system of retrenchment were pursued by the Government. But, sir, do you suppose I ever dreamed that the Democrats of the present Administration would practice retrenchment? No, sir. I said there was no need of a loan if proper retrenchment were carried out; but not that I thought there was any probability it would be done. But, mark you, it is my honest conviction, that so far from being able to pay this loan when it becomes due, we shall be asked for another loan before the close of the present year. And I might as well say, just here, that though I would be ready to relieve the Government, and to restore to its former prosperity the whole country, and myself in particular, still I do not believe that any system of partial relief—any measure of empiricism, will do it. We shall go to the bottom, and we may as well sink and sink until we reach the bottom, as to grasp and swim to try to save ourselves before we touch the rock.

Sir, what is paper currency—irredeemable paper currency? It is a falsehood. When a bank-bill goes abroad in the country and says, "I am twenty dollars, or I am fifty dollars; I represent so much specie," it is a falsehood upon its face. It does not represent what it purports to represent. It often represents nothing. And when we put forth paper currency or Treasury notes to the world, purporting to represent so much specie in the Treasury, or other places of deposit, when the specie is not there, it is deceptive. It is like the Credit Mobilier of France. It represents not specie, but the credit of the country. And, if the present Administration follows in the footsteps of the last Administration for the next four years, I do not think the credit of the country will be worth much. Sir, all these attempts to relieve these commercial disasters, or to prevent them, by new issues of irredeemable paper, are like the policy of the man in Scripture, who built his house upon the sand; and when the rains descended and the floods came, and the winds blew and beat upon that house, it fell. I tell you that all the cobweb attempts to keep off the storm will be unavailing. Your bark may sit calm and beautiful upon the lake while its waters remain unruffled, but when the storm comes it will be capsized and will sink. And so, when you undertake to build up national prosperity, by means of a paper currency, which does not represent dollar for dollar, and is not convertible into specie, it will not stand. But, sir, when you build it upon hard money, upon a metallic currency, you have built your house upon a rock, and it will stand the test of all the storms that may beat upon it. Sir, I repeat that this system of putting in circulation mere promises to pay instead of the money itself, is always unsafe and unsatisfactory. This kind of a currency is always found wanting when we need the cash.

But I go further. I cannot vote for this bill because I do not know what is to be done with the money. I do not know where it is to go, or for what it is to be paid out. I do not know what you are going to do with it, Mr. Secretary Cobb. Are you going to pay your four regiments which you propose to raise as a matter of retrenchment? Are you going to pay for your ten war steamers which you propose to have built as a measure of economy?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I will respond to the gentleman with a great deal of pleasure. We do not propose to pay any of this money except in pursuance of existing law, and in pursuance of appropriations made by Congress. If the Secretary of the Treasury wishes to appropriate any money in the way the gentleman mentions, he will first have to get Congress to legislate upon the subject. The Executive Departments of Government are only called upon to pay your debts, and not theirs. They can only pay debts created by Congress. They have no legislative power in this Government. Congress contracts the debts, and the Executive, in accordance with his oath of office, must execute the laws with fidelity. The Secretary of the Treasury, therefore, only asks you to give him money to pay your debts, and not to pay one dollar that you have not ordered him to pay. I say to the gentleman, therefore, that the President asks you to give him money to pay your debts with, not one dollar of which will be paid except in accordance with the existing laws of this Government.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I do not wish to be understood as intimating that any appropriation will be made contrary to law. I am not driving at that. I do not speak of the Secretary of the Treasury as an individual; but in his official capacity. He asks this House to vote him the money, and he, and his friends in this House, vote to spend it as they please, and then they come back and taunt us with having voted for all these objects. Sir, I want to know what the money is voted for.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I thought I had sufficiently explained it. The requisition is for the authority to use $20,000,000, if necessary, to pay the debts of this Government, in accordance with existing law. Not a dollar will be paid out by the Secretary, except in accordance with the appropriation bills of the last Congress.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I do not suppose he will. I was asking, Mr. Chairman, why this money was needed, and whether it is to be employed in sustaining those four regiments which are proposed in the President's message, or, more properly, in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury? Is there not a recommendation that ten war steamers be built; and that, too, at the same time that they are asking authority to issue $20,000,000 of Treasury notes. Now, I want to know if these $20,000,000 are going to sustain those four regiments? I should like to know whether it is necessary to have these four regiments raised, in order to have captains, ensigns, corporals, and sergeants enough to give them strength enough to carry through the Lecompton constitution without submission to the people, and whether we are to pay them with this money? That is what I desire to know. I have no doubt they want money; but I should like to know how much of it is going to be used, as has been the case heretofore, in sustaining usurpation in Kansas. How much is to be used to force, at the point of the bayonet, upon the people of Kansas a government for which every person in the United States knows they never voted and never will, and that, too, right in the face of the declaration that "government derives all its just powers from the consent of the governed." Let my right arm wither first, and my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, before I will vote a cent to uphold the infamy which the past and present Administrations have attempted, and are now attempting, to impose upon an unwilling people. I have the right to inquire, and I want to know, whether that policy is still to be pursued; and whether the United States troops are to be employed to force upon a people institutions they do not want? I know tyrants always want money. Philip II. wanted money. It was the urgency of his reign to want money. He wanted to send the troops of Spain, under the Duke of Alva, to the Netherlands, to enforce the inquisition upon the people of the Lower Countries. President Buchanan wants money, I believe, to force the Lecompton constitution upon the people of Kansas.

Mr. LETCHER. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the vote is being taken in Kansas upon the Lecompton constitution to-day, so that the President cannot want money for that purpose.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I knew that the party in power can play such "fantastic tricks" as make Heaven blush, and that other place smile with joy. [Laughter.] I say they want money always; and that they are always borrowing; and I say I know no parallel to the course of this Administration; I know nothing so much like it as the reign of Philip II.

I object, finally, to this bill, because it is unconstitutional. Now, it is said to be out of taste, and to be unpatriotic, to say anything about conscience here. I do not know but it is unpatriotic to say anything about the Constitution; but I hope not, because we have sworn to support the Constitution. I want the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, or any other friend of this bill, to point me to that clause of the Constitution which authorizes the issue of Treasury notes. There is the power to borrow money upon the credit of the United States; it is true; but what is the use of whipping the Devil around the stump? Why not come out frankly like men, and say they want to borrow money for the purposes of the Government, and not ask for authority to issue Treasury notes.

The truth is, there is no constitutional power to issue Treasury notes. I know that it will be brought up as a plea—the precedents; that we did it in 1837, in 1842, and in 1847; and now cannot we do it in 1857? In the language of Young, with a slight variation,

"Once more the fatal precedent will peal."

We have done it three times, and why not do it a fourth? Every repetition of an unconstitutional act endangers the country by making a subsequent violation more easy, and soon you will find the good national ship unmoored, and floating away, in a very ocean of precedents, with the Constitution almost submerged, and hardly able to keep above the angry billows. And here, from my place, and upon my responsibility as a member of this House, I want especially to warn those who live in the country—for

"God made the country, and man made the town," and I like man's workmanship the best—I want to warn the mechanics and laborers, and the industrial classes of the country, that this Administration, which I said was but an elongation of the preceding one, is endeavoring to convert this Government, in the name of Democracy, to a despotism, and the Treasury Department, under the guise of Treasury notes, into one grand banking system.

The President has passed under the power of the old Whigs of the country, and now he is attempting to slide in their principles; he dare not do it all at once; he dare not start up the ghost of the old prophet at once into full life; but he is creeping on, and by-and-by the Democracy will get used to it, and will swear that it was always Democracy, and that they were always for banks. Sir, I plant myself on the Constitution and call the country back to it. You, gentlemen, opposite, are strict constructionists—are you not? Will you point to the place where the Constitution says that Congress shall have power to issue $20,000,000—more or less—of Treasury notes? You cannot find it. It is not there. It is an implied and dangerous power. It would bring you back to the old depreciated Continental currency. Governmental currency that is not convertible always depreciates. I therefore call upon the people and upon the House to come back to the Constitution, to know no money that the Constitution does not know, and it knows none but gold and silver; God intended that for money, and so long as you attempt to thwart His arrangement, you will experience the inevitable retribution that sooner or later must follow.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, a very extensive field of debate is legitimately thrown open by the proposition now under consideration. The character of the expenditures of the general Government, the tariff, the currency, propositions for reform—are all intimately interwoven with this proposition to replenish an empty Treasury. I think my friend from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] is not very just in the face of the facts, and remembering, as he must remember, the circumstances under which the appropriation bills of last year were acted on, in charging the responsibility of extravagant expenditures upon this side of the House.

Now, sir, I am not the accredited organ upon this floor, of the Republican party; and if the sentiments which I have heard avowed here by leading members of that party, in favor of an exclusively metallic currency, are to be regarded as a part of its platform, I never shall be its organ, here or elsewhere, until I shall have changed the well-settled convictions of my own judgment.

What are the facts in regard to the appropriations made last year? I chance to know something in regard to them; and having reported most of them, voted for them, fought for them, and defended them on this floor, I feel that the responsibility of meeting the charge of the gentleman from Virginia, devolves upon me. The gentleman attempts to screen the last Administration from the responsibility of the public expenditures. I charge upon them all the responsibility of the large appropriations which were made. My friend from Virginia knows full well that there never was a single item of appropriation passed by the Committee of Ways and Means, which was not predicated upon estimates recommended by the Executive Departments, and that many of their demands were rejected. If he knows of a solitary item that was put into either of the appropriation bills which were passed by that committee and this House and went into the law, that was not recommended by the Executive, I call upon him to point it out. [A pause.] Then if he does not, I must take judgment against him by default. I demand that he either take back the charge or point out to us the item in either of the bills that was not predicated upon Executive recommendation.

Mr. Chairman, I remember well how the appropriation bills were passed in the closing hours of the last Congress. At two o'clock in the morning of the 4th of March last, there came back from the Senate the bill of appropriations for certain civil expenses, commonly called the "omnibus bill," with eighty-five manuscript amendments, amounting to millions of dollars. It was then too late in the session to have them printed, or even to have them read in the House, and the whole matter went speedily to a committee of conference, of which I had the honor of being chairman on the part of this House. That committee was in session during the balance of the night. I struggled in that committee for a reduction of the expenditures, and yielded only to some of the larger amounts—for instance, the appropriation of $1,000,000 for the water-works of this city—because every other legitimate mode which had been resorted to by the House to take the surplus of $22,000,000 out of the Treasury, which Mr. Guthrie had informed us was not needed there, had failed in the Senate. Believing that the appropriation was proper in itself, and knowing that the Treasury was overflowing, and that the wants of commerce demanded that the vaults should be unlocked, and that the coin should go out into circulation, I supported the bill, as agreed on in conference, and the House carried it with extraordinary unanimity. How was that—the most objectionable of all the appropriation bills—carried? It was carried by the almost unanimous voice of the House. I think my colleague, [Mr. STANTON,] or the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] demanded the yeas and nays on the adoption of the report of the committee of conference; and had that demand been sustained, the bill would have been defeated, for there would not have been time for it to become a law before the hour fixed by the Constitution for adjournment. But not more than seven members rose on that morning to sustain the demand for the yeas and nays; and I think the gentleman from Virginia was not one of the seven. I hold, therefore, that he and his party sustained that bill.

Mr. Chairman, I did not rise for the purpose of inquiring into the details of the reasons that have forced the Executive to call on Congress for a loan, or for the power to issue Treasury notes. When the house is on fire, the true way is to extinguish the blaze and afterwards inquire into the cause of it. We know, sir, that there is a pressing necessity; and the only question is as to the character of the means that should be furnished the Administration in the present state of affairs, to afford relief. I shall not follow gentlemen through this discussion as to the relative merits of a loan, and of the issuance of Treasury notes, not stopping to inquire whether the distinctions they draw are without a difference. I intend to sustain a measure with such modifications and guards as may be thrown around it, whether it be in the form of a loan or in the form of Treasury notes, on the principle that it is our solemn duty to sustain our national credit.

But, sir, while we are creating in the form of notes or bonds, a debt of $20,000,000, it strikes me as the part of wisdom, to provide the means by which we are to make payment when they become due. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOVEJOY] has suggested an amendment, providing that the amount should be raised by direct taxation on the people. That gentleman, it seems to me, is appropriating the thunder of my friend from South Carolina, [Mr. BOYCE,] and my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] At the last session of Congress, while the tariff laws were being considered, my friend from South Carolina announced his design to propose a bill to sell all the custom-houses belonging to the General Government, and dismiss the thousands and tens of thousands of employes of the Government connected with them, by way of reducing the expenditures, and of resorting to free trade and direct taxation. The gentleman from Mississippi intimated a purpose of a similar character.

I think both of them gave me a promise that they would introduce such a proposition; and I have been waiting patiently ever since that time, and am waiting still, for the action of those gentlemen to ascertain when it is that they intend to force their party up to the responsibility of that issue.

Mr. QUITMAN. I will briefly answer the question by saying, that I will be ready to aid the friends of direct taxation in presenting the subject so soon as that gentleman and his friends on the other side of the House shall cease to occupy the whole time of Congress in discussing southern affairs. I am ready at all times to aid in bringing back the country to a system of direct taxation, as the best, if not only means of promoting that economy which will save us from the corrupting influence of a Treasury sometimes bursting with plethora, and at other times entirely exhausted.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I wish to say to the gentleman from Mississippi, that he knows I tendered him all the facilities in my power to bring about a test on that subject before the House, during the last Congress; yet his project has never been reported.

Mr. BOYCE. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, I would say that the subject to which he refers is one very near to my heart; that we have it under consideration, and intend to press it at a proper time; and we hope to continue to press it, and trust that the day will come when we will have the great blessing of free trade in this country; the great privilege of selling where you can sell dearest, and of buying where you can buy cheapest; in order to accomplish which, we must have no duties on imports, and must have direct taxation exclusively.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentlemen both promise well, and I hope will soon perform, in order that we may split parties, and secure either stable protection or free trade and direct taxation upon the people in proportion to their representation in the Federal Congress.

In reference to this question of raising the means to defray the expenses of the Government, I occupy the position occupied by the fathers of old, and which, I believe, the present Chief Executive has not yet repudiated, of raising the necessary means of defraying the economical expenditures of the Government by discriminating duties on imports, discriminating for protection to our own industry; but, if this system cannot prevail, that of the gentlemen from South Carolina and Mississippi will be my next choice.

Mr. Chairman, with a view of progressing toward the point I desire to reach, I propose the following amendment to the amendment of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS:]

And provided further, That from and after the 1st day of July next, a duty of thirty per centum ad valorem shall be imposed, in lieu of those now imposed, upon the following goods, wares, and merchandise, imported from abroad into the United States, to wit: Carpets, carpeting, hearth rugs, bedslides, and other portions of carpeting, being either Aubusson, Brussels, ingrain, Saxony, Turkey, Venetian, Wilton, or any other similar fabric; cutlery of all kinds; delaines; iron in bars, blooms, bolts, loops, pigs, rods, slabs, or other form, not otherwise provided for; castings of iron, old or scrap iron, and vessels of cast iron; manufactures of cotton, linen, silk, wool, or worsted, if embroidered or tamboURED in the loom or otherwise, by machinery or with the needle or other process; manufactures, articles, vessels, and wares not otherwise provided for, of brass, copper, gold, iron, lead, pewter, platinum, silver, tin, or other metal, or of which either of those metals, or any other metal, shall be a component material of chief value; manufactures of wool, or of which wool shall be the component material, not otherwise provided for; and that a duty of twenty-four per centum ad valorem shall be imposed in lieu of those now imposed upon the following goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States, to wit: baizes, bookings, flannels, and floor cloths, of whatever material composed, not otherwise provided for; manufactures composed wholly of cotton, not otherwise provided for; manufactures of silk, or of which silk shall be a component material, not otherwise provided for; manufactures of worsted, or of which worsted shall be a component material, not otherwise provided for.

My purpose in offering this amendment for the consideration of the House, is to provide, first, for raising the revenue necessary for meeting the Treasury notes or bond which may be issued, and secondly, to provide the necessary protection for the industrial interests of the country. It will be remembered that during the last session of Congress, this House passed a bill extending the free list alone, and leaving all the other articles of the manufacturer to enjoy the protection afforded them by the Democratic tariff of 1846.

The Senate, with a view of still further reducing the revenue, amended the bill by scaling down the schedules twenty per cent. This amendment proposes to bring the articles named back to the position which they occupied in the bill, as it originally passed the House, during the last session.

The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] it seems to me, has been blowing hot and cold upon this subject of the tariff. In one breath he denounces the principle of protection, and in another he advocates it. He is in favor of both free trade and protection. At the last session he supported the tariff bill which was passed, knowing and acknowledging that it contained the principle of protection, and that it discriminated for that purpose; and he has but one step more to take in the same direction in supporting this amendment, which, in my judgment, will be necessary to meet the demands upon the Treasury, which he now proposes to make when these notes shall become due. If he takes that step he will be sustained by his party and by the President of the United States. One of the most material parts of the amendment is that which gives protection to the iron interests of Pennsylvania. I have no doubt that the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] and his Democratic colleagues from Pennsylvania will all give this amendment their support. I think he was in favor of the bill of the last session as it passed the House, and this amendment restores the iron and coal interest to the position which it then occupied.

Mr. Chairman, I regard it as of the utmost consequence that this loan should be furnished, and the Government relieved from its embarrassment and threatened bankruptcy. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOVEJOY] asks what is to be done with the money, and desires to know whether it is to be used to construct war steamers. I think not. The President has recommended to the serious attention of Congress one of the greatest works which is to characterize the present age. He has proposed the construction of a railroad to the Pacific ocean. Of course the means must be provided to take the preliminary steps for that undertaking. He has made this proposition, and in good faith the gentleman from Virginia will certainly second his efforts in that behalf. The gentleman from Virginia has been proclaiming that we, on this side of the House, were rapidly going over to the Democratic platform. I claim, upon the other hand, that the gentleman's President, and the gentleman himself, have come upon our platform, and are transferring the whole Democratic party to it. The gentleman does not assert that the President favors free trade. No! no! he is a protectionist. His votes in both branches of Congress show that he is a protectionist.

Mr. Buchanan voted for the tariff of 1828; which was the highest protective tariff known in the history of the Government, and he has never repudiated the principle. In 1832 I first commenced my career in political life, under the banner of the gallant Harry of the West, upon which was inscribed the great American systems of "protection to American industry," "internal improvements of a national character by the national Government," and a sound national currency, at all times convertible into gold and silver at every point in the nation. I followed that banner ardently through the gallant struggles during the lifetime of that great man and his compatriots; and in this hour of commercial distress, I venture again to unfurl it to the breeze. The President of the United States has boldly avowed himself its advocate, in defiance of all the platforms which politicians have erected for him to stand upon. I am quite rejoiced to learn that my friend from Virginia has indorsed his position on these grave questions. Those abstractions which formerly crossed his mind have disappeared as the mists before the wind. He now sees the true path and I trust will pursue it with his well known energy. He indorses the message, and of course stands up and advocates boldly that great measure which is to unite the people of the Atlantic States with the people of the far off Pacific coast. Indeed, the gentleman is a little ahead of the President of the United States; for a year or two ago, I remember well, the gentleman was on the committee of conference, and reported and voted in favor of the appropriation of a large sum of money to run the line to survey the track for that great work across the Rocky Mountains and over the plains to the Pacific. He found no difficulty in the constitutional power to do that; and if he found power to make an appropriation to run lines and mark them by monuments, he will readily find in the same clause the power which his President claims to appropriate the means of prosecuting and completing the work he so bravely commenced. I welcome the gentleman and his President to the fold of the advocates of protection and internal improvements.

In regard to a national currency, the President and the gentleman from Virginia are following in the footsteps of the illustrious hero of the Hermitage, who said in one of his messages:

"That a Bank of the United States, competent to all the duties which may be required by the Government, might be so organized as not to infringe on our delegated powers or the reserved rights of the States, I do not entertain a doubt. Had the Executive been called upon to furnish the project of such an institution, the duty would have been cheerfully performed."

So said Jackson; and in so saying, he but followed in "the footsteps of his illustrious predecessors"—of Washington, who signed the first bill; of Madison, who approved the second. Buchanan, on former occasions, advocated the measure, and Mr. Dallas, his Minister to England, prepared the United States Bank bill of 1832, which was voted for by every Democratic member in this House from the State of Pennsylvania. And now, although Mr. Buchanan has not recommended a national bank, or an exchequer, or fiscal agent, or what not, for—

"What's in a name? that which we call a rose,

By any other name would smell as sweet—"

he has, nevertheless, taken a step in the direction which gives assurance that he is not unfavorable to the creation of a paper currency of uniform value throughout the country. Upon this point, as upon the others, he may return to his first principles.

While I protest that I do not indorse the principle of issuing these promises to pay by the Government for currency purposes, I am willing to furnish means to sustain the public faith. I shall vote for the bill if properly guarded, hoping and believing, that it may be followed by some permanent measure which will provide a paper circulating medium, which will at all times command gold or silver on presentation, whether in California or Massachusetts, in Michigan or in London. I shall vote for the bill, cherishing the hope that Buchanan will perhaps come back to his first love in regard to a national currency. The gentleman from Virginia will no doubt walk in his footsteps, and follow his lights in all these things, and then he and I, and all of us, will be found, I trust, united upon the great measure advocated by the distinguished statesmen of 1816 and of 1832. It will be a joyous time then, sir, when we are all thus united, a political millennium, when that gentleman and I and all of us of contending parties, including what is left of the American party—for there is a considerable sprinkling of that party here yet—shall all be a unit, standing on a common platform.

Mr. LETCHER. I should suppose from what I heard on the other side this morning, that my friend from Ohio was in a small minority, particularly as to a Bank of the United States; for I was interrupted by a sort of simultaneous rising up upon that side of the House in opposition to a United States Bank; and what I supposed was dead and gone, my friend from Ohio is trying to resurrect and get upon its legs again.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am giving Mr. Buchanan the credit of resuscitation.

Mr. LETCHER. It seems to me a strange way to support a man, by marching under the flag of his opponent. While his language is for him, his hand is against him.

My friend called upon me to know whether I was in favor of a Pacific railroad. I do not mean to discuss that now. Perhaps I shall have an opportunity to do so hereafter. But I tell him now that I am opposed to it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then your hands are against the President, and I am defending him against your assaults!

Mr. LETCHER. Well, sir, I am going against that measure. My friend from Ohio calls upon me to say in what solitary instance an item of appropriation was passed by the last Congress which was not recommended by the President of the United States.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Or by the Departments.

Mr. LETCHER. I have sent after the documents, and while they are coming, I will give him, to begin with, the appropriation of $10,000 to begin the Kansas investigation, and the incidental expenses growing out of it. Neither the President nor any member of his Cabinet recommended anything of that sort.

Another fact the gentleman will recollect: When the President sent in his veto upon the river and harbor bill, there was no gentleman in the House more absolutely shocked at the enormity of such an outrage upon the part of the President in seeking to control the legislation of the country, than the gentleman himself. In fact, I never saw the gentleman, usually so cool, so much excited. He said there was a revolution going on; and when I suggested that it was "bloodless as yet," I thought he was about to make it a personal matter with me.

Again, there was the bill appropriating $300,000 for a ship canal at the Southwest Pass. When the veto came in it was overruled by this House, and I am inclined to think that my friend, then chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, voted for overruling it, too.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am against vetoes, and on the occasion referred to a Democratic Senate and House was with me.

Mr. LETCHER. Then there was an appropriation for deepening the St. Clair flats in the State of Michigan, which the President vetoed.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes; and about the same time he approved another bill of a similar character for the improvement of a creek down South, called the "Cape Fear."

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman cannot change the issue with me now. He asked me to point to an appropriation of last Congress which was not recommended by the Administration, and said that I, as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, could not meet the issue successfully. Now, when I meet the issue, what follows? The gentleman turns round and says the President did sign some things. Did not the gentleman vote for those river and harbor bills?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Nearly all of them, I believe.

Mr. LETCHER. The amount of those bills thus vetoed, as handed to me by my friend from Mississippi, is $785,000.

Mr. CAMPBELL. My friend is mistaken in saying that the river and harbor improvement was not recommended by the Department.

Mr. LETCHER. Who recommended it?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The Secretary of War, I believe, sent in the estimates.

Mr. LETCHER. I should like to see the recommendation. According to my recollection, neither of the improvements was recommended by the Cabinet. There may have been inquiries addressed to the Department by individual members as to the cost of particular improvements, and the Department may have furnished the estimates upon application. But as to recommendations, give us the recommendations, and let us see where they ask the Congress of the United States to pass such a bill, and apply the money of the Government in that way.

I might go on and instance other acts passed over the President's veto, and each of those bills, though bearing the certificates of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House, to give them binding force, is destitute of that significant word "approved."

Mr. CAMPBELL. I say to the gentleman again, that every single appropriation that was reported by the Committee of Ways and Means was predicated upon the recommendation of the Executive Departments. With regard to the internal improvement bills, I am not so thoroughly hosted, for the gentleman knows full well that we had enough in our own committee room to keep us busy; but I do know what I witnessed with my own eyes. I know that these river and harbor bills were voted for by the gentleman's own party, in this House.

Mr. LETCHER. Some of them, to be sure, were voted for by gentlemen on this side of the House. I do not pretend to gainsay that. And I take pleasure in saying here now, in regard to the action of the Ways and Means Committee in the last Congress, that there was harmony in that committee, and that when our bills were reported to the House, they conformed to the estimates; but they were shingled over afterwards by amendments put on here, by one and by another, that we could not control. Some were put on here, but a vast majority were put on in the Senate.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman tell me which party had the power there?

Mr. LETCHER. Yes, sir; the Democrats had the power there.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It had a majority of Democrats of two to one, and carried the bills by a two-thirds vote, over the vetoes. There is another fact in connection with those internal improvement bills, which my friend from Virginia is well advised of, and that is, that every single one of them, I think, without exception, originated in the Senate, where his party had a large majority. And with what kind of consistency, I ask, can the gentleman now rise upon this floor, and charge that we, on this side, are exclusively responsible for the character of the appropriations made last Congress? True, Mr. Chairman, we were disposed to be liberal to the Administration. I speak for myself. Occupying the important position of head of the Ways and Means Committee, I was resolved to make liberal appropriations to the Administration. They were carried through this House, and I have no regrets on the subject. And, notwithstanding these river and harbor bills were vetoed, much to the satisfaction of the gentleman, I suppose, I feel quite inclined to congratulate the country that a new era is about to dawn upon us in regard to that great question. The President has taken his stand in recommending this great work of improvement for the Pacific coast, and I doubt not, that if other works of a national character shall be provided for by Congress—such as the improvement of our sea-board and lake harbors, and the great natural thoroughfares of the country,—and the empty Treasury is replenished, it will be the pleasure of the President to approve them.

Mr. Chairman, I did not rise for the purpose of making a systematic or an elaborate speech upon this great question of finance. It is a subject, sir, which has puzzled the brightest intellects and the greatest statesmen of our country, and the idea that any one of us could grasp it and discuss it in all its bearings, in a single hour, seems to me preposterous. I merely rose with a view of indicating what were my general sentiments in regard to all the points involved, and to express the hope that, in view of the condition of the Treasury, the amendment which I intend to propose, calculated to replenish it and to strengthen the arms of American industry, may, at the proper time, be adopted by the House. And I invoke the aid—the especial aid—of the honorable chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and of the delegation from that great and noble State from which the President hails, which has always delighted to honor him, whose immediate constituency have a deep and lasting interest in this question of protection to labor.

Mr. GROW. I do not propose to trespass long upon the patience of this committee. The hour is late; but, if it is the wish of the committee, I will go on now; if not, I will yield for a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. READY. With the permission of the gentleman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman [Mr. PHELPS] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill (No. 4) to authorize the issue of Treasury notes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. There is a Senate bill upon the Speaker's table to authorize the issue of Treasury notes. I ask that it may be taken up and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

There being no objection, Senate bill (No. 13) to authorize the issue of Treasury notes, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

CLOSE OF DEBATE ON TREASURY NOTE BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am very anxious that we should have speedy action on the bill now pending in the Committee of the Whole, and yet I have no desire to stifle debate. I will now renew the motion which I made this morning, to close debate in one hour after the consideration of the bill shall be again resumed in committee.

Mr. BOYCE. I move to amend the motion so as to extend the time to two hours.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I accept the amendment; and demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I will ask the unanimous consent of the House, in order to save time.

Mr. SEWARD. I object to any debate. The gentleman himself demanded the previous question and it has been seconded.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the consent of the House to modify my motion so as to make the limit to debate apply to the Senate bill. I propose when we go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to-morrow, to move to take up the Senate bill.

Mr. SEWARD. I object to any debate. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means himself moved the previous question.

The main question was then ordered; and under its operation, the motion to close debate was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

LANDS TO ARKANSAS.

Mr. WARREN, by unanimous consent, previous notice having been given, introduced a bill granting lands in alternate sections to the State of Arkansas, to aid in the construction of the Mississippi, Ouachita, and Red river railroad; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I objected to the introduction of that bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair inquired whether there was any objection. The objection of the gentleman did not reach the ear of the Chair.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. The Speaker asked if there was any objection, and I said I objected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the objection, and he would have seen the gentleman if he had risen to object.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I did not rise.

The SPEAKER. The rule and practice is that when a member objects, he must rise in his place, so that there can be no misunderstanding about it.

THE DELEGATE FROM UTAH.

Mr. WARREN. I ask leave to introduce a resolution, the object of which is apparent on its face, and to which I think there will be no objection.

Mr. STANTON. I suppose that at least half the members of the House have propositions which they wish to offer by unanimous consent, and they cannot be accommodated except by adherence to the rule. I insist on the regular order.

Mr. WARREN. I am satisfied that if my friends across the way will hear the resolution read, they will make no objection to its introduction. It is a resolution that ought to have got in at the commencement of the Congress.

The resolution was read for information, as follows:

Whereas, it appears from the proclamation of Brigham Young, late Governor of the Territory of Utah, as also from the message of the President of the United States, that said Territory is in open rebellion against the Government of the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Territories be instructed to report on the facts, and to inquire into the propriety of excluding from a seat upon this floor the Delegate from said Territory.

Mr. BANKS objected.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. A resolution has been sent in here from the Senate, on the subject of an adjournment. I move that that resolution be taken up and considered.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I move a suspension of the rules.

The joint resolution was reported, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That when the two Houses adjourn on the 23d instant, they adjourn to meet on Monday, the 4th of January next.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. STANTON. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I withdraw the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I renew it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. As that resolution conflicts with the compensation law, I ask the yeas and nays. I want to see who it is that will vote for it.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KELSEY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question was taken on the motion to suspend the rules, for the purpose of considering the joint resolution of the Senate, and resulted—yeas 98, nays 89; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Andrews, Banks, Bennett, Bingham, Bishop, Blair, Boyce, Bryan, Buffinton, Campbell, Caskey, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clingman, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Comins, Cragin, Burton Craig, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dimmick, Dodd, Durfee, Edmundson, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Gillis, Gilman, Gilmer, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Huyler, Keitt, Kelly, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Leiter, McKibbin, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Miles, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Phillips, Quitman, Reilly, Ricard, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Scott, Searing, Seward, Singleton, William Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, William Stewart, Tappan, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Thompson, Underwood, Waldron, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Whitley, Wilson, Winslow, Wortendyke, and Augustus R. Wright—98.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Billingshurst, Bliss, Boeck, Branch, Brayton, Burns, Burroughs, Case, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, Cockrell, James Craig, Crawford, Curtis, Damrell, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dowdell, Elliott, English, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Gartrell, Goodwin, Granger, Greenwood, Gregg, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Houston, Howard, Hughes, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, Leach, Letcher, Lovejoy, Miller, Millson, Morrill, Niblack, Nichols, Pettit, Peyton, Phelps, Pike, Potter, Purviance, Ready, Reagan, Ruffin, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Stanton, Stephens, James A. Stewart, Talbot, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Warren, Watkins, John V. Wright, and Zollicoffer—89.

So, two thirds not voting in favor thereof, the rules were not suspended.

Mr. READY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at three o'clock and forty minutes, p. m.) the House adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 22, 1857.

Prayer by Rev. STEPHEN P. HILL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LAWS OF KANSAS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate copies of the laws of the Territory of Kansas passed at the second session of the General Legislative Assembly, begun and held at the city of Leecompton, on the second Monday of January, 1857; which, on motion by Mr. COLLAMER, were referred to the Committee on Territories.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented the petition of William B. Davis, praying that the Commissioner of the General Land Office may be required to make a statement showing the Territories acquired since the Revolution, and the number of square miles in each, for publication; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a resolution of the Academy of Natural Sciences, at Philadelphia, in favor of the publication of the report of the geological survey of the Territories of Oregon and Washington, made by Dr. John Evans; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of the division of that State into two judicial districts; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented the petition of Sarah Bronson, only child and heir of John Bronson, deceased, praying for compensation for property destroyed during the last war with Great Britain; which, with the papers on file relative to the case, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Alexander Miller, one of the heirs of Alexander Miller, deceased, praying for remuneration for property destroyed during the last war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GWIN presented the petition of A. W. McPherson, praying to be paid for fitting up and furnishing rooms for the United States district court, at San Francisco; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CAMERON presented the memorial of James Page, and others, citizens of Philadelphia, praying that the post office in that city may be located on the site of the present custom-house, and the custom-house transferred to the site selected for the post office; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. GREEN presented a memorial of the Legislature of Missouri, praying that the land on Wolf Island, in the Mississippi river, may be sold by the United States, to settle the question in dispute between that State and the State of Kentucky, as to the jurisdiction of that island; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, presented the memorial of W. S. Munday, J. Knox Walker, and others, members of the Tennessee Legislature, praying for protection to the overland mail route through Arizona; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HOUSTON presented a resolution of the Legislature of Texas, in favor of the raising and equipment of a regiment of Texas mounted volunteers, for the protection of the western frontier of that State; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DOUGLAS presented the memorial of James M. Wright, and other citizens of Illinois, praying that protection may be extended to the overland mail route to California through Arizona Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also presented the memorial of J. Grimes, C. A. Wright, and other citizens of Illinois, praying that protection may be extended to the overland mail route to California through the Territory of Arizona; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. POLK presented the petition of Horace E. Dimick, praying that an appropriation may be made to test his improvement of the rifled cannon, for throwing both solid shot and shells; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FOSTER. I present the petition of George A. Breast, lately employed in the service of the Government at the navy-yard in this city. The petitioner states that in the month of September, 1856, while employed in launching the steamer Water Witch from the marine railway, he was struck by the capstan bars as the vessel took a sudden start into the water, and both his legs were badly broken, in consequence of which he was confined to his bed for nearly a year, and is now crippled for life. The officers of the yard, who have written some letters on the subject and given some certificates, bear testimony to the very excellent character of the man. He has a large family. He has been made a cripple for life in the service of the Government, without any fault on his part. It seems to me a case which is entitled to favorable consideration, and I hope it will receive it. I move the reference of the petition, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. PEARCE, it was Ordered, That the petition of Susanna T. Lea, widow and executrix of James Magleman, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. JONES, it was Ordered, That the memorial of William Money, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. GWIN, it was Ordered, That the petition of Joseph Hill and sons, and the petition of W. M. Ryer, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey; it was Ordered, That the petition of Mary C. Hamilton, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey; it was Ordered, That the petition of J. Willcox Jenkins, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, it was Ordered, That the memorial of George N. Weston, Commissioner of the State of Maine appointed to present the claims of that State against the United States under the fourth article of the treaty of Washington, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. DURKEE, it was Ordered, That the petition of William Blake, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. SEBASTIAN, it was Ordered, That the petition of Johnson K. Rogers, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. BRODERICK, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Edward D. Reynolds, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. FOSTER, it was Ordered, That Huldah Butler have leave to withdraw her petition and papers.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to confine all future sales of the public lands to actual settlers, and in limited quantities.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CRITTENDEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 23) for the relief of Robert Dickson, of the Kentucky volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to bring in a bill (S. No. 24) to secure to actual settlers the alternate sections of the public lands reserved in the grants to States for railroads; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FITZPATRICK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to bring in a bill (S. No. 26) to provide for the examination and payment of certain claims of citizens of Georgia and Alabama, on account of losses sustained by depredations of the Creek Indians; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CLAY, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 27) to detach Selma, in the State of Alabama, from the collection district of New Orleans, and make it a port of delivery within the collection district of Mobile; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 25) to grant to every person who is the head of a family and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, on condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same, for the period therein specified; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Mr. President, before the bill is referred, with the indulgence of the Senate I beg leave to make a single remark, for the purpose merely of keeping the history of this great measure right. On the 27th of March, 1846, this bill was first introduced into the House of Representatives; and on the 12th of May, 1852, it passed that House by a majority of two thirds. The House of Representatives passed it six years two months and fifteen days after its first introduction. It then received the indorsement of the other House by a two-thirds vote. In 1853, the same bill, in substance, was introduced by the Hon. John L. Dawson, of the State of Pennsylvania, and it passed again by an overwhelming majority. Thus the bill has twice received the sanction of the popular branch of the Legislature. It was transmitted to this body, and here it failed on both occasions. I merely make these remarks for the purpose of keeping the history of this great measure right, and with the hope that it will meet its consummation by the sanction of this body in a much shorter period of time than it did in the House of Representatives. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred a memorial of Alexander J. Atocha, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 28) for his relief. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FOOT, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 1) for the relief of George P. Marsh, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

NEW POST ROUTE.

Mr. SEBASTIAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Gainesville, in Arkansas, to Greenville, in Missouri, and report by bill or otherwise.

CLAIM OF A. AND J. E. KENDALL.

Mr. HAMLIN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Court of Claims be requested to return to the Senate the papers in relation to the claim of Amos and John E. Kendall, referred to that court by an order of the Senate of the 10th of July, 1856.

HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS ON LAKE ERIE.

Mr. WADE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War communicate to the Senate what estimates, if any, have been made for the improvement of the following harbors on Lake Erie, respectively, to wit: Buffalo, Dunkirk, Erie, Conneaut, Ashtabula, Grand river, Cleveland, Black river, Vermillion, Sandusky bay, La Plaisance bay on river Raisin, and Maumee bay.

ENROLLED RESOLUTION SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. J. C. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 2) to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate the compensation of members of Congress," approved August 16, 1856; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President.

COMMITTEE ROOMS.

Mr. GWIN. I have been directed by the special committee on the Pacific railroad to offer the following resolution; and I ask for its consideration at this time:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate be authorized to assign a furnished room in the Capitol extension for the sessions of the select committee on the Pacific railroad.

I thought the President of the Senate had this power before. It was so understood yesterday by the select committee; but I have since ascertained that the authority is not possessed by him. I therefore ask that the resolution be acted on now.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. IVERSON. I offer an amendment, in the shape of an additional resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate be authorized to assign to each standing committee of the Senate a room in the Senate extension of the Capitol, as rooms in the same may become ready for occupation.

I understand it is not now in the competency of the Presiding Officer to assign these rooms in the extension of the Capitol. I want a general authority of this kind, because some of the rooms are ready for occupation, and I see no reason for allowing them to remain idle until all of them shall be ready for occupation. I make this motion especially with reference to the convenience of the Committee on Claims, of which I have the honor to be the chairman. They occupy a small room, which is exceedingly dark and smoky. The room assigned to them on the programme that I have seen passed from hand to hand among Senators, in the extension, is ready for occupation. It has been in the occupancy of one of the solicitors of the Court of Claims for the past eighteen months or two years. He is ready to surrender it at any moment, as there is another room which he can occupy; it is, therefore, ready for the Committee on Claims. I propose, as the rooms are got ready for occupation, if the committees desire it, that the President of the Senate may assign them on application.

Mr. GWIN. The Senator's proposition is an additional resolution to the one I offered. I accept it as an amendment.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to amend the amendment by providing:

That the Committee on Public Buildings inquire and report to the Senate a plan for assigning the rooms in the addition to the Capitol appropriated to the use of the Senate.

It seems to me that some plan should be adopted in relation to appropriating these rooms to the different committees. As to assigning one to one committee that may be more important than another, and thus obtaining an advantage over another committee in the selection of rooms, is far from anything like a plan, and very far from anything like justice or fairness. I desire that my proposition may be considered with a view to having some plan adopted for making an assignment, either by lot or selection, or in some way.

Mr. IVERSON. I will accept the Senator's amendment as a substitute for mine.

Mr. COLLAMER. Very well.

Mr. GWIN. The first resolution will stand, and then the proposition of the Senator from Vermont is to be added.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have no objection to the gentleman's resolution, but I want this addition put to it.

Mr. GWIN. Yes, sir; that is it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution with the proposed amendment.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate be authorized to assign a furnished room in the Capitol extension for the select committee on the Pacific railroad; and that the Committee on Public Buildings inquire and report to the Senate a plan for assigning the rooms in the addition to the Capitol appropriated to the use of the Senate.

Mr. GWIN. I accept the amendment.

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

REPORTING OF THE DEBATES.

On motion of Mr. SEWARD, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by him some time since:

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on Printing inquire and report whether any new provisions of law are necessary to secure a faithful performance on the part of Congress of the existing contracts which provide for accurate reports of the debates of the two Houses.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to modify the resolution by striking out the words "on the part of Congress."

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further petitions or reports, the next business in order is the resolutions submitted by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] in regard to the revision of the rates of duty imposed by the act of March 3, 1857.

Mr. HUNTER. I would suggest to the mover of these resolutions that, as I suppose he wishes to speak to them, and probably there may be a debate upon them, it would be better to postpone them until some day after the holidays.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Very well.

Mr. HUNTER. Will the Senator indicate some day after the holidays?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Has the proposition been passed by the Senate to adjourn to the 4th of January?

Mr. HUNTER. We passed such a proposition, and it is now before the House of Representatives. Will the Senator name the 6th of January?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I will agree to the 6th of January.

The further consideration of the resolutions was postponed until the 6th of January.

COMMITTEE CLERKS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next business in order is the resolution offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BENJAMIN] yesterday, as to the employment of clerks by the standing committees, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. EVANS,] to add:

Except the Committees on Finance, Claims, and Printing, whose clerks shall receive an annual compensation of $1,850 each.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In a report which was made to the Senate at the last session by a special committee appointed for the purpose, the privilege of employing a clerk was denied to several committees besides those named in this resolution, and made exceptions to it. I do not now recollect what those exceptions were; but I beg the Secretary to turn to that report and ascertain. I should like to move it as an amendment to the proposition.

Mr. STUART. Those committees have been discontinued.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not all of them. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was one, and the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office was another of the committees mentioned in that report as not needing a clerk. I move that this resolution be laid on the table for the present. The Senator from Louisiana, who offered it, is not here.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVAL COURTS OF INQUIRY.

Mr. SLIDELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate the records of proceedings of the several naval courts of inquiry, organized under the act of Congress approved June 16, 1857, to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy."

Mr. CRITTENDEN subsequently said: I desire to move a reconsideration of a resolution adopted on the motion of the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. SLIDELL,] requesting the President to furnish us with copies of the proceedings of the several naval courts of inquiry which have been held under the recent act of Congress. I think it is premature to make that call. I shall have no objection to its being made at the proper time; but it seems to me to be premature now. I wish to suspend the operation of the resolution for the present, for a reason which I will state. There are a great many records, of course. There have been over one hundred cases—I do not know exactly how many; it may be one hundred and fifty. This call is made on the President to send all those records here. It does not appear, and it may not be the case, that the President has had time to examine them all; and if he is to send them here previous to examination, it leaves the whole business in a very awkward and incomplete condition. There may be cases of such a character that the President may choose to send them back to the courts for revision. There may be blunders and inaccuracies in the records themselves which deserve correction; and for all these things time and opportunity should be allowed. It will be time enough for us to have these records when we are called upon to act on the subject. I think the adoption of the resolution now is premature, and may do mischief. I hope it will not be adopted.

Mr. SLIDELL. I have no desire to press the immediate consideration of my resolution, but I will state the reasons which induced me to offer it. There is a communication now before the Senate, which will require action in executive session, and it possibly may require some time to prepare the different records. They are voluminous. If the President thinks proper to send the originals here, no time would be lost. If it should be the pleasure of the Senate not to act on any portion of the business to which my resolution refers until final action is had in every case, I have no sort of objection to the postponement of this resolution; but I would suggest to the Senator from Kentucky, that his object can be equally well accomplished at a subsequent stage of the session, by offering a resolution calling for all those proceedings not yet consummated. As I understand from the newspapers—and they are sometimes not altogether without authority in matters of this kind—the President has confirmed the decision of the courts of inquiry in a number of cases which will require the action of the Senate. He has also, as I understand, confirmed the action of the courts, where it has been of an unfavorable character. There are a great many cases—probably nine tenths of them, certainly a very large proportion of them—where the printing of the record would not be required. I have reason to believe that there may be occasion to discuss this matter either here or elsewhere; and it appears to me time would be gained, and no inconvenience could possibly result from the adoption of the resolution now. However, I have no disposition to press it, but let it stand as it is.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I hope, then, it will stand as it is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator withdraw the motion to reconsider?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. No, sir. That will keep it in the position in which I desire to have it. Let it stand on the motion to reconsider.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

Mr. STUART. I desire to call up at this time the business before the Senate yesterday, being the motion of the Senator from Illinois to refer certain portions of the President's message to the Committee on Territories. I learn from the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. FITCH] that he desires to occupy a short time in giving his views on that subject, and I have consented that he should do so before I enter on my own. I move to take up the proposition of the Senator from Illinois for that purpose.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. DOUGLAS, to refer so much of the President's message as relates to affairs in Kansas to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. FITCH. Being indebted to the courtesy of the Senator from Michigan for the floor, I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate during but a brief occupancy of it, for I am anxious, as I know those about me are, to listen to that Senator, and to others who can be heard on this subject with far more pleasure and profit than anything I can say will afford.

Yesterday, sir, was the day fixed for the action of the people of Kansas on that portion of the constitution submitted to the popular vote. We shall soon know the result, and congressional action in the premises will soon be required—assuming, that is, that the election took place, and that no violence, no fraud interfered to prevent it or control it. Whatever my views and opinions of the question of slavery, the unfortunate subject of so much sectional controversy, may be, I am unwilling that the character of the decision yesterday had in Kansas on that subject shall possibly be supposed to control whatever action I may hereafter take on the question of admitting that Territory into the Union as a State; and hence I desire now to state the reasons which will govern my action. I wish to state the reasons in advance of any possible knowledge on our part of the character of that decision, that the latter may not be supposed to color the former.

My friend, the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] who opened the debate, intimated a somewhat novel opinion yesterday during the discussion of this subject, namely: an opinion that the President had descended from his exalted position to devote two columns, more or less, of his annual message, to an assault on him, or at least upon his views, reports, and opinions upon this Kansas controversy; and further, that any allusion, even here by Senators in debate, was an attack upon him, premeditated, and part, perhaps, of a general design to read him out of the Democratic party!

Mr. DOUGLAS. Did I say on the part of the President?

Mr. FITCH. Oh, no.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I expressly exempted the President from that combination.

Mr. FITCH. The Senator misunderstood me, if he understood me as saying that he charged the President with any design to read him out of the party. As I shall necessarily refer to the Senator's argument, at least in the course of my brief remarks, because the honorable Senator has so mixed himself up with Kansas affairs that the latter cannot be discussed without reference to him and his arguments and positions relative thereto, I wish to advertise him and the Senate in advance, that whatever allusion I may make to him, is not designed as an attack on him, or as evidence of any want of respect for him. Nor, sir, must it be said that I have or assert for myself any right or power—not a scintilla—to read him out of the party; nor do I know or care where that power is, if it is possessed anywhere, because I do not believe in the thing. I grant you, sir, that a man may, by his own voluntary acts, either by promoting discord within a party, or some other equally obnoxious course, place himself beyond the pale of party organization; but I scarce think the Democratic party, as such, cares sufficiently for persons, be they who they may, to put itself to the trouble of reading or resolving them out of its organization.

The Senator's argument, in his opening speech, was based upon the assumption that the Kansas act, repealing the Missouri line, bestowed upon the people of the Territories the right—ay, even imposed upon them the necessity of acting in their primary capacity on every legitimate subject of State legislation, embraced in whatever constitution they might send here, as preliminary to its recognition by Congress. The fallacy, the "fundamental error"—I think that is the term—of this position is manifest from the fact that the right was not prohibited or questioned by the Missouri line, or any other congressional enactment, except upon the single question of slavery. The right was claimed, admitted, and has been exercised, from the organization of our Government, of the people, to act either en masse in their primary capacity, or through delegates, as they preferred, upon all other constitutional subjects of legislation. The repeal of the Missouri line was, therefore, for the purpose, and for the purpose only, of placing that one exceptional question upon the same footing with all others, taking it from its exceptional position and placing it under the rule. This is rendered undeniable by the very language of the repeal. It proceeds to say:

"That the Constitution, and all laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said Territory of Kansas as elsewhere within the United States, except the eighth section of the act preparatory to the admission of Missouri into the Union, approved March 6, 1820, which, being inconsistent with the principle of non-intervention by Congress with slavery in the States and Territories, as recognized by the legislation of 1850, commonly called the compromise measures, is hereby declared inoperative and void."

It need not be said at this day that "non-intervention" has been construed from the days of the Nicholson letter to mean an acknowledgment of the right of the people of the Territories to decide the question of slavery for themselves, at least when they framed their State constitution, and to decide it untrammelled by any congressional prohibition or interference. Following the compromise of 1850—based upon that compromise—the Kansas act proposed, its supporters proposed, its author proposed, merely to carry out the spirit and principles of the compromise by extending them to Kansas and future Territories. Non-intervention, when first introduced as a term in politics, was applied solely to the slavery question. The compromise of 1850 was upon the slavery question. The Missouri line was only a restriction on the subject of slavery. Its repeal in the Kansas act was only upon the subject of slavery. The whole controversy during the discussion, alike on the compromise and the Kansas act, was on that subject, and that only. The opponents, both of the compromise of 1850 and of the Kansas act, endeavored to have that one question retained as an exception to the general rule, which underlies our Government, permitting the citizens of each State to control their own domestic affairs; and they sought to have it thus retained as an exceptional one, by endeavoring to induce Congress to prohibit to the people of the Territories, or the States formed from those Territories, any control whatever over that question.

Now, sir, we find an effort at this time to so construe those measures as to make them apply to all subjects of domestic legislation—an effort to so construe them as to make it a condition precedent to the admission of any new State that every proposition in its constitution shall have been submitted to a popular vote after the constitution has come from the hands of a regularly organized and legal convention! This is a construction inconsistent with the circumstances which brought those measures into existence. It is a construction not contemplated by their supporters, among whom, as a private citizen, I was early included. It is a construction scarcely compatible with their phraseology. We are said to be a progressive people. Is this new reading of these measures an evidence only of our general progress, a part only of our yearly accruing wisdom? Or lurks there behind it some policy of a personal bearing?

Mr. President, I doubt not that every gentleman is governed by the most honorable and patriotic motives in assuming whatever position he may take on this question. I will attribute none other to any man. But if there, unfortunately, be men, high in the Democratic party, who desire to avail themselves of the present phase of this question to take a position outside of that party, with the hope—by throwing fire-brands into its midst, or by directing their artillery against it—to destroy it, in return for some past grievance, real or fancied, I would commend to such the lessons fairly deducible from the result of every such attempt, from Burr's to Van Buren's. The Democratic is the great conservative party of the country—the only national party. It is the only mere political link in the chain which now binds the States in one common country. It is so deemed throughout the world; so known to its own members; so admitted even by the more candid and conservative of its political opponents; and none of these will hold that man guiltless, who abandons it upon a question having in it so little of practical importance as there is in this; and, by seeking its destruction, thereby admits his not unwillingness that a similar fate should be visited on the Union, perhaps, to subserve his selfish purpose.

The measures to which I have alluded—the compromise of 1850 and the Kansas act—as I have said, were designed to take one question; previously, in part at least, an exceptional one, from that position, and apply to it the same rule always previously applied under our Government to all other questions of domestic policy. They were designed, in fact, to subject that one question to the same control and the same usages to which all others were subjected. They did not contemplate either the enlargement or diminution of the powers previously possessed on other questions; neither an expansion nor contraction of those powers. They left all other powers in statu quo, to be exercised as they previously had been, only placing this one among them. But now we find an effort being made to so construe them as to make them subversive of the past usages of the Government; to make them limit the power previously possessed by our people, by compelling them to exercise it in one manner, and one only. We find an effort now being made, in fact, to so construe them as to deny to delegated authority the right to form an organic law—a right hitherto often exercised. This denial is explicitly made by Governor Walker in his recent (I am sorry to say somewhat egotistical) manifesto; one in which he sustains his position by quoting from himself only to support it. He makes this denial explicitly. According to his opinion, the constitutions of more than one half the States of this Union, and even the Constitution of the United States itself, are unconstitutional; because in the case of the former they have been formed by conventions called by acts of Territorial Legislatures; and because in the latter, in common with the former, they have become operative without any previous action upon them by a popular vote. Most fortunately for us, his opinion is not the paramount law of the land; otherwise, a majority of the most populous and wealthy States of the Union would be resolved at once into a territorial condition, and even the Old Thirteen would be compelled to fall back either upon their original articles of confederation or their colonial charters.

It was not, to my knowledge, intimated by any person anywhere, during the discussion of the Kansas bill, that it was the intention to construe that bill, as is now declared, so as to initiate an innovation into the past usage of our Government, by requiring the submission of every distinct proposition in a new State constitution to the popular vote after such constitution has been legally framed by an authorized convention, as a necessary condition precedent to the recognition of that constitution here. The Missouri line was a restriction upon the right of self-government, upon the doctrine of popular sovereignty, inasmuch as it denied to the people north of that line any control whatever over the question of slavery. The Kansas act repealed that line, and therefore annulled the denial, placing that question in the same category with others of a domestic character, subject to the same popular will, leaving that will to be exercised as before, in whatever manner it chose, either through delegates or by a direct vote.

The recognition of popular sovereignty by the repeal of the Missouri line, consisted in the fact that it placed the question of slavery where all others previously were. It did not provide, nor did it contemplate, nor did its supporters imagine, nor did its author intimate, that it contemplated the submission of every bank proposition, every internal improvement projet, every school system, every election qualification in a new constitution, to the people, before the people by and for whom it was formed should be admitted into the Union. Any attempt at that time to so shape its language as to place that construction on it, would have been resisted—I can venture, for the truth of this assertion, to appeal to those about me who acted with its author at the time of its introduction—not only as an uncalled-for and unnecessary innovation upon the past usage of the Government, but as in conflict with that very popular sovereignty which its author then so ably advocated, and for which he now declaims, by denying to the people their right to delegate their power and authority.

If the constitution of Kansas comes here, as we are told it will, without previous submission to the popular vote, I shall regret the fact as much as any gentleman on this floor, or any citizen throughout the Republic; but yet, if it comes here under such circumstances, it will not be an isolated exception to a general rule. Whence this newborn anxiety as to the manner in which that particular constitution shall come before Congress? The rule, on the contrary, has been quite the reverse; for, as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. GREEN] so ably told us, a few days since, a majority of the new States, Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois, included, have been admitted with constitutions which had not previously received the popular sanction, and no complaint followed, either from the States or Congress. Such manner of submission has heretofore met the sanction of the Senator from Illinois himself. I do not make this allusion to convict him of inconsistency, because I know not and care not whether he has been inconsistent or not. As he well said, yesterday, it has no bearing whatever on this question; and if attempts to convict each other of inconsistencies are to constitute the staple argument on this question, I fancy very few of us will escape unscathed. This manner of submission has before met his sanction, both positive and implied; positive, in his having voted for the admission of States with constitutions similarly formed and similarly presented; implied, in his having, jointly with others, framed a permissive act for Kansas, without providing for the submission of the constitution it contemplated to the people, before that constitution came here. If that permissive act had passed both branches of Congress, and become a law, the result would have been precisely what it now is.

Emanating as it did, from a Democratic source—the Senator from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS] and the Senator from Illinois—it met the unqualified opposition of the opposite, or Republican party. That opposition would have been manifested in Kansas precisely as has their opposition to every other proposition not emanating from the Topeka faction, precisely as has their opposition to the territorial law calling a convention, namely, by their refusal to vote at the election of delegates to a convention. Such has been the policy and course of the Topeka faction within Kansas, and their abettors and sympathizers without. They have constantly refused to recognize any law in Kansas, except it was the work of the self-constituted law-makers of their own faction. They have refused to obey any law there, or hold it worthy of obedience, except the will of that faction. Their refusal to vote at the election of delegates, under the congressional permissive act, would have resulted precisely as has their refusal to vote under the territorial act. The same kind of constitution would have been formed and presented here in the same manner, without previous submission. The manner then would have been chargeable to Congress, especially the Democratic portion, and particularly the authors of the bill. Now it is chargeable to the people of the Territory, through their Territorial Legislature, and chargeable in the present case, as it would have been in the former, because of the omission to provide for its submission. If the present constitution had come here under the congressional permissive act, as it would if that act had passed, in all probability, it is scarcely to be believed that it would have met the same reception it has now, from the same source—that a demand would have been made by the Senator from Illinois that it should previously be submitted to the people; that he would have been as prompt to condemn his own work as he now is that of others.

It is objected to this constitution that it was formed by a convention called into existence by a Territorial Legislature—a body, which those making the objection believe not possessed of the right or authority to make the call. In my estimation, this objection might have been well taken in the earlier days of the Republic, but it is too late to take it now, after the oft-repeated recognition of this right by admitting new States, whose constitutions have been similarly framed and presented. Usage, it need not be said, becomes, in legislative matters, law. Moreover, the Kansas organic act itself refutes this objection, giving, as it does, to the people of that Territory, the right to “form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way.” Then, if they had not previously the right to call a convention by and through the Territorial Legislature, either as a necessary incident to the right to act through delegates or representatives, or as bestowed on them by the past usage of the Government in admitting many States with constitutions framed by conventions thus called into existence, that act explicitly gives them the right.

The case of Arkansas has been cited here. It has very little bearing on this. No Kansas act, no organic law, permitting the people of Arkansas to “form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way” was enacted for that Territory.

Conscious that this objection has really little valid foundation, some of those making it resort to another, namely, that the Territorial Legislature, which called this convention was, in their parlance, a “bogus” one, an illegal one, and that, being illegal, neither the convention it formed, nor the constitution framed by that convention, can be legal. The Senator from Illinois (and I really feel myself under the necessity of begging his pardon, and that of the Senate, for such frequent reference to him; but it is unavoidable, as I have said, because of his previous connection with Kansas matters, and because his argument has been the only one in the Senate on that side of the case, in opposition to my views)—the Senator from Illinois does not agree with those who affirm the first of these propositions; in other words, he asserts the legality of the Territorial Legislature of Kansas, but he is understood to concur with the Topeka men in affirming the two latter.

Now, sir, Congress (the Senator from Illinois included) having repeatedly acknowledged the legality of the Territorial Legislature, it is very difficult to perceive by what process of special pleading we are to avoid acknowledging the legality of its acts if they do not conflict with the Constitution of the United States or the Kansas organic act. That many, and perhaps a majority of the citizens of Kansas, did not vote either at the election of representatives to the Territorial Legislature, or delegates to the convention, may be true. Where is your remedy? You cannot compel men to vote. They can only be permitted and invited to do so. If a part in any given community, in order to subvert some particular political purpose, to supply pabulum, it may be, for some political party, to promote the purposes of some partisan leader, neglect or reject the invitation, and will not vote, is the machinery of Government hence to stop, and society to resolve itself into anarchy? Because some political party or, perhaps, a sufficiency of them to change a majority, will not vote, are those who will do so to be deprived of any government? Permit such an absurdity, and you deprive New York of any State government during the period for which its officers were recently elected. Admit such an absurdity, and you enable any faction to overturn your Government by keeping away from the polls, especially if they can substantiate a probability that the majority and the laws would have been different if they had voted.

Our Government is one of checks and balances; and some of its checks apply even to the people themselves. Among the objects of our Government, one is to protect the legal rights of the minority against an illegal assumption or denial of those rights by a majority. While the right of the majority to rule is clearly recognized, it must rule in a legal manner. If a majority resolve itself into a mob, and will neither vote nor observe law or order, the minority who are law-abiding, who form and obey government, cannot be deprived of the benefits and protection of that government by such majority. Is mobocracy to be substituted for democracy? The denial, by the Topeka faction, of the legality of the Territorial Legislature is a part of their plan to subvert a particular purpose. They design thereby to force upon Congress a retrospective recognition of the Topeka constitution, with the officials created under its pretended adoption. Hence their proclaimed determination to receive no constitution, not even that framed at Topeka, from the hands of the late convention. Its acceptance now would imply the necessity of a future election, and the Robinsons and Lanes, and their sympathizers here, are apprehensive they might not be as successful at those elections as they were at such as were ordered and controlled by themselves. Therefore they demand the recognition, and of course the legalization of the Topeka constitution of the past, with all its attendant anarchy, all its attendant defiance of the legal territorial and constitutional authorities, and indeed with all its factional treason. In furtherance of this demand they take exceptions to certain portions of the present constitution other than the slavery clause. To that they do not deem it advisable to object, because being submitted to the popular vote, they know that it will be expected of them by the world outside of that Territory, if they have the majority they claim, that they show their majority by rejecting that clause.

A comparison of the features to which they object in the Lecompton constitution, with similar ones in that of Topeka, which they profess to have adopted, is favorable to the former, showing that their objections are merely factious. Among these objections is, that twenty years' citizenship is required as a qualification for Governor. Their own—the Topeka constitution—permits a semi-barbarous Indian to be Governor! There is a bank clause in both; and if there be any choice where, as in matters of banks, all is evil, that choice is clearly in favor of the Lecompton instrument, because the bank for which that provides cannot go into operation without the previous assent of the people. Both contain a clause prohibiting amendment for a certain number of years in the future. I grant you it is a dead letter in both, because the people will amend or change their constitution in their own good time. In the Topeka instrument this prohibition extends to 1865. The conduct of that Topeka faction, their resistance to legal territorial and national authority, their incipient rebellion, are yet too fresh in the minds of our people to permit a direct proposition to be seriously entertained for one moment, to legalize their acts; yet we are called upon to do so indirectly; we are called upon to trundle to this treasonable faction, to humbly ask it whether this or some other constitution will best subvert its purposes. We are asked to ignore the existence of any law-abiding citizens in Kansas to place such men in power and position.

The compromise of 1850 and the Kansas act of 1854 based upon it; both recognize in the people of the Territories the same right and power possessed by the people of the States, namely: the right and power to govern themselves, subject only to the Constitution of the United States and the laws necessary to enforce it. The recognition of this right and power has resulted, in all except two of our present Territories, in the formation of a legal and orderly government of the character contemplated. The two exceptions are Utah and Kansas. In the former, usurpation, defiance of and opposition to the constitutional authorities of the country have resulted; in the latter, anarchy and faction, and a determination to yield obedience to no law except the offspring of faction. The remedy in the former case is a plain one—it is force. In the latter the only remedy must be the recognition of the acts of such law-abiding citizens as have evinced a willingness to be governed and to govern themselves by yielding obedience to a constitutional and legal government. The interests, the welfare, indeed I may say the safety, not only of the neighboring States and Territories, but of the entire Confederacy, demand that this Kansas controversy, a local one, should be localized; that it should no longer be permitted to form an irritating element of national politics, disturbing the peace and endangering the unity of our Government, but should be limited to Kansas. The experience of the past, and indeed of this moment, clearly shows that this can only be done by admitting Kansas as a State. The people of Kansas have no right to demand or expect the entire country to be continually agitated, its prosperity interrupted, its unity endangered, because they will not reconcile their contemptible feuds—will not settle their factious quarrels. When admitted as a State, then, and then only, its people will, as they must, govern themselves. Then faction in Kansas will have no apology for calling on its abettors and sympathizers without, or upon Congress. Then no power outside of itself will have any pretext for interfering with its domestic feuds. Then, if one constitution be not pleasing to a majority of its inhabitants, it can be amended, or another substituted whenever that majority so will, even if it be within a few days.

With all deference to those, especially from my own section, who differ with me on this subject, I see no course for Congress to adopt in the present emergency but to admit Kansas with whatever constitution it may present here—assuming always that the election of yesterday was not fraudulent, and was not interrupted by force—after first satisfying ourselves as to the constitutional requirement, is it republican in form? and next, did it emanate from a legal source? was it formed in a legal manner? These are the only questions, in my judgment, that we have any warrant for asking. It is not for us to inquire how many votes were cast at the election of delegates to the convention. It is not for us to ask whether some portion or all of it was submitted to the popular vote, unless indeed, as in the case of the constitution of Wisconsin, the instrument provided for its own submission; or unless, as in the case of Minnesota, a previous act of Congress required such submission. In all other than these two exceptional cases, such questions are for the decision of the people alone. If they choose to enact a law through their Territorial Legislature, calling a constitutional convention, in the absence of any congressional law on the subject, they have a right to do so. If in enacting such law they choose to permit or provide for a submission of the entire constitution, or only a part of it to a popular vote, or to have all of it withheld from such submission, they have a right to do either. They possess the right under their organic law permitting them to form and regulate their institutions in their own way," and they possess it generally under our recognized doctrine of non-intervention, or popular sovereignty. If any domestic differences occur between themselves and their servants, their representatives or delegates, the same doctrine of non-intervention prohibits us from interfering. Their domestic differences, like their "domestic institutions," must be settled by them in "their own way," so that the way be legal. If a portion of the citizens choose to refrain from voting, either for representatives to their Legislature, or for delegates to their convention, or for or against whatever portion of their constitution may be submitted, we have no remedy. We cannot force them to vote. Those who abstain from voting, whether they abstain merely as peaceable citizens or for factious purposes, as has been the case with a vast number in Kansas, permit others to vote for them, and if the decision at the ballot box be adverse to their views they permit that decision to be taken by default. Congress, acting under the Constitution, and the doctrine of popular sovereignty, recognizes their right to vote and their right "to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way;" but it is for them, and them alone to say to what extent they will exercise the right of voting, in what manner they will exercise it, or whether they will exercise it at all. It is not for Congress to prescribe the manner and extent, or to dictate a particular way, in which they shall form their "domestic institutions," whether immediately through the ballot box, en masse, or by delegating authority to act for them. If they present a constitution here, republican in form, emanating from legal authority, formed in a legal manner, it is not for us to require that a certain number of votes shall have been cast at the election of the delegates who framed it; it is not for us to require that a portion of it, or all of it, shall have been submitted to a popular vote, unless such submission be required by the instrument itself or by a previous act of Congress; it is not for us to require that it shall contain a bank clause or an anti-bank clause, a slavery clause or an anti-slavery clause. These are all questions for the decision of the party directly interested—the people of Kansas. If these or similar requirements are adhered to, and the constitution returned because it does not fulfill them, such action on our part will be a denial of popular sovereignty, a denial of their right to regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, and a demand that they shall form and regulate them in that way, whatever it may be, prescribed for them and dictated to them by Congress. It would be, in fact, direct intervention with their domestic institutions, their internal affairs.

I should have greatly preferred, especially in the present state of feeling in Kansas and throughout the country, that the entire constitution had been submitted to the people. It would have been, if the people would have exercised the right guaranteed to them. The fault is their own, not ours. We cannot go behind their own legal actions—recognized as legal heretofore by Congress and the Executive. We are bound by that action in my estimation. I say I should have greatly preferred that the entire instrument had been submitted to the people; but, notwithstanding this preference, the legal right of the convention, under the law which called it into existence, to withhold the constitution in part or altogether from submission, is to my mind unquestionable. The convention is responsible to the people of Kansas alone for the exercise of that right.

We are told that if we recognize the present constitution, difficulties will ensue. I believe it; and so they will if we reject it. Indeed, I have heard of no proposition connected with this matter which has not its attendant difficulties. My own sincere desire is to have that course adopted which will be productive of the least evil to the greatest number. Without committing myself for or against any other proposition which may come up, and which may be rendered necessary perhaps by some exigency—either a failure to hold an election yesterday, or a forcible prevention of an election, or interference with it—I shall only select at present between the two which are likely from the present state of facts to come before us. One of these is to recognize this constitution; the other, to reject it.

The first of these propositions is recommended by the President, the chief Executive officer of the nation; the man but recently elected by an overwhelming majority to preside over its destinies for four years; an old man, almost three score and ten; one who has devoted the greater portion of his long life to the service of his country, and has been placed in almost every position in the gift of its citizens, and discharged the duties of all to their satisfaction; one who has no political future, no schemes of personal ambition to subserve, who is no candidate for a future nomination, but will retire from the position he now holds with far more pleasure than he entered upon its duties, desiring only to leave behind him a fair fame and name, and to so administer the Government as will best promote its power, its honor, and its prosperity. The other of these two propositions is supported by the Senator from Illinois. I honor him. I have ever admired him; yet, in some respects, he is the antipodes of the President. Young, of a brilliant intellect, of which all his countrymen might well be proud, but ambitious, and a candidate past, and perhaps future. I do not speak this in any disparagement of him, for ambition, divested of self—a desire to hold place without any selfish motive inciting it; a desire to hold place merely to leave the impress of his policy on the Government of his country and to enhance the prosperity of its people—is an honorable feeling.

In justification for his so ill-timed hurrying this debate upon the Senate, and upon the country, the Senator from Illinois told us that the President, in his message, had assailed him and his previous course. He intimated further, that every allusion to him here, in debate upon the affairs of Kansas, was designed as a continuation of the attack, and that there was some person, or some power, using a suborned press and suborned letter-writers, to likewise assail him. In all this, he sees more of himself than others do—fancies himself the object of actions which have little reference to him, and with which little thought of him was associated. He did not name or locate this person, or this power, thus suborning the press, leaving full play for our imaginations. It may be some tangible person; it may be some myth, some fog, some shadowy nothing, existing only in his imagination; or it may be that this one of his allegations grew out of a recollection of a similar charge once brought against himself—a charge to which he then very promptly and properly took exception, as I do to this general charge of his against a somebody who is not designated. He was once charged—and it was not in a subdued whisper, but trumpet-toned and hundred-tongued—with at least no unwillingness, that a public journal, thought to be controlled by him, and claiming to be the mouth-piece of the national Democracy, should throw overboard Mr. Buchanan, General Cass, and other fathers of the party, as "old fogies."

I have thus, sir, briefly stated the qualities of the two gentlemen who recommended these opposite propositions. I have the most profound respect for them both. Locality, every consideration of self, if such could enter into my motives of action in this matter, would induce me to go with the Senator from Illinois. We are geographically neighbors. I may almost say that his people and my people are one. He has, perhaps, more influence among my people than I have myself. These considerations, however, have nothing whatever to do with my course, or my opinion on this question. Between these two counselors, thus recommending opposite propositions, I have no hesitation as to whose advice to follow. Of the two propositions, I look upon the one to reject this constitution as far the most mischievous, because it will prolong this controversy as an element of that dangerous sectional agitation, which threatens, and has threatened, the unity of the Republic. Between the two, assuming that one or the other must be acted on here, my choice will unquestionably be for the former.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask pardon of the Senator from Michigan for occupying a few moments of the time properly belonging to him. I regret that, as the Senator from Indiana spoke by the courtesy of the Senator from Michigan, he should have deemed it necessary to say anything that demanded a reply from me at the expense of the Senator who is entitled to the floor. I understand the Senator's argument to rest upon the proposition, which he argues at some length, that the object, the only object, of that portion of the Kansas-Nebraska bill which repealed the Missouri restriction, was to place the slavery question on the same footing with each and every other local and domestic question, as had been done from the beginning of the Government. I do not misunderstand him on that point.

Mr. FITCH. No, sir.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad to find that on the very basis of his argument he and I agree. It was the object of repealing the Missouri compromise, to put the slavery question on the same footing with each and every other domestic question in the Territories and new States: that is, to leave the people perfectly free to form and regulate all their domestic institutions, slavery included, to suit themselves. On this point, however, he differs with the President of the United States; for the President tells us that the object was to make slavery an exception and submit that by itself, but not submit the other questions.

I was sorry to see the Senator taking issue with the President of the United States upon a question of that kind, and, at the same time, arraigning me for having done the same thing. The whole head and front of my offending consists in the fact, that I dissented from that part of the President's message which declared that the slavery question was an exception, and argued to prove that the object of the Kansas-Nebraska bill was to exclude that exception and put the slavery question on the same footing with every other question which was local and not national, State and not Federal. The Senator from Indiana now agrees with me that the President was wrong in that part of his message, and that I was right. There is no avoiding this conclusion. He repeated the proposition a dozen times in the course of his speech. I am glad to find that he and I agree thus far. I hope he will not consider that he is outside the pale of a healthy organization; that he is abandoning the President, and engaging in an ambitious scheme to break down the Administration, because he differs with the President on the same point that I do.

He says I have come out in favor of a general rule, novel in the history of the Government, that, hereafter, every constitution formed by a new State coming into the Union must be submitted to the people before it is sent here. The Senator argues against the general rule as being a novel and revolutionary principle, which ought not to be fastened on the country at this day. Has he read the President's message on that point? In the message, the President of the United States tells us that the example of the Minnesota bill, in requiring the constitution to be submitted to the people, is a noble example; and should be followed in all cases hereafter to arise. The Senator is arraigning the general rule of the President in regard to the submission of constitutions to the people for ratification. I stand with the President in behalf of that general rule.

I am a little at a loss to see upon what ground it is that the Senator utters vague innuendoes about men putting themselves in a factious position towards the party, dividing and distracting its councils to such an extent that they ought to be considered outside of the party. He differs with the President on two points: I on one. The President says the slavery question is treated by the Kansas-Nebraska bill as an exception. The Senator says that by that bill, and by the Cincinnati platform, the slavery question is put on the same footing with all other questions, without any exception. On that point, as I have said, the Senator from Indiana and myself agree, both differing from the President. He differs from the President in regard to the general rule that the constitution ought to be submitted to the people. On that point I agree with the President. If to differ from the President is faction, then the Senator has just double the amount of faction in his position that I have in mine.

Then what is the issue between the Senator from Indiana and myself? Agreeing that the object of the Kansas-Nebraska bill was to place the slavery question on an equal footing with all other local and domestic institutions, and leave the people free to decide the whole, he takes the ground that he will not submit those questions to the people, and I take the ground that they should be submitted to the people. That is the simple point of difference. On that point the reasoning of the President is with me, for he says, that by the terms of the Nebraska bill, it was incumbent upon the Democratic party to insist that the slavery question should be submitted to the people for their decision; and if the Senator from Indiana be right in saying that by the Nebraska bill the slavery question was put on the same footing with all others, then if he agrees with the President, he affirms that the whole constitution should be submitted to the people for their ratification.

Thus we find the gentleman in conflict with the President of the United States at all points, and in conflict with the President upon the very recommendations he makes in regard to the Territories which are about to become States, to wit: the general rule of submission. The Senator from Indiana will not claim, like the Senator from Pennsylvania, that he has "other sources of information" than the message. He will not claim that there are sources of information which authorize him to deny the propositions laid down in the message. If he will, I should like to know who is the friend, and who is the enemy, of the President of the United States?

The Senator from Indiana cannot maintain his position without rebelling against a large portion of the message on the Kansas question. But I hold that he has a right to differ from the President. God forbid that I should ever surrender my right to differ from a President of the United States of my own choice! I have not become the mere servile tool of any President, so that I am bound to take every recommendation he makes, without examining and ascertaining whether it meets the approval of my judgment or not. I know that the President would not respect me if I should thus receive a dictum from any authority contrary to my judgment.

Again, yesterday, I tried to ascertain if there was any one Senator on this floor who was prepared to yield obedience to the President's recommendations in his message, without exception. I instanced the Pacific railroad, the bankrupt law, the tariff, and many other questions, and I could not get a response from any one man who indorses the whole, or is prepared to carry it out. All other men are permitted to dissent but me! It is factious in me to dissent! If I dissent, it disturbs the harmony of the Democratic party! I tell the Senator that if he will stand faithful by the Cincinnati platform, which affirmed the right of the people to decide all their local and domestic institutions for themselves, there will be harmony between him and me; and if each member of the party will stand by that platform, there will be harmony in the whole party. Why not stand there? Oh, it is factious! It is intimated, not charged, that there is something fearful, something terrible in this thing of a man daring to be true and faithful to his principles, when other men do not desire that he should be.

Allusions are made to men whose names are known—to Burr and Van Buren—as if they came from sources that would read me out of the Democratic party. I should like those who are arraigning my course here, to compare records with me in my devotion and service to the party for the fourteen years that I have been in Congress. The assumption is, that I will not bow the knee to power, when that power itself does not recommend it, and the insinuation is that I am factious. Sir, call it faction; call it what you please; I intend to stand by the Nebraska bill, by the Cincinnati platform, by the organization and principles of the party; and I defy opposition from whatever quarter it comes.

I predict that sixty days shall not go over my head before I shall be in harmony with those who are now most relied upon to crush me and the principle of the Nebraska bill, by the admission of the Lecompton constitution. I shall be mistaken if, in sixty days, you come here unanimously demanding the indorsement of the Lecompton constitution, as a test of faith. The pro-slavery clause stricken out may make popular sovereignty look very different in gentlemen's eyes from what it would if it were in. The pro-slavery clause in, with the exception of the Senator from Indiana, the merits of that convention may look very differently to some gentlemen from what they would if it were out. With me it can make no difference. I regard the result of that convention as a trick, a fraud upon the rights of the people, and come with slavery or without slavery, I am opposed to the whole of it.

But we are told we must force the Lecompton constitution down the throats of the people for the sake of peace; for the sake of localizing the quarrel. How is that to be done? By passing an act of Congress forcing a constitution on the people of Kansas against the will of that people. What next? When you find the stubborn, factious majority resisting the government that you have imposed on them, the President will be called upon to use the Army and the Navy to put down insurrection; and inasmuch as this Lecompton faction is only composed of perhaps one tenth or one twentieth of the whole people, and there is not a man of them who dares stay there a day without the United States army to protect him, we should have a special message from the President recommending an increase of the Army, and the calling out of volunteers to march to Kansas to put down the insurrection, and maintain the government which you force on them at the point of the bayonet. That is the mode in which you are going to localize the Kansas quarrel—by calling troops from Virginia and from Wisconsin, from Illinois and from South Carolina, from Massachusetts and from Mississippi, and stationing those volunteers around the city of Lecompton to protect the Governor whom you impose upon that people against their will! Then I suppose there will be perfect peace and harmony among them all. You will restore peace in that way, and localize the Kansas difficulty! No, sir. The moment you impose a constitution on that people against their remonstrance and protest, you have nationalized this difficulty, and pledged yourselves to maintain that government at the point of the bayonet, and with all the power at your command. You have legalized civil war instead of localizing the Kansas quarrel. These are my convictions. I believe that such will be the consequences, if we proceed in this mad career of forcing a constitution on a people against their will. I hope I may be mistaken, and that such consequences will not result; but, while such are my convictions, I must be permitted to express them. If my doing so brings down assaults on me, from whatever quarter, high or low, from my own section or an opposite section, I must repel those assaults; but I do not choose to go into any crimination or recrimination in regard to consistency on former phases of this question. I am willing that my consistency shall be judged of by the public. I think my course is pretty well known, and I am willing that the people shall judge of it. If the course of the Senator from Indiana is equally well known, let the people judge of it by that knowledge. If it is not as well known, I have no desire, no disposition, to hunt up old speeches and old records and old letters to show his inconsistency. Consistency has very little to do with this question. The great point is, is it right to force a constitution upon a people against their will? Am I not right in my opposition to that act of power and oppression? I would rather argue that question than go into any controversies with political friends or even political opponents. I would prefer that they should consider me so humble an individual that my history of fifteen years is not necessary to be discussed, inasmuch as during the whole fifteen years, I have found them loud in praise of my course as to the political iniquities which they now propose to bring in judgment against me.

But, sir, I ask no mercy in relation to this matter. I will not provoke controversy with anybody. I shall not shrink from the avowal of my opinions and the vindication of my character whenever I choose to do it. I may not reply to all. It may be an object to worry out my strength by these constant attacks from day to day. Whenever I find it failing I will reserve myself, and then come back and take a raking fire at the whole group. [Laughter.] But whenever I shall feel inclined I will repel the blow at the time it is struck.

Mr. FITCH. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FITCH. I should not ask the indulgence of the Senator from Michigan, but for the fact that the Senator from Illinois, for reasons best known to himself, attributed to me language which I did not utter, and sentiments which I have not expressed or entertained. I must, therefore, appeal to the courtesy of the Senator from Michigan to allow me to answer.

Mr. STUART. Inasmuch as I commenced the day by acts of courtesy, it would hardly be graceful now for me to refuse to extend the courtesy. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FITCH. At first, the Senator from Illinois assumed that his own and my argument were based on the same idea—the idea that the slavery question, from being an exceptional one, was, by the compromises of 1850 and by the Kansas bill, placed under the general rule, and subjected to the popular will, in precisely the same manner with other domestic questions. Whatever his views now may be, he did not express that view in his opening speech. Here it is, in the pamphlet form, as ordered by the Senator:

"Now, sir, what was the principle enunciated by the authors and supporters of that bill, when it was brought forward? Did we not come before the country, and say that we repealed the Missouri restriction for the purpose of substituting and carrying out, as a general rule, the great principle of self-government, which left the people of each State and each Territory free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way?"

"Repealed the Missouri restriction for the purpose of substituting" a something else—a new "general rule;" self-government in lieu of the rule of government previously enforced. Why, sir, that paragraph implies that the Senator from Illinois wrested the right of self-government from some tyranny, and bestowed it on the people; that he gave them a "general rule"—a power which they did not previously possess. Now he claims merely to have taken one question from an exceptional position and placed it under a "general rule" previously in force. I grant that, subsequently, in the course of his remarks, he spoke of the slavery question as an exceptional one, which his Kansas bill proposed to place upon the same footing with the other domestic questions; but not so in the opening remarks of his speech—its foundation. He tells me, I differ with the President. I stop not to ask whether I differ with him or the Senator from Illinois. Neither the President nor any other gentleman is responsible for my course, but myself. I would differ with the one as soon as with the other, if I thought his reasoning, or the conclusions at which he arrived, were not correct. I do not read the message as the Senator from Illinois reads it, and his reading is not justified by its language. I nowhere find the President saying that the slavery question was made an exceptional one by the Kansas bill. He says, in substance, that it was the prominent question, the one which had been discussed, the one which had been agitated; and, therefore, that it was highly proper that it should be submitted to the people as a distinct proposition. The Senator from Illinois asserted—not in terms, but that was the purport—that I denied the propriety of submitting a State constitution—including that of Kansas—to the people. I distinctly asserted my regret that it was not thus submitted; but declared that, in my opinion, we had no right to go behind the authority we had recognized as legal, and demand its submission, when that authority had omitted to demand it. The Senator from Illinois must confine himself to the record—to what I have said—when he pretends to quote me or my sentiments.

The Senator asks me, as he asked the Senator from Pennsylvania yesterday, why these innuendoes about faction and a division of the party. He was the first Senator to introduce here what he calls innuendoes and intimations upon that subject. He was the first to allude to any possible division of the party; the first to allude to any faction in connection with this question. I merely answered his allusion, and am not to be taken to task for it.

I did not quote the message, as he says. I scarcely made allusion to it, except as to the conclusions at which the President arrived. Has the Senator no other defense than attributing language to me I did not utter—attributing sentiments to me I did not express? He says he agrees with the President in some points, and differs with him on others; and that I disagree with him on some, and coincide with him in others. The difference between the Senator and myself is simply this: he denies the President's conclusion, but pretends to coincide with him in his reasoning; while I concur both in his reasoning and conclusion.

Mr. DOUGLAS. What conclusion do you refer to?

Mr. FITCH. The conclusion that the constitution of Kansas, if it comes before us, as it is supposed it will, from the convention directly, without previous submission, will nevertheless be a constitution which we can legally accept, and perhaps, under the circumstances, ought to accept.

The Cincinnati platform is lugged again and again into this controversy by the Senator. I have some little, but not much, faith in political platforms. You know, sir, how they are framed. A committee is appointed to draft resolutions; they bring them forward, and because they do not happen to expressly conflict with the sentiments of the wise gentlemen then and there-assembled for another purpose than to build a political platform to guide all posterity, namely, to nominate candidates for President and Vice President, forsooth they are to control Government and its policy from thence henceforth forever. I have no objection to the Cincinnati platform; on the contrary, I believe it to be an admirable one. It recognizes, in almost the language of the Kansas bill, the right of the people to regulate their domestic institutions in their own way. The people of Kansas have exercised that right in their own way, a way deemed legal; a way the President deems legal. True, there is opposition to that way, and some demand that their institutions shall be regulated in another way, namely, by the submission of the constitution, emanating from what we deem a legal source, to the popular vote; when the source from which it emanated was not compelled by the people in enacting the law, calling that source into existence, to thus submit it. I should be pleased to have it submitted; but it is not my will, but the will of the people of Kansas, legally expressed, which is to control the matter. The people of Kansas frame their own laws through a Legislature. I look at those laws, and find one calling a convention to frame a constitution, without requiring its submission to the people. The people, in fact, were willing to part with control over it, and leave the whole matter in the hands of the convention. I can only know their will through their laws, and I know no right, except it be an arbitrary one, authorizing me or Congress to set aside or go behind their laws.

The Senator takes exception to what he calls insinuations. Mr. President, much of his first speech was devoted to insinuation, and hence it ill becomes him to charge insinuations to others, when simply alluding to his own. It is well known that he insinuated, in his opening remarks, that improper influences were at work upon the affairs of Kansas, either outside or within the Territory, of which he possessed a knowledge, and yet he would not give that knowledge to the Senate. He insinuated, as is within the recollection of every gentleman who heard him, that some kind of influence was at work, an improper and unauthorized influence, to compel the slavery clause to be struck out of the constitution. He insinuated some sort of knowledge on his part that the "returns"—emphasizing the word—would show a great majority for striking out that clause, as though there was to be a second edition of the Oxford frauds, though in an opposite direction; and he had knowledge of this fact, but would not communicate it. This was a mere insinuation. Upon what was it based?

Now, again, he indulges in the same strain. He insinuates that within sixty days those now agreeing with the President in his views in relation to this matter, particularly southern Senators, will stand side by side with him, because the slavery clause will, in all probability, be stricken out.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I did not say northern or southern.

Mr. FITCH. Then those who agree with the President. This is an insinuation that gentlemen—he says he did not indicate southern gentlemen—who have avowed, in public and private, their views and their determination to vote for this constitution, if it comes here with a fair election yesterday, not interrupted by force, whether the slavery clause be left in or voted out, leaving that question for the decision of the people, will change their determination if that clause be stricken out.

Mr. President, it was to avoid just such an insinuation in relation to myself, because I knew it would come, that I determined, if an opportunity offered, to state the reasons for my action in advance of any possible knowledge of the character of the decision yesterday. I was determined that neither that Senator, or others, should be able to say to me, you would have voted differently if that clause were in, or differently if it were out.

Other insinuations are also made. One is that some power or person, some vague shadowy something, which he would not name or locate, was suborning and buying editors and letter-writers to assail him. I have not the money, if I had the inclination, if it was intended in part for me.

Another insinuation which I did not think proper to answer, and an uncalled for one, was, if I did not misunderstand his language yesterday, that those who were opposed to him were, in a great measure, governed by Executive patronage and favor. I have nothing to ask of the Executive, present or future, for myself, and scorn any such imputation, come from where it may. When imputations like that are thrown abroad to influence and prejudice the people against their representatives here, it only indicates what kind of motive can govern the man who makes them.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I have a word to say in regard to what the gentleman designates insinuation. It is true I did intimate by some form of expression, (the precise form I cannot now call to mind,) that I had not the most implicit faith in the returns that will come from Kansas, as to the election held yesterday, and I will tell you why I intimated that doubt. In the first place, I saw that the convention took that election out from under the existing laws of the Territory, and placed it under the direction of three commissioners to be appointed by the president of the convention, who should appoint the judges, and they the clerks, and hold the election without law. It is the first time in the history of this Government, so far as I know, that a convention has ever taken the election from under the existing laws of the land in the Territory. In the other cases the president of the convention has issued the writs of election to the sheriffs and the other county officers who were authorized by law to conduct elections; and it was provided that they should be conducted and returned according to law. Here they expressly took it away from the law, and thus gave an opportunity to the judges and clerks to make as many false returns as they pleased, without violating any law of the land. I thought it was very extraordinary that a convention desirous of a fair election and honest returns should have taken it out from under the law, thus to give unfaithful clerks and judges an opportunity, if they chose, to make false and fraudulent returns. That was the reason why I had my doubts.

I looked into the constitution of that convention and I found my doubts strengthened by that examination, for I found that the Oxford frauds were legalized in the constitution. I found that Johnson county, which had only about four hundred legal voters, was assigned four representatives and two senators; while Shawnee county, with nine hundred voters, was assigned two representatives and one senator. The county having double the number of legal voters had but half the representation. I am informed that, when that fact was called to the attention of the convention by Judge Elmore, who represented Shawnee, and asked why it was, the answer given was: "The gentleman forgets that Oxford city is in Johnson county." The adding of the one thousand six hundred fraudulent votes of Oxford city swelled the number from four hundred to two thousand, and thus enabled them to give four representatives and two senators to Johnson county, based on that fraud; when, without the fraud, it would not have been entitled to more than one senator and one representative.

It appearing on the face of the constitution that the Oxford fraud was thus legalized—it being ascertained that the fact of its being legalized was called to the attention of the convention at the time they did it—that Oxford fraud being alluded to as a justification for doing it; and then it being known that the members of the convention almost unanimously denounced Governor Walker for having set aside that fraud, furnished a presumption that there must have been a reason why they provided, by that schedule, that the returns hereafter should not be trammelled by any law which would authorize anybody to set aside frauds. With these facts before me, I did entertain a doubt as to whether it was intended that there should be honest returns; and I say now, frankly, I have not the slightest idea that those returns will be entitled to any credit whatever.

Mr. FITCH. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him, because I cannot ask the Senator from Michigan to yield the floor again? The Senator from Illinois says that he based his insinuation that improper motives were at work, either within or without Kansas, to insure the striking out of the slavery clause yesterday, on a knowledge of the fact that fraudulent returns had been previously made, and that the manner of election for the constitution was unusual. I have before me his language—the language of the insinuation. The facts to which he now refers had been long known to him. The Oxford fraud was long known to him, for it was a matter of public notoriety for weeks before Congress assembled. The manner in which the election of yesterday would be conducted was known. The schedule of their constitution and the report that their election would be conducted in that manner and by certain officers created by the constitutional convention was well known for weeks. But the knowledge which was in his possession, and upon which he insinuated improper motives were at work in Kansas to secure the striking out of the slavery clause, was something altogether different, if we are to believe the honorable Senator's words at the time of the delivery of his speech. He said:

"I think I have seen enough in the last three days to make it certain that it will be returned out no matter how the vote may stand."

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am much obliged to the Senator for calling my attention, and that of the Senate, to the express language. The facts which

I have detailed warranted me in the supposition that there was an opportunity to return the slavery clause in or return it out, just as should be thought best, and that the convention intended to give that opportunity by providing, in effect, that the laws of the Territory, with their penalties, should not be brought to bear on the offenders, if they did perpetrate fraud. I thought I saw such a design.

Now, what I alluded to having seen within the last three days, was this: there were rumors current—I did not know whether true or false, and I do not know now whether they are true or false—that several gentlemen had started from here to go by express to Kansas to use all their power and influence to get the pro-slavery clause stricken out, so that northern men could vote for the constitution, whereas it was supposed they could not if it was not stricken out.

Mr. FITCH. Does the Senator wish to be understood as intimating that any northern Senator sent such a message? If so, in the spirit of his language to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIGLER] yesterday, from what source does he derive his knowledge? Who is his authority, and who sent the message?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I made no insinuation that any northern Senators or any southern Senators had anything to do with it. I stated that the rumors existed. I saw one gentleman, a warm pro-slavery man, who was hurrying off to Kansas for the purpose of inducing them to strike out the clause, in order that a vote of Congress should be received in favor of the constitution. He did not say that anybody sent him. I heard that others had gone. Who sent them? Whether they were sent by anybody, I do not know; but I confess, taking that in connection with the fact that there was no penalty for fraud, no penalty for false returns—that the laws of the land which punished frauds had been set aside by the convention—led me to doubt whether I ought to have much confidence in the returns; and hence it was not worth while for me to wait before I defined my position until those returns should come in. I did not intend to mention the mere rumor; but let it go for what it is worth. It may be true, or it may be false.

A word now as to the action of the convention which justified the supposition, as I believed, that frauds might be accomplished without the violation of law. The frauds at Oxford were indorsed by the convention when their attention was called to them. The same members of the convention who did that, denounced Governor Walker for having set aside those frauds. A further fact, which is stated to me by an officer of the Army who was present, is, that the clerk who was understood to have perpetrated the Oxford frauds, was chosen clerk of the convention by acclamation, on the suggestion that his services in Johnson county entitled him to that election. These facts, taken together, led me to suspect that much confidence was not due to the returns which should be made there. I merely, by a sort of lapsus linguae, expressed that doubt at the time. Since my attention has been called to it, I give the Senate the foundations on which those doubts existed, and I leave the country to judge whether they are right or not. I have no desire to excite prejudice on this question.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. DOUGLAS. With pleasure.

Mr. CLAY. I ask the Senator whether the twelfth section of the schedule does not expressly provide for the enforcement at this election of all the laws of the Territory regulating other elections, and thereby provide against the commission of fraud and impose the penalties attached to fraud in other elections?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not think it does.

Mr. CLAY. That is my recollection.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Can the Senator from Michigan inform me as to this point? Has he a copy of the schedule at hand?

Mr. STUART. Allow me to say to the Senator from Illinois and to the Senate, that one great disadvantage I am receiving from this discussion is that gentlemen are using a great deal of my argument, [Laughter.]

Mr. DOUGLAS. Under that view of the case, I will take my seat and allow the Senator from Michigan to proceed.

Mr. STUART. It has been suggested by several Senators around me that it is not the pleasure of the Senate that I should proceed to-day. I submit myself entirely to their pleasure.

Several SENATORS. Go on to-morrow.

Mr. STUART. It is also suggested by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] that he desires to have an executive session. With that view, I move to postpone this subject till to-morrow, and I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to express my views then.

Mr. DAVIS. I have a word to say before the postponement. The Senator from Illinois closed his remarks by saying that he did not wish to prejudice—

Mr. DOUGLAS. I did not close my remarks, but I yielded the floor to the Senator from Michigan. If the Senate is not going into executive session, I have a few words more to say.

Mr. CLAY. With the permission of the Senator from Illinois, I beg to read the twelfth section of the schedule, because I think he has done gross injustice to the convention, and his remarks are calculated to produce a false impression, and a very baneful influence, if permitted to go uncontradicted. I shall simply read the twelfth section, and say nothing more, at this time, in reply to the Senator. The twelfth section of the schedule is in these words:

"All officers appointed to carry into execution the provisions of the foregoing sections, shall, before entering upon their duties, be sworn to faithfully perform the duties of their offices; and, in failure thereof, be subject to the same charges and penalties as are provided, in like cases, under the territorial laws."

Mr. STUART. It is true the schedule makes that provision; but it is equally true that the acting Governor of the Territory, in his opening message to the Legislature, has said there is no law in Kansas punishing fraudulent returns.

Mr. CLAY. In reply, I simply ask the Senator whether the ipse dixit of the Governor is to prevail over the law?

Mr. STUART. No, sir; but there is no such law.

Mr. CLAY. If what the Governor says does not override the law, it is of no moment whatever.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am aware that the clause which has been read was in the copy of the constitution published in the National Intelligencer; but it was not in the copy published in the Union, which was said—I do not know how the fact may be—to have been furnished by the President. How to account for the variance I do not know, unless in this way: it was said in Kansas that the convention adjourned without having put the constitution in form, but appointed a committee to do that; and it may be that the copy published in the Intelligencer was the revised copy, while the Union published the constitution as made by the convention. Whether that be so or not, however, I say the clause as read does not put the matter under the territorial laws, as it would have been if left to the regular officers, who were subject to penalties for making fraudulent returns. As I said before, I shall not continue the argument further to-day, although there are many other things that I should like to say.

Mr. CLAY. I simply say to the Senator he is mistaken. I hold in my hand what purports to be, and what I am assured is, a copy of the Union containing the schedule.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will say to the Senator from Alabama, that I shall look into the matter, and if I find that I have been mistaken I shall take great pleasure in saying so in open Senate.

Mr. STUART. My motion is to postpone the further consideration of this subject until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. BAYARD, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 22, 1857.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. P. D. GURLEY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER announced the business first in order to be the call of committees for reports, and that reports were in order from the Committee of Elections.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed a resolution of the House, entitled "A joint resolution to amend the act entitled an 'Act to regulate the compensation of members of Congress,' approved August 16, 1856."

EXCUSED FROM SERVING ON COMMITTEE.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I desire to be excused by the House from further service on the committee of Claims, in consequence of physical disability to perform my duties on that committee. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

NEW JUDICIAL DISTRICT IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. WALBRIDGE, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Michigan in relation to a new judicial district in said State; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

TREASURY NOTE BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the Treasury note bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. Before the question is taken on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I desire, unless he intends to submit the motion himself, to move that the debate on the Senate bill be closed in the same time prescribed by the House for the House bill—in two hours after the committee shall proceed to its consideration. I submit that motion, and demand the previous question on it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I wish to inquire whether the Senate bill has been printed? If it has not, I do not think the House is prepared to take up and debate that bill.

Mr. BOGOCOCK. I would also suggest a question of order upon the motion submitted by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON.] I do not think it is competent for the House to close debate upon a bill which has never been taken up in committee. I think that the rule requires that the bill shall, at some time previous, have been considered in committee, before the House can pass a resolution for closing debate. I do not wish to insist upon the point of order. I merely suggest it for the consideration of the Chair.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon the question of order.

Mr. BOGOCOCK. I will withdraw it.

Mr. BANKS. I make the question of order that the House cannot close debate upon a bill which has never been considered in committee. I do not do it for the purpose of defeating the action of the House upon the bill. I am willing that the House shall come to a vote to-day upon one bill or the other; but I desire that our business shall be taken up in its regular order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that the Senate bill has been printed, and will be laid upon our desks immediately.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the question of order raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts. It is not in order to close debate upon a bill which has not been considered in committee. The Chair, therefore, decides that the resolution of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] is not in order.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I wish to make a suggestion, before the question is put, upon going into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The House has passed an order that all debate in Committee of the Whole on the House Treasury note bill shall be closed in two hours after we shall go into committee. Now I wish to suggest that, by unanimous consent, it shall be agreed that each individual who speaks shall be limited to fifteen minutes. There are a number of gentlemen who desire to make some expression of their views upon this bill. By limiting the speeches to fifteen minutes each a considerable number of gentlemen may be heard, while the number must necessarily be very limited without such limitation.

The SPEAKER. The proposition may be entertained by unanimous consent.

Mr. GROW. I will not object if the gentleman will put it at twenty minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. Very well; then I will put it at twenty minutes.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to twenty minutes. I have no idea that any gentleman can discuss this question as he wishes to in twenty minutes. I do not know that I shall have anything to say myself upon the bill; but I do not think it would be good policy to make such a limitation as the gentleman suggests. If he will put it at half an hour I will not object.

Mr. FLORENCE. I hope the gentleman will put it at ten minutes. I think I could myself answer all the objections which have been made against this bill from the other side of the House in five minutes. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama object to the proposition of the gentleman from Louisiana?

Mr. HOUSTON. No, sir, I will not interpose objection.

No further objection being made, the proposition was assented to, by general consent; and the question recurred on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Before the question is put upon the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I wish to state that the reason why I did not myself make the motion to close debate on the Senate bill, was that the same question of order was made yesterday, and I supposed the motion would not be entertained. I will say, however, that when the House shall go into committee, I shall move to lay aside the House bill and take up the Senate bill. I shall then move that the committee rise, for the purpose of closing debate upon it.

Mr. SEWARD. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. SEWARD. Then I object to all debate.

The question was put upon Mr. Jones's motion; and it was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PHELPS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill (No. 4) to authorize the issue of Treasury notes, upon which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move to lay aside the House bill, and take up the Senate bill upon the same subject.

Mr. STANTON. I hope the House will not adopt the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I do not think the committee has the power to consider, at this time, the Senate bill. The Constitution provides that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives. That is the effect of this bill, and we have no right, therefore, to take the Senate bill into consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair, the motion is in order.

Mr. BANKS. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] is entitled to the floor, and the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means certainly cannot submit his motion until he has the floor for that purpose.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I made the motion, as I understood it, with the assent of my colleague, [Mr. GROW.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the motion to be offered with the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who is entitled to the floor. If not, the gentleman is entitled to the floor, and the motion will not be received.

Mr. GROW. It is immaterial to me which I speak on. I only desire the privilege of submitting some remarks upon the question. Shall I be entitled to the floor on the other bill?

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania yields the floor for the purpose of allowing the motion to be made, the Chair will again assign him the floor.

Mr. SEWARD. I should like to know how the Senate bill came in the possession of this committee at all?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Georgia that the bill was referred by the House to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STANTON. I suppose the motion is debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. STANTON. Well, sir, I trust the committee will not take up the Senate bill. [Cries of "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is one relating to the priority of business, and no debate is in order.

Mr. SEWARD. If the motion to take up the Senate bill is in order, I want to know how many bills intervene on the Calendar between the House bill and the Senate bill?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object to all debate.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is it in order to set aside this House bill under the resolution of the House, closing debate and requiring that the committee shall proceed to vote upon it?

The CHAIRMAN. The resolution adopted by the House yesterday, requires the committee to close debate upon the House bill in two hours after its consideration shall be resumed. In the opinion of the Chair, the consideration of that bill has not been resumed, and the motion is therefore in order.

Mr. FLORENCE. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. One question of order is already pending, raised by the gentleman from Tennessee. The Chair overrules the question of order.

Mr. SEWARD. I want to know the condition of these bills; whether the Senate bill comes up next in order on the Calendar, if this bill is laid aside?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is not in order, as he has not risen to a point of order.

Mr. COLFAX. Well, I have risen to a point of order three several times, but have not been recognized by the Chair. The Constitution of the United States declares that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; and the Senate bill declares, in the fourth section, that,

"The Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized, with the approbation of the President, to borrow, from time to time, such sums of money upon the credit of such notes as the President may deem expedient."

This explicitly declares that he shall raise revenue upon the hypothecation of these notes. I raise, then, the point of order that it is a revenue bill, and should have originated in this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the question of order raised by the gentleman from Indiana. That is a question for the determination of each member, as he is called to vote upon the bill, and not for the Chair.

Mr. FLORENCE. I submit a point of order, with a view to avoid this difficulty. Would it not be in order to move to strike out all after the enacting clause, and to insert this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. That question cannot be raised at this moment, as there is a motion now pending, made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES.]

Mr. SEWARD. I understand that there are several bills on the Calendar before the Senate bill. Now, these bills cannot be postponed to take up this bill.

Mr. CLINGMAN. That question does not rise now. It will be time enough to decide it when it comes up in order.

Mr. GROW. I desire to understand my rights. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will decide the question raised by the gentleman from Georgia in its proper place.

The question was taken on the motion to postpone the consideration of the bill, (H. R. No. 4;) and it was decided in the affirmative; there being, on a division—ayes 95, noes 73

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state to the House that the Calendar has not been printed. The Chair was not aware of what appropriation bills intervened between the bill which has just been laid aside and the Senate bill; but he is now informed by the Clerk that two appropriation bills—the bill making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government, and the Indian appropriation bill—are before the Senate bill.

Mr. GROW. I desire to inquire whether the postponement of the bill postponed me with it?

The CHAIRMAN. Of course it does.

On motion of Mr. J. GLANCY JONES, the two appropriation bills on the Calendar prior to the Senate bill were severally postponed.

The next bill in order for consideration was "An act (S. No. 13) to authorize the issue of Treasury notes."

Mr. GROW obtained the floor.

The bill was read in extenso.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will now be read by sections, and will be subject to amendment.

The Clerk then reported the first section of the bill, as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to cause Treasury notes for such sum or sums as the exigencies of the public service may require, but not to exceed, at any time, the amount of $20,000,000, and of denominations not less than $100 for any such note, to be prepared, signed, and issued in the manner hereinafter provided."

Mr. GROW. I move to strike out the first section of the bill.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask my colleague to give way for a moment.

Mr. GROW. I hope my colleague will not ask me to give way again. I have been postponed and laid aside once already.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It will not come out of my colleague's time. My object is merely to have a limit put to the debate. The debate on the House bill was ordered to be closed in two hours; and I desire, with the consent of my colleague to move that the committee rise, in order that the same limit may be placed upon the debate on this bill.

Mr. GROW. My colleague will not, I hope, ask me to yield further, as I desire to continue my remarks now. I think I have been very accommodating this morning, and ought now to be allowed to proceed.

Mr. Chairman, before addressing myself directly to the merits of the bill, I desire to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] who yesterday claimed that the Administration and the so-called Democratic party were not responsible for the expenditures of the Government increasing within five years from forty-six million dollars to over seventy million dollars. The gentleman's practical economy in legislation is proverbial, and I trust it will not be considered egotistic for me to say that since I have been a member of Congress, upon almost all questions affecting the expenditures of the Government, I have voted with him. He will, therefore, receive my remarks as being made in no spirit of cavil, but with an earnest and sincere desire to see a reform in this Government that shall bring back its expenditures to the economy and simplicity of its days of early virtue. That gentleman has been too long in the public service not to know that no reform in the expenditures of this Government can be effectual unless it commence in the heads of the Government. It must begin with the Departments. The gentleman claimed that the so-called Democratic party was not responsible for any appropriations for the last two years, because they were in a minority in this House. Then no party was responsible for any of those appropriations, for no party had a majority in the House of Representatives in the last Congress. The gentleman knows that a proper economy in the expenditures of the Government can only be regulated by your Departments; for they make their estimates and then ask Congress to make appropriations accordingly, and if withheld, as we did in a few cases in the last Congress, you are charged—and I think the gentleman from Virginia was one of those who echoed the charge against us—with being factionists and desiring to block the wheels of Government and inaugurate revolution.

The Departments first create the necessity for appropriations, by enlarging their forces and increasing the expenditures of the Government, and then ask Congress to appropriate the money; and if Congress fails to do it, they divert the appropriations made for other purposes to the payment of those they desire to see paid, or they come in with a deficiency bill, and you are then asked to pass it, because, if you do not, the citizen will suffer who has relied on the faith of the Government, and furnished either labor or supplies. Sir, the enormous expenditures of to-day are chargeable upon the Administration that has controlled the Government during the six years in which those expenditures have doubled. Let them commence retrenchment and reform by limiting the estimates, and then you will limit the appropriations; for, as I said before, you cannot stop these vast expenditures in the legislative department of the Government, unless you are ready to meet the charge that you are trying to inaugurate revolution, and block the wheels of the Government. We met that charge in the last Congress, when we refused to appropriate the money for some of the estimates, and because we did so, the so-called Democratic party endeavored to make the country believe, during the last presidential canvass, that we were revolutionizing, and that we desired to block the wheels of the Government by refusing to grant the appropriations asked for to carry on the Government, though we believed the appropriation wrong. And, sir, unless you have the cooperation of the heads of Departments of the Government, such would be the result in every case.

The expenses of the Army and Navy have been doubled within a few years, and so have been those of almost every department of the Government. How are you to bring the Government back to the economy of the early days of the Republic, and the simplicity that characterized its administration? The men who have charge of the public Departments know what branches of the public service can be curtailed without injury to the public service; but it is impossible that we should know all the details of the different Departments of the Government. No law can be passed that would not have a discretionary power, to some extent, in the head of a Department in its expenditures and the number of its employes, which have been gradually increased and converted by this Government into a secret police force, to stand guard at the ballot-boxes in the local elections of the country, in order to control, if possible, the action of the people. The Administration has swelled the expenses of the Government from forty-six to seventy million dollars, much of it in this way; and to-day, if a subordinate of the Government dares to exercise the right of an American freeman in one of the local and municipal elections of the country, his head falls under the guillotine, worked by the headsman in Washington. Places must be provided by the Administration for the Representatives who, upon this floor and in the other wing of the Capitol, have been discarded by their constituents because they betrayed their solemn trust in order to uphold the policy resolved on by the Administration as a party test. In this way the patronage has been greatly increased, and to it is to be attributed much of the enormous increase in the expenditures of the Government.

But, as I said before, the gentleman from Virginia will understand that I make these remarks in no spirit of cavil, but merely to show that the needed reform must begin in the Departments. They are responsible for the enormous expenditures of this Government; and they are responsible, in the most obnoxious way, by converting the Government officials into a secret police to interfere with the elections of the country. They send into the conventions of the people of the States their chosen minions from the post offices and the custom-houses to lay down their political platforms and, so far as lies in their power, to control their nominations; and then whatever official of the Government dares to oppose the nominee of the party—even though the “devil incarnate”—loses his place, and is no longer fit to discharge the duties of the office. The manly exercise of the inalienable rights of an American citizen to act on his own judgment in the local elections of the country, if against the wishes of the Administration, disqualifies him for holding any office of profit or trust under the Government of his country.

But, sir, I now turn to the consideration of this bill and its features. While it is true that a Government, in the exercise of its legitimate functions, should not attempt to shape and control the business of the country, nor to convert itself into an almshouse to distribute charity to the needy and distressed of its citizens, yet it is its duty—its first and paramount duty—so to legislate, confining itself to its proper and legitimate functions, as not to enhance any existing derangement of business in the country; but, if possible, to add to the prosperity and development of its great interests and resources.

To-day, we are asked by the Government to provide means to pay its debts. That is a legitimate object of legislation. The ordinary sources of revenue, in the present state of the business of the country, are dried up, and the Government is unable to meet its liabilities. While it is a proper, legitimate duty of the Government to raise the revenue necessary to defray its expenses, a sound statesmanship requires you to do so in the way that will least embarrass the business of the country, and will add, if possible, to the development of its great and material resources.

The question presented is, whether the Government should go into the money market and make a loan of money to pay its debts, or whether it will issue paper promises to pay when there is nothing in its vaults to redeem these promises. It is only the mode and manner of relieving the Treasury that is in controversy; for there is no man on either side of this Hall who would refuse to furnish relief to the Government and save its plighted honor by voting the necessary supplies to pay its honest debts. The manner of doing it is the only question. And to answer that question properly, it is necessary to consider the condition of the country, and how your proposed law is likely to affect it in its business relations.

What, then, is the condition of the country? In a day we have seen the most far-seeing and sagacious of our business men reduced from affluence to penury and want, and honest, willing labor wandering a famished beggar in the streets. What has produced this unprecedented convulsion of the country? for it becomes a wise legislator to inquire into the probable influence of the laws he proposes upon the business relations of life.

Mr. FENTON. I wish the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Grow] to state, if he is in possession of the information, the relative amount of the specie, and of the paper money in the country at the date of the late monetary disaster, and then I would inquire whether, in his judgment, the banks are directly responsible for the late financial revulsion that has come upon us; or whether other causes, growing out of the speculative spirit of the times, not immediately marked by the facilities afforded by the banks in obtaining money, have aided to swell and hasten this commercial and financial crisis?

Mr. GROW. I will answer the question of the gentleman from New York, though I may not be able to furnish conclusive or very satisfactory proof of the real cause of the present financial revulsion. Many things may have combined to produce it, and it might be difficult to specify any one thing as its cause. Without stopping to inquire, except so far as is necessary to notice the question propounded by the gentleman from New York, whether it was caused by a redundant paper currency, or is the result of the financial policy pursued by this Government for a few years, or what influence either or both of these causes have had in producing it, it is in my judgment to be attributed more to an expanded credit than any other one thing. What influence the financial policy of the country for the last few years has had in producing that expansion, I do not propose here to inquire; but will merely say that, in my judgment, the changes made in the tariff policy of the country during the last Congress, forced upon the House of Representatives by the Senate, were injudicious, and calculated to stimulate this overgrown and expanded credit, and add largely to our foreign indebtedness, which has augmented the evil of the day.

The present crisis is likened to that of 1837, when there is no similarity in the apparent causes that have produced them. In 1837 there was an expanded paper currency, with a very insufficient metallic basis. The banks had a circulation of $150,000,000, while they had in their vaults but $50,000,000 in specie, and outside the banks, there was but $30,000,000 in the hands of the people. There was in the country at that time, according to the most reliable statistics, but $80,000,000 in specie, so that the bank issue was in excess of the whole specie of the country, $70,000,000. When the crash came, therefore, there was no circulating medium. Gold and silver could not take the place of paper money, for there was not sufficient of it.

The Government then issued Treasury drafts, because paper was the only thing that could be substituted to fill up the void.

That state of things does not exist to-day, and this brings me directly to the inquiry of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FENTON.] Whether an excessive paper currency was the cause of this expanded credit will be determined by the statistics of the banks. In 1837 there was a necessity for some circulating medium, there not being metallic currency enough for the business of the country. Its whole amount then was about eighty million dollars, while now there are over three hundred millions. The coinage of the Mint, from the formation of the Government down to the 30th of September, 1856, amounts to $549,000,000. The imports of coin into the country since 1820, (for previous to that time there were no separate statements kept by the custom-house,) amount to $293,000,000; which makes an aggregate of $842,000,000. That does not include the amount of specie brought into the country by immigrants, who seek homes on our shores. Deduct from this $842,000,000 the entire exports of coin from the country since 1820—$436,000,000—and it leaves somewhere in the country $406,000,000. The circulation of the banks in September last was about one hundred and eighty-seven millions, while they had in their vaults in specie $60,000,000. Take the amount of specie in the banks from the whole amount in the country, and it will be found that in September last there was, in the country, in the hands of the people, not far from $200,000,000 in specie. The bank issue in September last, by these figures, was over one hundred million dollars less than the metallic currency of the country, after allowing a dollar of specie for every dollar of paper. In 1837 the paper circulation was $70,000,000 in excess of the coin in the country. To-day the coin is $100,000,000 in excess of the paper.

Why, then, this revulsion? It certainly has not resulted from an excessive expansion and contraction of bank issues, as in 1837; for the bank issues for the last four years have been quite uniform: in 1854, $182,030,141; in 1855, $163,522,705; in 1856, $170,968,903; and in 1857, $187,000,000. During this period the banks have had in their vaults about sixty million dollars, while there have been over two hundred million dollars in the hands of the people. The first failure, however, in the beginning of this crisis, created a panic, by reason of the expanded credit of the country, which ended in almost entire want of confidence in moneyed circles. Hence, the specie in general circulation was hoarded, and the banks compelled to refuse further discounts, and finally to suspend specie payments.

Under such circumstances, what is the duty of a wise Legislature? Is it to send forth an irredeemable paper currency, to augment the pressing evils of the times? What is the duty of a wise legislator in the present condition of the business of the country? Is it to adopt such legislation as will tend to keep out of circulation a metallic currency, by substituting a paper currency in its place which has no metallic basis, and for which there is no provision for its redemption in gold? Will not the paper currency which is proposed by this bill tend to keep from circulation the hoarded specie of the country? No man even on the other side of the House will deny that the tendency of paper, in any form, as a currency, is to exclude specie from circulation. The worst currency always circulates. If a man has two bank notes, one at ten per cent. discount, and the other at two per cent., he will, as a matter of course, pay out the one at ten per cent. first; and retain in his possession the one of the most value. So, if you bring the paper currency provided for in this bill into circulation, you will keep out of circulation a like amount of hard money, because that is the best and safest currency.

While the paper currency is sent abroad to furnish the means on which the business of the country is to be transacted, the specie will continue to be locked up in vaults and chests, and withdrawn from circulation. You issue these Treasury notes, as provided by the bill, and they can be immediately converted into a currency that will pass from hand to hand. All that would be needed is an indorsement in blank. It would go out representing the credit of the Government, the same as a bank note represents the credit of the bank.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1857.

NEW SERIES...No. 10.

There is neither gold or silver in the Treasury, nor have you provided one dollar for the redemption of these notes.

Mr. HUGHES. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to one point. I wish to ask him whether the stocks which he is in favor of issuing have not coupons attached to them, which may go into circulation as a currency?

Mr. GROW. I have not examined this bill as it came from the Senate; and I know not what provisions it may have on that point. I can only say, therefore, to the gentleman that I have never known of the coupons attached to bonds going into circulation as a currency. I do not think they would ever enter into circulation. But, sir, when one of these notes has an indorsement upon its back, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] yesterday remarked, it is upon its legs and it may go forth to the country to return whenever it pleases. But by this bill you cannot force it to come at any time. But, sir, authorize a loan and you draw specie forth from the vaults and hoarded closets, and put it into circulation.

This crash has come upon the business interest not because the country is bankrupt. The country was never richer than at the present moment. It is true the country owes $400,000,000 abroad, for the building of railroads, but the railroads are constructed, and form part of the real wealth of the country. In nine cases out of ten, where failures or suspensions have occurred, it has not been in consequence of want of means, for it has been shown that their assets far exceeded their liabilities.

How can the Government assist in bringing back the business of the country to its ordinary course? It cannot be done by legislation, I admit. But when you are providing for raising the revenue with which to pay your debts, if you can aid in accomplishing that result, it is your duty to do it. It is the duty of the Government, under the circumstances, to take such steps, so far as may be in its power, as shall draw out of its hiding places some part of the $100,000,000 which is thus withdrawn from circulation. The Government has but to advertise for a loan, to obtain in three days all it wants. Wall street is as full of specie as it ever was. You then secure to the circulation the amount borrowed, and thus aid in relieving the business of the country. Expansion of currency tends to increase prices of property. But, for the last six years there has been an expansion of our currency by the working of the mines of California, by which $200,000,000 have been added to the coin of our country. That of itself would have enhanced the price.

[The committee here informally rose and received a message from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed the joint resolution of the House, amending an act entitled "An act to regulate the compensation of members of Congress, approved August 16, 1856." The committee again resumed its session.]

Mr. GROW. I shall trespass but a short time longer on the patience of the committee. I have thrown out the suggestions I desired to make upon this bill, to shadow the reasons which will control my action on the final vote of the House upon the bill.

In my judgment, it is an unwise policy for this Government to pursue in any case, to issue paper promises to pay, when, by the statistics of the country, you have an abundance of hard money, which only needs to be drawn into circulation for the business purposes of the country. Let not the Government, then, add to the ills of the country by adding what represses the circulation of coin. The Government should, when the wants of the country demand a loan, borrow from those who have hoarded up the coin, and infuse it into the veins and arteries of the business of the country. The life-blood of trade is a currency resting upon a metallic basis, convertible, at all times, into specie.

I propose, in the proper place, to offer the following amendment:

That the President of the United States be authorized to borrow, on the credit of the United States, not to exceed $10,000,000, in such sum or sums as the exigencies of the public service may require, and issue therefor the stock of the United States, bearing interest at such rate as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, subject to the approval of the President, but not to exceed six per cent. per annum, for the sum so borrowed, redeemable within one year from the date of issue: Provided, That no stock shall be issued at a less rate than its par value: Provided, also, That the authority herein granted shall expire on 30th of June, A. D. 1859.

I propose to limit the amount to $10,000,000, instead of $20,000,000; and that the Government shall borrow the money instead of issuing Treasury notes. For I think the Secretary of the Treasury has fallen into an error in proposing to throw out these Treasury notes, and I have limited the amount to $10,000,000, because the Secretary of the Treasury says that he does not know that $20,000,000 will be needed. He says:

"Though the amount of $20,000,000 will not, in all probability, be needed at an early day, if at all, yet it is deemed best that the Department be authorized to issue and keep out that sum."

I am opposed to putting out any of this paper. It is to keep it in, that I ask that it be borrowed. This scheme seems to provide what the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BISHOP] claimed the other day to be the effect of these notes—the supply of a currency, the issuing of paper to be used as such. Pay your debts, like an honest man in the business transactions of life. You go to your debtor, and ask him to pay $100. He says, "No, I cannot do it." "Have you not the means to pay?" "Yes, I have property enough to pay, but I have no money. I will give you my note, payable a year hence, with such interest as I choose to fix." Would you not consider that a dishonest transaction? Your debtor having the ability to borrow, it is his business to go into the market and borrow to pay you. It would be dishonest thus to pass off paper, while he could borrow and pay. Equally open to objection, in my opinion, is the system proposed by the Administration, while at the same time they inflict a great wrong upon the business transactions of the country by adding to its paper circulation.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, obtained the floor.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to yield me the floor, that I may submit a motion that the committee rise, with a view to move, in the House, to limit the debate.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I yield, if I do not lose the floor thereby.

Mr. ADRAIN. I believe that I am entitled to the floor.

The CHAIR. The Chair did recognize the gentleman from New Jersey a short time since; but it was while the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] was upon the floor. The Chair subsequently recognized the gentleman from Virginia, and he is entitled to the floor.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. As the gentleman has yielded to me, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose, and Mr. PHELPS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly Senate bill (No. 13) to authorize the issue of Treasury notes, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move the usual resolution to close debate upon Senate bill (No. 13) within one hour after the committee shall again resume the consideration of the same.

Several VOICES. Say two hours.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I will make it two hours.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I move to amend by substituting one hour:

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

Mr. CLINGMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. There seems to be some misunderstanding in reference to the agreement of the House, this morning, as regards limiting speeches to twenty minutes. The question is, whether that agreement is applicable to this bill?

The SPEAKER. The understanding of the Chair is that the consent of the House, to which the gentleman refers, was given to House bill No. 4.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to extend that arrangement to this bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I object.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Then I move that all debate be limited to twenty minutes in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain the motion.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the unanimous consent of the House then.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I object.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Cannot the gentleman move to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. Not to-day.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that speeches on Senate bill No. 13, in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, shall be limited to twenty minutes.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I object, sir.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move, then, that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PHELPS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of Senate bill (No. 13) to authorize the issue of Treasury notes.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I will say to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ADRAIN,] that I shall not occupy more than thirty minutes.

Mr. ADRAIN. I ask the gentleman to yield me the floor for twenty minutes.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I will give the gentleman a portion of my time, if I do not lose the floor by so doing.

Mr. STANTON. I object to any farming out of the floor in that manner.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I will not occupy more than twenty minutes, so that the gentleman from New Jersey will have an extra chance of getting the floor.

Mr. ADRAIN. I certainly understood that I was recognized by the Chair, and entitled to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from New Jersey at a time when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] had not concluded his remarks; and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] was recognized at the close of the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ADRAIN. I had a conversation with the gentleman from Virginia, and he agreed that if I would occupy only a few minutes, he would yield me the floor.

Mr. KEITT. Certainly; but the House objects to that arrangement.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The gentleman will have a chance after I have concluded.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to the gentleman from New Jersey proceeding now? Several MEMBERS objected.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. It would have afforded me sincere pleasure to yield to the gentleman from New Jersey; but, under the circumstances, objection being made, I trust he will not consider me as wanting in courtesy, as it is not in my power to oblige him.

I desire, Mr. Chairman, to submit very briefly my views upon this subject, and, in passing, to pay my respects to gentlemen on the other side of the House who have spoken on this subject. I confess my surprise—my very great surprise—at the course of remark in which those gentlemen, without one exception, have indulged, and, of course, as I propose to confine myself to a very brief period, I shall have to make a rapid reference to what has fallen from them.

If I understand the condition of the country, and the necessity for this measure, it is founded upon this state of things: At former sessions, heavy appropriations have been ordered by Congress, and the public charges and expenditures have been increased, and now we find ourselves short of means to meet the engagements thus created and authorized by the action of Congress. Well, sir, in this state of things, with outstanding liabilities—liabilities imposed on the country by the last Congress—I say the last Congress, and have no reference to either branch of it in particular—the question is whether ways and means shall be provided for the purpose of meeting those liabilities. That is really the state of the question, and I must express my surprise that gentlemen should get up here, and talk censoriously about the condition of this or that branch of the public service. Will the House provide means to meet the engagements of the Government? That is the question. Will they place reasonable confidence in those familiar with these subjects? That is the question. Will they afford the facilities requisite to meet those engagements? That is the question. Gentlemen seem to manifest some reluctance to do this; and we have witnessed most remarkable displays from gentlemen who I should not have expected would have undertaken to enlighten us upon this question. What is the proposition, sir? I shall read from the bill sufficient to present the real issue to the committee. The second section is as follows:

"SEC. 2. And he it further enacted, That such Treasury notes shall be paid and redeemed by the United States, at the Treasury thereof, after the expiration of one year from the dates of said notes, from which dates, until they shall be respectively paid and redeemed, they shall bear such rate of interest as shall be expressed in said notes, which rate of interest upon the first issue, which shall not exceed $6,000,000 of such notes, shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President, but shall in no case exceed the rate of six per centum per annum. The residue shall be raised, in whole or in part, after public advertisement of not less than thirty days, as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct, by exchanging them at their par value for specie to the bidder or bidders who shall agree to make such exchange at the lowest rate of interest, not exceeding six per centum, upon the said notes: Provided, That after the maturity of any of said notes, interest thereon shall cease at the expiration of sixty days' notice of readiness to pay and redeem the same, which may at any time or times be given by the Secretary of the Treasury, in one or more newspapers published at the seat of Government," &c.

Here then, sir, is a distinct proposition to borrow money from the country. Here is a distinct proposition to invite, by advertisement, bidders for these Government obligations, payable in a year.

Now, sir, I ask whether or not the amount is unreasonable? Who has undertaken to show that the amount is unreasonable?—I put the question to the committee—who, of all the gentlemen who have participated in this debate, has undertaken to demonstrate to the House that the amount sought by the Secretary of the Treasury is not reasonable, and not requisite to meet the public engagements? Sir, if there be one, I have not heard him. The Secretary of the Treasury, an enlightened officer, anxious, of course, in reference to his own public character, submits his estimates, and proves clearly, by those estimates, the necessity of this provision. Shall that provision be allowed?

But that is not all. These Treasury notes must be paid within one year. They terminate, ex rei termini, on the 1st of January, 1859. They can go no further. There is no power to issue them beyond that period. And why, sir, is that provision made? I suppose, sir, that the Government of the United States is entitled, as individuals are, to look to their resources, and to the opportunities that may exist in reference to their engagements. If an individual, in an unexpected embarrassment, finds it necessary to resort to a loan for the purpose of meeting his engagements, he will contemplate his resources, and shape his new liabilities with reference to them. The officer presiding over this particular department of the Government believes that the resources of his country will enable him to meet these engagements within the period specified. I ask every gentleman upon this floor if it would be good sense for us to make a loan, as proposed by several gentlemen, and especially by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GROW,] for a period of five, ten, or fifteen years, when a loan for a single year will be sufficient?

Mr. GROW. My proposition is for a loan, merely for one year, and not for any longer period.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Now, sir, the gentleman gets by this bill just what he proposes. We propose to borrow for a year. The only difference that I know of between the gentleman and ourselves is, that he proposes to do it in one form, and we in another. What objection is there to the form proposed in the bill? These notes are to be issued only when necessary. It is believed that $6,000,000 will meet the present exigency, and it is provided by the bill that no more shall be issued at present.

The gentleman says it is thought that the whole amount may not be necessary for some time yet. Would the gentleman make a loan of $20,000,000 or of $10,000,000 in a lump, at the present moment, when the Government may not need it for some time to come? The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, by the section to which I refer, to issue a thirty days' notice inviting bids for the requisite amount. Is it not, then, a matter of practical good sense and economy to permit this thing to be left to the Secretary in this shape, rather than in the manner proposed by the gentleman? But is it not a distinction without a difference? Is there any substantial difference between the two propositions? I must insist that there is not; with the advantage that this proposition is infinitely preferable to his suggestion.

But, sir, that is not all. Far from it. The gentleman insists on it at one breath that this is to be used as paper money, and then he goes into a hard-money argument to demonstrate that the Treasury notes will supersede so much specie; that the worse will exclude the better currency. I know that principle well; and I am happy to hear the doctrine recognized in certain quarters where I did not expect it. It is one of the cherished relics of the past political history of the honorable member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GROW.] He was once a Democrat; but now, the so-called Democratic party, as he terms it, with which he once affiliated and acted, but with which he affiliates and acts no longer, has lost its character; and so he left it, and carried off the Democratic sentiment and principle. He but illustrates the old adage that a renegade Christian is worse than ten Turks. I suppose that no man in this House is so inveterate against Democratic principles and against the Democratic party, as is this gentleman, who was once a brother in full fellowship in the church.

Mr. GROW. I ask the gentleman whether he considers the views that I have advanced in relation to the currency as not being Democratic?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I congratulated the gentleman that there was one single remnant of his past political creed left with him.

Mr. GROW. I believe that, in the sentiment of the gentleman, I will be considered as a sound, reliable Democrat, excepting as to the question who shall occupy the Territories of the Union—whether white men or black; and that as to that I am not sound.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I judge the gentleman by the company he keeps. I judge a man's Democracy by his associations. I judge him as hostile to Democracy when I see him doing the work of those who are esteemed as hostile to Democratic rule and Democratic ascendancy. What is the object of the gentleman's labors? It is to break down the Democratic party and the principles they cherish, and which they struggle to maintain in fair weather and in foul.

The gentleman gets up and talks about his Democracy, with the single exception of the Territories. He is a thorough Democrat except as to that. He is not Democratic enough to allow the American people to go to any portion of the American territory at their will and pleasure. I was much struck with the fact that the gentleman, in this as in the past Congress, finds himself utterly unable to deliver a speech on this floor without "still harping on my daughter." It is Kansas, Kansas, Kansas. That fertile and exciting subject dances through all the mazes of metaphorical confusion in the imagination of the gentleman; and I suppose that, when he sinks into the grave, (and I trust he will be spared a thousand years,) the cry will be still "Kansas!"

I confess, Mr. Chairman, that I was greatly surprised by the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RITCHIE,] who first addressed the committee, and by the course of remarks in which he indulged. I know that gentleman well. I have had the honor of acting with him, and of having with him those relations on committees that have taught me to appreciate highly his character. I have been inclined to think him a statesman; and I must be permitted to say that I was sorry to see that he, acting in regard to the great interests of the country, should not have forgotten that he was a partisan. On this proposition to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, that gentleman commenced on the subject of Democracy, and undertook to demonstrate that there were hard-money and rag-paper Democrats on the floor.

Mr. RITCHIE. Mr. Chairman, the remarks that I then made were for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee and of the country to the fact that the President of the United States, in his message, intimated no desire to have an issue of Treasury notes. On the contrary, the whole drift of the message is the other way. He spoke, to be sure, of the possibility of a small loan before the close of the session. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury, sent in here on the same day and at the same hour, demands an issue of Treasury notes instantly, to the amount of $20,000,000. I desired to call the attention of the committee and of the country to that fact—to that palpable contradiction between the message of the President and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, sent here at the same moment, both of them differing in principle and differing in fact: the President of the United States basing his remarks on the fact that we did not want a loan, and the Secretary of the Treasury basing his on the fact that we did want a loan—

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to this interruption. We have but an hour to debate this bill, and we want to hear its merits discussed.

Mr. RITCHIE. If the gentleman from Alabama calls me to order, I call him to order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have not been able to hear the remark of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RITCHIE. I say that I was not out of order, but that the gentleman is out of order; he interrupts me when I am making an explanation by the indulgence of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, if that is all you said, it amounts to nothing.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The gentleman says nothing more now than he said before. I know what he desired to state. It was a hit at the Democratic party, and a purpose to show that there was a hard-money and a rag-money Democracy on this floor.

Mr. RITCHIE. And I want to know from the gentleman from Virginia whether he will not admit that it was a fair hit?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. No, sir. I say it was a hit that I had not expected from the statesman of Pennsylvania who made it. I was not surprised at much that fell from members on this floor in the debate that went on, but I was surprised that such a thing should come from that gentleman, of whom the country had a right to expect better things.

Mr. Chairman, is there any inconsistency between the President of the United States and his Secretary of the Treasury? No, sir, not the slightest. The President went into the causes that produced this drying-up of the resources of the country, and the sudden arrest of the income of the Government; and he traced it rightfully—I maintain in the face of the country—to the existence of fourteen hundred banks, all manufacturing paper money, with which the people have been stimulated into wild extravagance. The President recommended a return to the good times, contemplated by those who framed the Federal Constitution. In that state of things, with these sentiments, with that recommendation—which I trust in God will be carried out—the Secretary of the Treasury, to provide present means, comes forward and recommends the issue of notes bearing interest. Is that the character of bank paper? No, sir. Nor is that all. When these notes have been paid in, the debt which they represent is bound to be extinguished. When a note for one hundred dollars or five hundred dollars is paid into the Land Office for the purchase of a tract of land in the public domain, the receiver indorses its receipt upon its back, and it is bound to be extinguished and cannot go into circulation again. Is that a characteristic of bank paper? Is that an element of rascality?

And yet the gentleman talks about two classes of Democracy into which this House is divided. But, sir, the gentleman did not apprehend into how many divisions the House is separated. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] gravely speaks of the Democracy on that side of the House. I would like very much to know what Democracy that is.

Mr. BANKS. The Democracy of the Constitution, sir.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Exactly. The Democracy which thinks it is right to "let the Union slide," I suppose. [Laughter.] That Democracy which seeks the safety of the white and black races in the "principle of absorption." If that is Democracy, I loathe it from my very soul. That is a Democracy of which I know nothing. But may be the gentleman cleaves to some of the lessons of wisdom which were taught him when he was in the bosom of the great Democratic party. We can, however, only refer to the history of the country to ascertain the characteristics of this pretended Democracy.

Now, sir, this proposition is necessary to supply the immediate wants of the Government, to meet existing emergencies. It is requisite to have $6,000,000. Nobody is bound to receive these Treasury notes except at par—except as gold and silver.

But the gentleman from Maine [Mr. ABBOTT] over the way, who, though fresh in this Hall, sets up for a teacher, gravely undertakes to lecture the Democracy on the subject of retrenchment, for something that has taken place in the little town where he lives, away down east, where it is so cold that they have to cut a hole through the ice to allow the sun to rise. [Laughter.] He says, that there has been great extravagance there, and expects that we are to recover the means for meeting the present crisis by retrenchment in that little town of his. Does not the gentleman know that these reforms cannot be effected at once? Does he not know that the relief now asked for is to meet an exigency which now exists, and that any measure of retrenchment which might be inaugurated could not accomplish its desired effect before the Treasury notes, which it is proposed to issue, were needed? Yet, sir, the gentleman gets up here and gravely tells us that he wants us to retrench to the amount of $20,000,000. I rejoice from my very heart that we are getting new recruits. I do not care for the gentleman's change of position. I rejoice that we have new recruits in the great work of retrenchment. I will go with him who goes furthest in that work. I will go for cutting down the sinecure offices in the gentleman's town and elsewhere; and I shall hold the gentleman to his obligation. I will test his sincerity in his desire to carry out these works of retrenchment.

But that is not all. Without dwelling longer upon these subjects, because I am anxious to conclude my remarks, and give others an opportunity, I beg leave for a moment to refer to a remark made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOVEJOY.] That gentleman got up here, and, from his manner, gave us assurance that the House was about to be enlightened. But the gentleman had not gone far before we were satisfied that a "second Daniel had come to judgment." He went on to tell the House and the country what reforms he would make. He would strike down our whole diplomatic staff at "one fell swoop." He then went on to present his views to the House, and said that he would allow us to retain a representative in one foreign court. I expected to hear him announce that the only representative which this country should be permitted to maintain abroad should be at the great imperial Government of Hayti or St. Domingo. I expected to hear him proclaim, in this assembly, that that was the only foreign nation where we should be permitted to retain a vestige of representation. But to my surprise the gentleman told us that we occupied so intimate relations with Great Britain, with the mother country, that we should maintain a representative there.

Mr. Chairman, I will not dwell upon this subject, but I submit to the gentleman from Illinois that he has no right, as a Representative here—as one seeking to perform his duties in that spirit of justice and charity which covers a multitude of sins—ay, sir, covers a multitude of sins—to present his surmises and insinuations against a public officer, for no cause known whatsoever. He has no right to expect this House to follow such suggestions as these, founded in suspicion and surmises, when we have the official records of the conduct of these officers before us.

I had intended to have made more extended remark upon this subject, but I do not deem it necessary, and I cannot do it in courtesy to those around me who desire to address the committee upon this bill. I shall therefore close, by calling the attention of the committee to a single view which I shall present; and what is that view? It is to ask gentlemen to come up here in the spirit of that Constitution which I reverence, whether the gentleman from Illinois does or not; and, although the gentleman from Illinois yesterday invoked it in a solemn manner, and called upon us to rally under its broad folds, yet I have heard that that gentleman regarded it only as a rotten rag, which ought to be trampled under foot.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I thought the gentleman was just now saying that I ought not to insinuate anything against a public officer. Ought the gentleman to insinuate against members of this House because of what he has heard?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. From what I have heard? Certainly; how else can we know facts but from what we hear?

Mr. LOVEJOY. How else can I know that the Government has been corrupted, except from what I hear?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Oh! that has nothing to do with the question. Did the gentleman ever say that the Constitution was as worthless as a rotten rag, which ought to be trampled under foot?

Mr. LOVEJOY. No, sir.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Or anything like it?

Mr. LOVEJOY. Nor anything like it.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Then I acknowledge that I have done the gentleman wrong. I am here to make no unjust aspersions. I am glad to hear that the gentleman is sitting here under our glorious flag, now floating over the Capitol, and is prepared to stand by the Constitution in its true and genuine spirit. I am glad of it from my very soul; and if the gentleman will only continue to do that, there will be less of that distraction which now exists, and which has existed heretofore.

What, then, is the question? We propose to issue these bills for $20,000,000 for the purpose of raising money; and although the minimum amount is too small, in my judgment; and although I shall move, at the proper time, to increase the minimum from $100 to $500, yet it is a loan rendered necessary by the exigencies of the country, and only intended to relieve its distresses. What brought these exigencies upon the country? Not the executive branch of the Government, certainly. It is the duty of that branch of the Government to submit annual estimates of those sums requisite for the support of the Government, and they are responsible for those estimates, and they are responsible no further. When those estimates are overruled and disregarded, and appropriations are made exceeding them, Congress takes the responsibility. And even the estimates of the Departments are frequently submitted upon a call of those who make these appropriations. Congress makes appropriations to commence works which are abhorrent to the sense of the Executive, and they become law by riding over the veto. They are works of policy, and not of the Constitution. Subsequent officials are bound, after the commencement of such works, to submit estimates for their completion; and these estimates made by the executive branch are in no measure to be regarded as measures recommended by them, for it is only carrying out existing laws—laws which they have disapproved, or even vetoed, as was the case in the instances referred to by my colleague, [Mr. LETCHER.]

I have said nothing in reference to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] and the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS.] I should like to do it, but it is unnecessary. My colleague [Mr. LETCHER] caught the wily gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL]—I say it in no spirit of disparagement; but he caught that gentleman, yesterday, upon that very question, and held him to it notwithstanding his writhings and efforts.

I have made these remarks in no spirit of unkindness. We want this money, and this bill is framed in the best manner to raise it.

Mr. ADRAIN. I propose to say but a few words upon the bill now under consideration. This bill has given rise to a wide range of discussion. Almost every question has been dragged in—the bank, the tariff, the Pacific railroad, Utah with her Mormons, and almost every conceivable subject, which I apprehend has very little to do with the merits of the bill under consideration. I have been accustomed to discuss points in legal tribunals; and when I came here and discovered the wide range of debate, it struck me that gentlemen try to get as wide apart from the real question before the House as possible, and that it was not expected that gentlemen would speak to the question, but rather upon any other question upon which they can speak most easily and most agreeably to themselves.

I shall not follow that range of debate, but confine myself, if possible, to the merits of this bill. It is a bill, sir, that is demanded by the exigencies of the Government, and the President of the United States intimates that it will be necessary for Congress to provide the necessary means to carry on the operations of the Government. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his report, intimates the same views; and, in fact, he recommends that a bill should be passed for the issuing of Treasury notes to the amount of $20,000,000; and in the letter which he has sent to this House, he reiterates the same thing, and says it is necessary that a bill for that purpose should be passed, and passed at once. And it is for this House to determine, and to determine to-day, whether we will meet the difficulties of the Government, or whether we will permit the credit or efficiency of the Government to be destroyed.

The first consideration is in regard to the necessity of this measure. Can any gentleman deny it? Can any gentleman, who looks into the real facts of the case, dispute that such a bill as this is necessary, either in the shape of a loan, or in the issue of Treasury notes? I was very happy to hear the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] who addressed the House yesterday, admit that such a bill is necessary, and that he is perfectly willing to vote for it, if it can be made to concur with his views. There is no need, therefore, in wasting time in this committee in discussing the question whether there is a necessity to pass this bill to supply the Government with the necessary means of carrying on its operation.

Now, sir, what are the objections to this bill? It is objected that the sum is too large; that $20,000,000 are unnecessary to be raised. The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] moved to reduce the sum to $10,000,000. Who is the better able to judge of the real necessities of the Government, the gentleman from Pennsylvania or the Secretary of the Treasury? I am willing to defer to the judgment of the Secretary rather than to any gentleman who occupies a seat upon this floor. The Secretary asks us that $20,000,000 of Treasury notes be issued, as the exigencies of the Government require. It is proposed to give authority to the Secretary to issue them at once; but he proposes, when that power is given him, only to issue such an amount of notes as may be absolutely needed. In his letter he says it may be necessary that the whole amount, $20,000,000, should be issued, but he wishes sufficient placed in his hands, so that if the exigency requires it, he may have the whole amount for the purpose of carrying on the operations of the Government.

Another objection raised to the House bill was that there was no time limited as to the issue of these Treasury notes; and an amendment was offered to the House bill by the gentleman from Massachusetts to limit the time. It was a proper amendment; and although I have confidence in the Secretary of the Treasury and the President, we ought not to confer upon any man unlimited power, where it is not necessary; and it is not necessary in this case, because, after January, 1859, if it is necessary to continue the issue, Congress will be in session, and they can authorize it to be done.

Again, it is objected to this bill that it would be preferable to make a loan than to issue Treasury notes. That was another suggestion thrown out by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.]

Mr. BANKS. The gentleman from New Jersey will allow me to correct him in the statement which he makes. My amendment only proposes that the President shall have authority to make a loan, if he thinks proper, and just to the extent that he thinks proper; and, at the same time, that he shall have authority to issue Treasury notes just to the extent that he shall think proper within $20,000,000. It proposes to give the President authority to do either, as did the bill of 1847.

Mr. ADRAIN. I understood the gentleman perfectly, and I believe that I was stating just precisely what he has now stated, that he proposes to give authority to the President of the United States to make a loan or to issue Treasury notes, and I have no objection to that.

Mr. BANKS. That is all I ask.

Mr. ADRAIN. The gentleman misunderstands me. I have no objection to leaving it optional with the President, either to make a loan or to issue Treasury notes, and I am very glad that the gentleman from Massachusetts has as much confidence in the President as I have. It is a very happy admission, and I trust, that as long as he occupies a seat upon this floor—and I am sorry that his service here will be shortly terminated—he will continue to repose the same confidence in the President of the United States as he exhibits in relation to this bill.

But, Mr. Chairman, although it is proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts to leave it discretionary with the President either to make a loan or to issue Treasury notes, yet I apprehend that the President, although he speaks in his message of a loan, intends that it shall be in the nature of Treasury notes; and as a bill to authorize the issue of such notes has been introduced here by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, I presume it has been done with the approbation of the President.

Now, it is said that a loan would be preferred to the issue of Treasury notes. Mr. Chairman, is a loan necessary? Would it be wise for this Government to go into the market and make a loan for ten or twenty millions of dollars, when perhaps it may not actually be needed? There is no certainty that the issue of these Treasury notes to the full amount will be needed. Is it not, therefore, better, as the Secretary of the Treasury suggests in his letter, that this bill should pass as it is—a mere temporary measure to meet a temporary deficiency in the Treasury?

Mr. GROW. The gentleman is mistaken in one point, and I wish to correct him. The amendment which I had read proposes that the loan shall be made only as the exigencies of the Government require.

Mr. ADRAIN. I certainly do not suppose that the loan would be made unless it was necessary to meet the wants of the Government. Nobody, of course, proposes that. But I say it is wiser to have these Treasury notes issued than for the Government to go into the market and make a loan for a certain number of years, when, perhaps, the money loaned may not really be necessary to carry on the operations of the Government. This is a mere temporary measure, as I said before, to meet a temporary deficiency in the national Treasury.

But, Mr. Chairman, do not let us confound ideas about what constitutes a loan. I apprehend that these Treasury notes are a loan. They are, in fact, as much a loan of money to the Government as if the Government were to borrow from individuals, ten or twenty millions of dollars, and issue stock for that amount. Suppose, for instance, that the Government owes an individual $1,000. It has not gold and silver on hand to pay that $1,000, and, instead of gold and silver, gives to that individual Treasury notes to that amount. Now, if that individual chooses to take these Treasury notes, and leave that amount of gold and silver with the Government, is it not loaning so much to the Government? Is it not really, and in fact, a bona fide loan, just as if the Government actually borrowed $1,000 from the individual? I cannot, therefore, see how gentlemen can object to the issue of Treasury notes on the ground that it is not a loan.

But, sir, the chief objection that has been raised by gentlemen upon the other side is, that if these Treasury notes are allowed to issue they will add to the paper currency of the country. It may be that they will do so. Now, sir, I am in favor of having as much gold and silver in the country as possible. I desire that the banking institutions of the country shall have a sufficient supply of the precious metals, to prevent them from producing these suspensions that are continually occurring to the injury of the business of the country. Perhaps these notes will circulate as a medium, and if there is a small interest attached to them, I have no doubt they will circulate as a medium of exchange. But why should gentlemen object to that? It will be a relief to the business community, and also to the banking institutions of the land. It is proposed by the bill that these notes shall be received in payment of duties due to the Government, and hence gold and silver will not be called for to pay the duties of the Government, but these Treasury notes will be received, and, therefore, it will benefit the business community, and the banking institutions of the country.

Gentlemen upon the other side must not suppose that the Democratic party is opposed to banking institutions. It is not true. They are only opposed to those institutions when they do not confine themselves to the legitimate objects of banking. One would suppose, from the speeches which have been made upon this floor, that the President of the United States had made a violent and denunciatory attack upon the banking institutions of the country. Has he done it? Is there a line in his message showing that he is unfavorable to those institutions? No, sir; but, on the contrary, he expressly declares that they are so interwoven with the business of the country, and that business men are so dependent upon them that it would be unwise and impolitic to do anything to strike down these institutions. It is true, sir, that the President of the United States comes out most emphatically against the establishment of a United States Bank. We are opposed to such an institution as that, and are opposed to it upon good and substantial grounds. Such an institution has existed before in this country; it was put down by that great and glorious man who then stood at the helm of this Government—Andrew Jackson; and I am glad to see that the present President is following in the footsteps of that great and illustrious man, and that we shall not have that noxious institution making the people and the Government the slaves of its imperious will.

It has been said, Mr. Chairman, that, instead of passing this bill, we should diminish the expenses of the country. I fully concur in the remarks which have been made by gentlemen upon the other side of the House upon the subject of retrenchment in the expenditures of the Government. Let the greatest economy be exercised. The President of the United States, in his message, says that economy will be observed, so far as he is concerned, in all the branches of the Government; he inculcates economy upon both Houses of Congress, and he tells us he is determined that all public works shall be suspended which are not absolutely necessary to be carried on for the public interests and the public defense. We find, Mr. Chairman, that a committee has been appointed by this House, for the purpose of inquiring into the printing, and engraving, and other matters pertaining to the subject, for the purpose of saving expense to the Government; and I was very happy to learn this morning from the gentleman who is chairman of the Committee of Elections that that committee does not intend to employ a clerk. I hope that other committees which have been authorized to employ clerks will not employ them, if they can possibly transact the business themselves. I voted against the resolution to authorize the employment of clerks. I hardly think it necessary in all cases; it may be in some; but wherever it can be dispensed with it ought to be, for the purpose of saving money to the Government.

Some allusion has been made, Mr. Chairman, to the appropriations of the last Congress. I was not here, and know very little about them, except what I saw in the reports of the proceedings. I care not who is to blame for the appropriations; I care not whether the Democratic party, or the Know-Nothing party, or the Republican party, is to blame for it. It is wholly immaterial to the question before the House. Suppose there has been the greatest extravagance; suppose appropriations have been made that ought not to have been made, and for objects that were unwise and uncalled for; is that any reason why we should not supply the Government with the necessary means to carry on its operations?

Mr. Chairman, I said when I rose that I only intended to occupy the time of the committee with a few remarks, and therefore I will bring them to a close. But I cannot sit down without expressing my trust that gentlemen on this floor will not raise captious objections to the passage of this bill, but that they will come up magnanimously and patriotically to its support. It may be that, on some great political question, we may differ and not yield; but on a question of finance, such as is here presented before the House—a question which is to save the credit of the Government—will gentlemen stand out, and place themselves on mere party ground? Is it not better for them to come up and support a bill of this character?

I regretted very much to hear the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOVEJOY,] who addressed the committee yesterday, say that he would rather his right arm should wither than vote for this bill to carry on the operations of the Government and to sustain its credit. It was a remark which he ought not to have made.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I beg leave to correct the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I made no such remark. I said that I would sooner my right hand should wither, and my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, than vote the Government money to force an infamous despotism—the Lecompton constitution—on the people of Kansas.

Mr. ADRAIN. That was the remark? That was worse than the other.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Very well; I stick to that.

Mr. ADRAIN. The gentleman says he would not appropriate a single cent to force the Lecompton constitution on the people of Kansas. Why, who proposes to do it? The gentleman has lost sight of the object before the House.

Mr. LOVEJOY. The Administration proposes it.

Mr. ADRAIN. The gentleman's remarks might do very well on the stump, but they are not of the right stamp for a house of legislation of this kind. There is no attempt, on the part of the Administration, to cram the Lecompton constitution down the throats of the people of Kansas. The vote on that subject was taken yesterday. How it has resulted I do not know. I hope that the election has passed off fairly and honestly, and that a fair opportunity has been given to the people there to express their will.

But, Mr. Chairman, I will not occupy the time of the House further. It is necessary that this bill should be passed. The Secretary of the Treasury calls on us to pass it, and I trust there will be no further delay in giving the necessary means to the Government to sustain its credit and its character.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I am in favor of this bill, Mr. Chairman, because I recognize in it the first step toward the return to a system which, as long as it existed, was adequate to all parts of the nation. It is the first step to the return to that policy with which the Government commenced—the policy of providing by the Federal Government a national currency.

For one, however widely I may differ with others, I avow it frankly that I am in favor of a national bank, with proper restrictions and proper guards, such as General Jackson said might have been framed. I rejoice to see that the present Administration recognizes its duty to supply a national currency; for notwithstanding the fact that the Treasury notes proposed to be issued are not to be of a lower denomination than $100, yet so far they will supply a national currency. We have now a full sense of the mischiefs entailed on the country, according to the President's message, by the currency issued by fourteen hundred local banks. I rejoice, then, to see that the Administration, adopting at least one principle of the Whig platform, when it was in existence, comes to the rescue of the country, and, overruling these fourteen hundred banks of issue, with all their conflicting currency, gives us, for the time that these Treasury notes will be in existence, a national currency. For, sir, disguise it as you may, one of the great arguments in favor of this bill is that these Treasury notes will constitute a convenient form of remittance, and will supply a medium of exchange that can be furnished from no other source whatsoever.

I rejoice, then, that the policy of the founders of the Republic is recognized as a rightful one; and that we are returning, step by step, to the wisdom and the sound virtues of the past.

But, Mr. Chairman, while the Secretary of the Treasury directs this application to us to supply the deficiency in the Treasury, the President of the United States ascribes all the financial evils of the country to bank expansion and to bank credits. Sir, I take issue with the President on that point. The evils under which the country now labors are to be ascribed to the policy of the Democratic party, inaugurated with the administration of General Jackson, and resolutely persisted and persevered in to the present day. Overbanking! When did it take its rise? When the Bank of the United States fell there were little more than five hundred banking institutions in the United States; now there are fourteen hundred. When it fell, the banking capital of the country was little more than eighty million dollars; now the circulation of the banks is over two hundred million dollars. While the Bank of the United States existed there was a national currency, equally good abroad and at home; now we have a currency that is of no particular value beyond the point where it is issued, and the value of which is constantly fluctuating.

Beyond that, it is the system of low tariff that is advocated by the Democratic party. Take up the statistical tables of the Secretary of the Treasury, and you will find that, concomitant with the establishment of low tariff, are bank expansions. Why, sir, it is well known that the foreign importers of the country, to a great extent, live on bank capital. You offer stimulants for speculation which is taken advantage of by importers for the purpose of obtaining funds with which to import foreign goods. The banks, eager to share in the profits of trade, lend their capital to the importers and speculators.

But, sir, I call the House to some facts showing the workings of the different tariffs adopted by the Government. In the first three years, under the tariff of 1816, the imports of the country rose to $368,000,000, and were greater by $120,000,000 than during the three following years. The imports were greater than under the high protective tariff of 1824-25. The consequences of the overtrading superinduced by that tariff were, first expansion, and then contraction, which continued until the adoption of the protective tariff of 1824, when the circulation of the banks again fell. And, sir, the circulation of the banks again rose under the low tariff enacted under the compromise of 1832, when the importations rose $120,000,000, and the average bank circulation to $149,000,000.

Again, after the enactment of the tariff of 1846, we find that the imports for the three years following, from 1846 to 1849, reached $127,000,000, and the bank circulation $113,000,000; going on up, until, in 1856, the imports reached $270,000,000, and the bank circulation $195,000,000.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that figures prove that as you encourage importation by low tariffs you will necessarily encourage bank expansion. Now, sir, we see the Government stimulating an expansion of currency, extending credit to an enormous extent, stimulating an overtrading and speculating mania in every department of business, and especially in the public lands, by exposing valuable lands for sale at a mere nominal price, and by disposing of valuable tracts of land at private sale for almost nothing—what is the consequence of such a course of policy? The consequence is to keep the country continually at a fever heat, to bring on excessive importations, bank expansions, and speculations in the public lands. Then, sir, by your warehouse system, you now have bonded in your warehouses goods to the value of $40,000,000, which may be poured upon the country at any moment, overwhelming the rising manufacturers of the country, when they are once again upon their feet.

[Here the hammer fell, the time fixed by the House for closing debate having arrived.]

The CHAIRMAN stated that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means was, under the rules of the House, entitled to one hour to close the debate upon the bill.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Secretary of the Treasury has made a report to this Congress, at the opening of the session, upon the state of the finances of the country; in which, he tells us that, in consequence of the peculiar condition of the country, and in consequence of the extreme difficulty in estimating the exports and the imports of the country, and the revenue which will be likely to come into the Treasury for the current fiscal year, it may become necessary for the Government to resort to a loan—not to issue Treasury notes for the purpose of a currency, not to facilitate the exchanges of the country, certainly not to furnish a circulating medium. He did not even assert that the money asked for would be wanted; but he asked that Congress should furnish him with the power to negotiate a loan, and nothing more or less than a loan. I bear upon this point particularly, because the discussion upon this question has taken a very wide range. While I do not intend to occupy the time of the committee for more than fifteen or twenty minutes, I certainly do not intend to follow the range of that discussion.

My colleague over the way, [Mr. Grow,] challenges the consistency of the Secretary of the Treasury, and talks about the Democratic party, which he says now are calling upon Congress to furnish them with a paper currency. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Banks] dwelt somewhat at length upon the point, and centers his main objections to the bill upon the ground that it is a currency bill. He told the House that he was in favor of a loan; that he was in favor of a hard-money currency, and he could not possibly vote for this bill, because it was to furnish a paper circulating medium.

Mr. BANKS. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me to correct him, my objection to the bill was that there was no precedent for it in the form in which it is now presented in this House; and, therefore, I desired that authority should be given to issue a loan, instead of issuing Treasury notes. I also objected that, whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the friends of this bill intended it or no, these Treasury notes would become a paper currency.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I so understood the gentleman. I ask him whether the opinion he has expressed is not founded upon the single fact, not that this act contemplates making these notes a currency, but that the credit of the Government at this particular time, and in the condition of things in the country, may convert it into currency? I might say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that his own negotiable note might be convertible into currency. Will the gentleman say of an individual negotiable note drawn at twelve months, with interest, that because the credit of the drawer is so great the country will use it as currency, and that that constitutes it a currency?

Why, what is this Treasury note bill? I confine myself to points of objection. The gentleman from Massachusetts will search in vain all the books to find a single instance in which a negotiable note is declared to be currency. He will find that promises to pay upon paper, especially if interest be added at the end of one year, though good and assignable, are nowhere regarded as currency, either in books of law or political economy.

I do not wish to pay any attention to the discursive range of political discussion which has taken place upon this bill. The subject of the tariff has been brought into this discussion. What has that to do with the business before the House? An Administration, which was inaugurated but a few months ago, finds itself without money in the Treasury. It wants no money for its own use. It does not come to Congress and ask it to appropriate money to pay its expenses. But your Congress passed a series of laws which the President is bound, under his oath of office, to execute. These acts require a very large expenditure of money, and then a revulsion comes over the country before he is four months in office. The revenue falls off in an extraordinary degree. In addition to that, just before the adjournment of the last Congress, you reduced the duties by your tariff act of March 3d, 1857. So you had the effect of the tariff in reducing the revenue one quarter of what it was under the act of 1846; and in addition to that, you had the entire prostration of the commerce of the country. Now, notwithstanding all this, the Secretary of the Treasury tells you in his report that he believes that the revenue will come up by the close of the year ending the 3d of June, 1859. He estimates that at the end of the year there will be a balance of $429,000 in the Treasury, provided the imports are not suspended and the goods not warehoused.

But, in addition to this, another startling fact exhibits itself. Twenty-eight million dollars of imports are in the warehouses of New York alone, under bond. How long that state of things will continue, no mortal man can tell. And the gentleman over the way, who was yesterday captious enough to find fault with the Secretary of the Treasury, will find that the Secretary himself has submitted the basis of all his estimates. Who could have foretold the present state of things one month before the bank suspension occurred? What man in the country could then have formed any idea of the state of things now existing? The Secretary states the basis upon which he makes his estimates. He informs the country that according to the ordinary imports of the last few years, we may calculate upon an importation of $370,000,000 of goods in the next fiscal year. But he says that in consequence of the warehousing of goods, and that in consequence of the tariff act of March, 1857, reducing the duties at least twenty-five per cent. there is a possibility of what? Not that the imports of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1857, will not be sufficient to pay the expenses of the Government, but that there may be such a suspension during that time that the Treasury may be found without funds; and that is the particular reason, Mr. Chairman, why this loan is asked for in this form. It may not be used at all. Certainly no gentleman here supposes that the President or Secretary will issue one dollar of these Treasury notes, unless there is a necessity for it.

I find upon all sides of the House different opinions in regard to its relation to the currency, judging from the effect it will produce, and not from the character of the bill upon its face. I find that some gentlemen object to the bill because the notes are to draw interest. Gentlemen upon this floor take the ground that the Treasury notes will not be currency. So I think. On the other hand, gentlemen who object to these notes drawing interest, say that they will be hoarded, and not become a currency. So objections are raised to them on one side because they will be currency, and upon the other side because they will not be currency. The interest upon their face, destroying their convertibility, is a formidable objection to some men.

The peculiarity of the bill, referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Banks,] consists in the simple fact that the Treasury Department is anxious to get this money at the lowest possible rate of interest; and I am surprised that gentlemen should suffer themselves to fall into the delusive idea that this bill creates a currency, when, upon its very face, it is declared to be a loan.

I am anxious to bring the committee to a vote at the earliest possible moment. Hence, while it would be a very easy matter for me to occupy the time of the committee for an hour in the discussion of the subject of Treasury notes, and their relation to the business of the country, I prefer to confine myself to the practical question before the House. We want the money. We do not want to furnish currency. We want money at the cheapest possible rate it can be had for the Government. We do not propose to issue Treasury notes as a circulating medium. We want to borrow gold and silver, and the currency of the country is to be confined to gold and silver, except where the creditor may prefer to have Treasury notes instead of gold and silver. The bill proposes to borrow gold and silver; to convert those evidences of debt into hard coin, but not to circulate as a medium of currency.

Mr. HOUSTON. I propose to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to a point in this investigation which has not been presented, and which I think has a direct and important bearing upon the very point upon which he is now speaking. I understand that a portion of the stocks of the Government now outstanding is what are called coupon bonds, and that the coupons for the half-yearly interest may be detached by the holders of the bonds, and used in the payment of debts or in circulation, without any limitation or restriction whatever.

And again, sir, under the existing law—and it is to be found in the Independent Treasury law itself—the Government of the United States have power to use at any point where there is a demand for their transfer drafts—such drafts as are paid out every day by the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House to the members, which transfer drafts pass from hand to hand, like promissory notes or Treasury notes.

Now, sir, I desire to call the gentleman's attention to this point, in order to show that, under the existing law, and in the very body of the Independent Treasury act itself, is to be found a principle by which we sanction, to a much greater extent, the circulation of paper as a currency, than is proposed in the bill now under discussion. These coupons may be detached from the bond, held by the party in whose name the bond is issued, and pass from him without assignment, and they may be kept out to the end of the Government, if it shall ever have the misfortune to terminate. These transfer drafts, furnished by the Government, and which are paid to us by the Sergeant-at-Arms, when we draw money, and desire to remit it, are of the same character, and much more likely to enter into the circulation of the country than Treasury notes bearing interest; because a Treasury note, bearing interest, is necessarily clogged in its transfer, and prevented from entering into the ordinary channels of circulation, for the reason that a calculation of interest is necessary at each and every transfer of it.

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. STANTON. I rise to a question of order. I think one farming out of the floor at a time is sufficient. I object to anybody speaking except the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] during his hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Indiana proposes to ask me a question.

Mr. STANTON. The gentleman from Alabama is making one speech during the hour allotted to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I object to another being made inside of that.

Mr. HUGHES. I merely desired to ask the gentleman from Alabama his opinion in reference to the point made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON,] as to the want of constitutional power on the part of the Senate to originate this bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. My reply to the gentleman's question is, that in the contemplation of the Constitution, a revenue bill means a bill to lay taxes in some of the modes recognized by the Constitution upon the people, by which money is raised. It does not mean a loan in any shape. A loan not being a tax, in the sense of the Constitution, but only the use by the Government of its credit by which it anticipates the receipt of its revenue raised under proper revenue laws—

Mr. STANTON. I rise to a question of order. My point of order is, that the gentleman from Alabama is not entitled to the floor to answer any question while it is in the possession of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES.]

Mr. HOUSTON. The question was propounded to me without objection, and I supposed I had a right to reply to it.

Mr. LOVEJOY. The question of order is not debatable.

Mr. HOUSTON. I went on to show that the objection urged by the gentleman from Ohio is not valid, in my judgment.

Mr. SEWARD. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I did not propose to go into the discussion of the objection referred to by the gentleman from Alabama, because it has been debated at great length in this House, and also, during the last Congress, in the Senate. The question was decided some twenty years ago in this House. I had supposed that it was settled, almost by the unanimous consent of the members of both Houses, that the right to originate revenue bills, from which the Senate is excluded, is confined to bills for taxation; and the reason for it is very obvious. The right of taxation is the highest power the people can confer upon the Legislature; it comes home to every man; and the Constitution intended to impose a restriction upon the other branch of the legislative department of the Government, and to give to the popular branch alone the power to originate measures imposing taxes upon the people.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. STANTON. I insist on the point of order. The gentleman from Alabama made it himself on the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RITCHIE] half an hour ago.

Mr. HOUSTON. I propose to ask a question, and a very short one, and I suppose I have a right to do so.

Mr. STANTON. I object, if it is not strictly in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield the floor to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I will yield to allow the gentleman to ask me a question. I believe I have a right to do so.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to ask the gentleman another question; whether the Treasury note law of 1837 did not originate in the Senate, drawn up by Mr. Silas Wright, who was then a Senator from the State of New York?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The gentleman has answered his own question, and it is not necessary that I should reply to it. I believe the facts are as the gentleman has stated; but I understand the question to be settled, that, except bills to tax the people, appropriation bills, or bills of this kind, may originate in either House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe that I have passed over pretty nearly all the objections that have been raised, so far as I can understand them; but I hope, if any gentleman present has any objections to the bill, as it stands now, that he will put any question to me whilst I am now upon the floor. I shall only reiterate that the Treasury Department want this loan in this shape and form, in order that they may be able to obtain the money at the lowest rate of interest; and that, in the second place, the loan is limited to one year, with power, after advertising for sixty days, to stop the interest, so that they may be able at any time, by stopping the interest, to bring them back to the Treasury for redemption.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] made a point as to the peculiarity of this bill. I am giving the reason why the bill was drawn up in that form. It was for the purpose of enabling the Government, with an exhausted Treasury, to obtain gold and silver at the lowest rate of interest, that the limitation of one year was fixed so as to prevent the debt being funded into a permanent debt, and so as to allow these notes to be recalled into the Treasury at the earliest possible time.

Gentlemen object that these notes may become currency. Anything may be converted into currency. A piece of bullion, with a stamp of value placed on it, may pass for currency. The negotiable note of any gentleman in the House, whose credit is good, payable at the end of one year with interest, may be used for currency.

Gentlemen also object to what they suppose will be the effects of this bill. I hope they will not hold us responsible for effects which they may anticipate. But let them take our own reasons, and our own views, and let the Government have relief in this shape in order that it may obtain money at the lowest possible rate of interest, and may be able to withdraw its notes in the shortest period of time.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. I would ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means if there ever has been an instance in which this Government has resorted to an issuance of Treasury notes, that before it was enabled to command or control the redemption of the notes, it did not have to resort to a funding act? I would ask him if when, in 1812, 1813, 1814, Treasury notes were issued, we were not under the necessity of passing, in 1815, an act by which their holders were authorized to convert them into Government stock? And again, in 1837, 1838, 1839, 1840, 1841, 1842, did not the notes remain in circulation till the act of 1843 was passed, authorizing the holders to present them to the Treasury and exchange them for Government stocks? Again, in 1847, when $23,000,000 were authorized to be issued, did not the act itself embrace the funding clause, by which the Government was enabled to recover them again from general circulation? And again—

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I yielded the floor to the honorable gentleman that he might ask me a question, but not to propound a long string of propositions. I had just closed my remarks; but I am willing to answer any one proposition of the gentleman, or as many of them as I can think of. The gentleman asks me if the Government was not under the necessity, in all former acts for the issue of Treasury notes, to resort to the system of funding? Well, that may be so. It is in the former Treasury note bill; but I am not aware of its having been put there for that purpose. Nearly all the cases to which the gentleman refers occurred in times of war. Though the exigency might be a very sudden one, and money might be wanted badly, yet no one could tell whether it might or might not be necessary to convert the temporary loan into a permanent debt. In every instance where the funding provision was inserted in the bill, it was because Congress could not tell whether that which was said to be temporary might not necessarily become, in a very short period of time, a permanent debt.

Now, the peculiarity of this bill arises from the fact of our living in peculiar times. We are not asking for a war loan. It is not intended to be a permanent loan. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to issue $6,000,000 in notes, and, in addition, to make a loan of $14,000,000. We may not want to use it at all; and if we do, we may be able, at the end of the year, to redeem every dollar issued. These are times of peace; but they are times of financial revulsion, and no man can foresee what is to happen. The reason, therefore, why this bill is made peculiar, or is contradistinguished from other Treasury note bills, is that, so far as the Government is concerned, we want to avoid the appearance of making it a permanent debt, in funding it at all.

Now, if it shall be necessary to issue these notes, and if they cannot be recalled, then it will be time for the Government to resort to a funding system. I cannot, I confess, foresee the contingencies that may arise. It may possibly be that this temporary loan shall become a permanent one. It may possibly be that we will have to resort to the funding system for the purpose of bringing in these loans. But I say that the bill has been drawn under circumstances that are very peculiar, and to meet the exigencies of the case; and while it lays itself open to objections of various kinds, on all sides of the House, it is the least exceptionable form in which this Government can avail itself of a loan to meet the exigencies of the Treasury that may arise, to furnish to the Government gold and silver at the lowest possible cost, and to place within the hands of the Government the power to redeem them at the earliest possible period of time. With these remarks, Mr. Chairman, I close.

Mr. GROW. I propose to modify my motion. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert—

The CHAIRMAN. The bill must be first considered by sections. Amendments are now in order to the first section of the bill.

Mr. STANTON. I move to amend the first section of the bill by striking out the words "Treasury notes," and inserting the words "Government stocks," so that it will read—

That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to cause Government stocks for such sum or sums as the exigencies of the public service may require, but not to exceed, at any time, the amount of $20,000,000, and of denominations not less than $100 for any such note, to be prepared, signed, and issued in the manner hereinafter provided.

If I had been so fortunate, Mr. Chairman, as to have obtained the floor before the debate closed, I had intended to have made some reply to the gentleman from the Norfolk district of Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON.] The floor, however, was not assigned to me. Whatever I might have done if the House bill had continued before the committee, after the action of the House in substituting the Senate bill, and the fact that we are now acting upon a Senate bill, must forever preclude me from giving the bill, in any form, my assent.

The Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] tells the House—and it seems to me he made the announcement ex cathedra—that the Senate has a perfect right and full power to originate a Treasury note bill. Sir, I know of no authority in any department of the Government to settle this question for me. I know that the Constitution provides that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House.

Mr. LETCHER. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman is not debating his amendment.

Mr. STANTON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The gentleman is debating his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine himself to giving reasons why the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. STANTON. I am showing that these words should be stricken out, because it is a revenue bill, and I want to amend it so that it shall not be a revenue bill. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is settled by the uniform practice of the House, from the foundation of the Government to the present day, that an appropriation bill, if it involves only $100, cannot originate in the Senate. That is not a taxing bill. It does not exercise the taxing power; and who does not know that one of the most usual modes of raising revenue in all Governments, and especially in other Governments like our own, is by raising loans and by the issue of Treasury notes in every possible form? If there was any reason for making any such constitutional provision, it applies with as much force to this bill as it can to any other form of raising the revenue; just as much as it does to a tariff, and just as much as it does to a bill for direct taxation. Any bill which imposes a pecuniary liability on the Government, or a charge upon the people, is, in common sense and in all reason, a revenue bill.

Now, sir, the clause providing that these bills shall originate in the House, is not a mere matter of form. Why, sir, the Senators from Texas, the Senators from Delaware, and the Senators from Florida, have just as much force in the passage of a Treasury note bill, or in originating it, if it is to be originated in the Senate, as have the Senators from the State of Pennsylvania or New York. It matters not whether the debt is to be liquidated by taxation, or by pledging the credit of the Government in a loan; it involves a charge upon the people, and all such bills should originate with the immediate representatives of the people.

Now, sir, I object to this bill, not only because it is a Senate bill, but because it does not provide a proper mode for raising revenue. If, instead of issuing Treasury notes, the bill provided for raising a loan, I would care less about it. But, sir, taken in connection with an involuntary bankrupt law, which I suppose is to follow it, and it looks like an attempt, upon the part of the Government, to establish a national paper currency, to take the place of the banking institutions of the States. The President recommends the Legislatures of the several States, for the first time in the history of the recommendations of Presidents, to adopt laws for the limitation of the paper issues of the banking institutions of the States. He follows it up by the recommendation of the passage of an involuntary bankrupt law for corporations, for the purpose of sweeping them out of existence, and then recommends the raising of the loan, which I suppose is to take the place of the paper currency of the banks of the several States. We are to commence by an issue of $20,000,000; and, in my opinion, it will be followed up until it may reach $100,000,000, and supply all the avenues of commerce.

Mr. HOUSTON. I oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON,] and I desire to correct the impression under which I was when I propounded the last question to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. Upon a reference to the Journals, I find that the Treasury note bill of 1837 originated in the House. The Senate originated a bill at the same session, and for the same purpose, but acted upon the House bill. I was under a slight misapprehension. Now, I propose to give one or two reasons why the Senate had the right to originate this bill. I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] entirely destroys the force of his own argument, when he maintains that this bill must originate in the House, but admits that the Senate might originate a loan bill.

Mr. STANTON. I did not admit that.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I misunderstood the gentleman. But, sir, I ask why the Senate could not originate a loan bill, and this is but a loan bill? Is it a revenue bill? It is true that it furnishes money to the Treasury, but it is merely a means of anticipating the revenue, which is expected to come into the Treasury through the channels provided by existing laws of Congress for raising revenue. This is not a revenue bill any more than a bill which might be originated in the Senate, for the sale of one of the ships of war floating on the ocean, or for the sale of any other property belonging to the Government. If the Senate originate a bill for the sale of a certain piece of public property, by which you put money into the Treasury, is it for that reason a revenue bill? I understand the clause of the Constitution to which reference has been made, was intended to apply to bills for imposing taxes upon the people. It does not apply to a bill which proposes to borrow money, or to obtain money by a sale of property which may be useless to the Government; as, for instance, by the sale of the Fort Snelling reservation of the public lands.

Mr. STANTON. Is an appropriation bill a taxation bill?

Mr. HOUSTON. I think the gentleman is mistaken about the power of the Senate to originate appropriation bills. There is no such doctrine settled now, and no such doctrine has ever been settled. It is true that the Senate are not in the habit of originating the general appropriation bills; but if I am not mistaken, they did originate two or three appropriation bills during the last Congress. I am not certain whether the House acted on them.

Mr. CAMPBELL. They were received by the House, and all laid on the table.

Mr. HOUSTON. I repeat, sir, that the rule is not as the gentleman from Ohio has asserted it to be, that the Senate has no power to originate appropriation bills. There is no such rule contended for outside the Committee of Ways and Means of this House, who do not want to have their authority disputed by the Committee on Finance in the Senate. That is the reason of the doctrine, and that is how it grew up.

I therefore say, in illustration of what I have said, that the Senate has the same power to originate an appropriation bill that the House has; it has the same power to originate a loan bill that this House has; it has the same power as that claimed by the House of Representatives to sell any of the reservations of the public lands for military or naval purposes, or to sell any of the property of the United States that we may, by law, dispose of.

Mr. STANTON, by general consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I move to amend this section by striking out the last two lines.

Mr. Chairman, I have listened with some little surprise to the ground taken by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON.] It seems to me that it shows a singular misapprehension of the character of our Government, and of the functions of the two Houses of Congress. The Constitution of the United States establishes the two Houses of Congress, and gives to them legislative power. In its grant of power to the two Houses of Congress it particularizes the subjects.

Mr. HOWARD. What is the question now before the committee?

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. It is to strike out the last two lines.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana must confine his remarks to the amendment—striking out the last two lines. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. Well, then, I withdraw my amendment, and renew the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The grant of power to the Congress of the United States is first to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, &c. The second is to borrow money on the credit of the United States. The second ground was separate and distinct. There is but one prohibition imposed upon the Senate of the United States; but one limitation of power in regard to the action of that branch of the Government, and it is to be found in the seventh section of the same article. That section declares that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House. That relates to the power given in the first clause of the seventh section, and has no relation whatever to the second specification of power delegated to Congress as a legislative body. There is no other prohibition.

Now, the amendment proposed is, that stocks of the United States shall be issued instead of Treasury notes. The notion of that being proper grows out of the assumption that the issuing of Treasury notes is unusual. Mr. Chairman, if one reverts to the history of this Government, he will find that it is in strict accordance with the settled principle that has prevailed ever since its establishment. On all occasions when there has been a need of a temporary supply of money, it has been the practice of the Government of the United States to issue Treasury notes. It took advantage of that means during the war of 1812. There were no less than six several acts passed during that period for the issue of notes. It was not until the close of the war, and when it became necessary to provide a permanent mode of proceeding, that it funded Treasury notes. In 1837 there were repeated acts passed for the issue of Treasury notes to supply what was supposed to be the temporary necessities of the Government. That policy continued during several years; and it was only when it was ascertained that there was a necessity of making a permanent provision that there was any act passed for—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. QUITMAN. I move the following amendment in good faith, and not for the purpose of making a speech:

In section one, line seven, strike out the words "one hundred," and insert "one thousand."

I offer the amendment in the confident belief that it will remove the objection of some members of the House who are opposed to this mode of raising or borrowing money, on account of the fear that these notes will enter into the circulation of the country, and thus direct it to purposes not intended by the Constitution, and not intended by the Treasury system which now fortunately prevails—a system which disconnected the Treasury entirely from the banking business of the country. There are objections to throwing into circulation Treasury notes of small amount. They will take the place, to some extent, of the circulation of the country, and, to that extent, they will expel specie from circulation. I understand that they require only the indorsement of the person to whose order they are filled, and after that they are thrown upon the country, will pass from hand to hand, and will perform the functions of exchange. They will constitute a very good medium of exchange, passing from one point of the country to another, between which there are varying rates of interest, and cutting off premiums, which, otherwise, will have to be paid. I believe the amendment which I offer will remedy that evil, and that it will keep these notes, as they ought to be kept, out of circulation.

Another evil they will correct. If gentlemen will make a calculation of the labor thrown upon the Treasury by the circulation of ten, fifteen, or twenty millions of Treasury notes, they will find that a large force of clerks will be necessary to be employed to keep this intricate system under the full and perfect control of the Department. That will be in a great degree corrected by not allowing the issue of Treasury notes under the sum of $1,000. I have offered the amendment in good faith, because I desire to aid the Government in acquiring the means of carrying on its affairs. It is true, as said by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] I prefer the old-fashioned way of borrowing money, and not by means of issuing Treasury notes; because I believe that the Treasury of the United States, unless watched by the people, will be corrupted. I am ready to supply the necessary means to pay the expenses of the Government, and will vote for it in any shape that may be necessary to accomplish that object; but I think this amendment will tend, in a great degree, to remove the objections which may exist upon the part of some of the members of the House.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the amendment proposed by the honorable member from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] will accomplish the purpose that he and I both wish to attain. I believe that a paper issue, destined to go into circulation, founded upon anything else than gold or silver, will be liable to occasional and great depreciation. Should the Government credit at any time be affected to the extent of reducing this paper the slightest shade of depreciation below par, it might all be precipitated at one time, and at the most inopportune time, upon the Treasury for redemption. Sir, there never has existed an instance in this Government, in which Treasury notes have been issued under circumstances like these, that the Government has not been reduced to the necessity of passing a funding act to return them again to the Treasury.

This bill proposes, it is true, that these notes shall bear interest for twelve months, and for sixty days after the Secretary of the Treasury shall give notice that he is prepared to redeem them. But what takes place then? The bill provides that then the interest shall cease. What will be the condition of the thousand dollar Treasury note under these circumstances? It will have accumulated interest to the amount of seventy dollars, and it will pass for all purposes of exchange as $1,070. If a New York capitalist, holding this paper, wishes to go into the cotton market at New Orleans and purchase cotton, he will have the option to return the notes to the Treasury for redemption, or remit them for the purchase of the cotton. Will he demand the gold for them, and pay the freight upon the gold to New Orleans? or will he send his thousand dollar Treasury note to New Orleans, and make his payment free from charge of freight? Raising the denomination of these notes to $1,000 will not prevent them from passing into circulation. Whenever the Treasury note ceases to bear interest, it will then pass, as long as the credit of the Government is good, as freely into circulation as any other paper of like denomination; and, as has heretofore been proven by the history of the Treasury operations of the country, you will never recover this paper so long as the credit of the Government is maintained, until you pass a funding act authorizing the holders of these notes to present them at the Treasury and convert them into Government stock bearing six per cent. interest, running for a period of time—say not less than five or ten years. You must hold out this inducement to the owners of large masses of capital, seeking permanent investment, to tempt them to gather up these notes and return them to the Treasury.

This, sir, will be the case so long as the Government credit is good; but if exigencies shall arise impairing the Government credit to the slightest extent, the whole mass of this paper may return, as the old continental money used to return, to the Treasury for redemption. This may occur at the most inopportune time, and when the condition of the Treasury may cause them to be greatly depreciated. It will be the worst description of paper ever established by the Government. You have an illustration of what may occur with this issue of $20,000,000 in the history of the old continental money. Though I think the gentleman's amendment is a step in the right direction—though I think Treasury notes ought not, perhaps, to be issued of a less denomination than $1,000—yet, I think that the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi would fall far short of averting the evil which the gentleman and myself both desire to avert. I would prefer to insert in the bill the funding clause embraced in the Treasury note act of 1847.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I move to amend the amendment by substituting "five hundred" for "one thousand." The committee will understand, Mr. Chairman, that the question is simply an issue between $1,000 and $500. Whichever is preferable of the two, in the judgment of the committee, will, of course, receive its assent, if either of them does.

I think myself, sir, that these Treasury notes, which it is proposed to issue, will not be a worse currency than gold and silver. I believe they will be better. These Treasury notes will not appear in the ordinary circulation of the country. They will be used in the payment of duties; they will go West, and be invested in the purchase of lands. And when they are thus invested, what will be their condition? They will not only be unfitted for the duties or functions of currency, but they will be directly withdrawn. What says the seventh section of this bill?

"Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That every collector of the customs, receiver of public moneys, or other officer or agent of the United States who shall receive any Treasury note or notes in payment on account of the United States, shall take from the holder of such note or notes a receipt, upon the back of each, stating distinctly the date of such payment, and the amount allowed upon such note; and every such officer or agent shall keep regular and specific entries of all Treasury notes received in payment, showing the person from whom received, the number, date, and amount of principal and interest allowed on each, and every Treasury note received in payment; which entries shall be delivered to the Treasury with the Treasury note or notes mentioned therein, and if found correct, such officer or agent shall receive credit for the amount, as provided in the last section of this act."

Now, Mr. Chairman, you will see, and the committee will see, that the function these notes will perform will be to pay the public dues, and when those dues are discharged, the notes are by their use extinguished; they are receipted upon; there is an end of them. I propose to reduce the amount of the notes to $500, instead of fixing it at $1,000, as the amendment of the honorable gentleman from Mississippi provides, because it will afford greater conveniences to those having to deal with the Government. A thousand dollars is too large an amount for many of those, for instance, who want to make investments in western lands. Five hundred dollars is a much more convenient amount, and if they are employed in the manner I have stated, they will not perform the functions of a means of exchange. How many functions do the bonds of the Government perform in that way? We know very well that the savings institutions have derived their capital from investments in bonds of the Government.

Mr. QUITMAN. I desire to ask my honorable friend from Virginia, whether a bank of the United States or a fiscal agency would not answer the purpose better?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I think that my remarks do not justify any such criticism. A bank of the United States would issue notes that would not be extinguished by circulation, as Treasury notes are extinguished by circulation and use.

A MEMBER. They can be reissued.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. That is true; but nevertheless they are extinguished. So you can reissue bonds. But when the Government desires it, they may be extinguished. I insist upon it, sir, that there is no similitude whatever between this transaction and a Government bank. I think my amendment would be for the public convenience; for the convenience of remittance, if you choose; for the convenience of paying duties at your different sea-ports, and for the purchase of land at your land offices.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] will not prevail. The amendment, and the speech based upon it, as also the amendment offered by the honorable gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] contemplate no change in the principle or character of the bill. The Treasury note, as to all its characteristics, will be just the same, whether it be $500, or $100, or $1,000. It is still a Treasury note, payable in one year, with interest. The modification proposed by either of the gentlemen will not alter the character of the bill in any single particular. There is no principle involved. It is a mere question of expediency. Now, I would suggest to these honorable gentlemen that the bill does not provide that the Secretary shall issue Treasury notes of the denomination of $100, but it simply provides that he shall not issue Treasury notes of a less denomination than $100. It certainly can do no harm to leave this discretionary power in the hands of the Secretary. I am convinced that he is just as much opposed to making these notes current as any gentleman here can possibly be. It is not his desire to do so. He wants to have the power to issue, if necessary, notes as low as $100. I am willing to confide in the Secretary of the Treasury. I know that he will do anything in his power to prevent their becoming currency.

Another reason why I do not wish the amendment to prevail is, that we are now acting on the Senate bill. If we pass it as it is, there is the end of it, and it only needs the President's approval to become a law. If any amendments be made to it, it will be necessary for it to go back to the Senate. At the same time, there is a pending resolution for both Houses to take a recess. I am very anxious to have a vote on this bill, and that we may either pass it or reject it to-day. I hope, therefore, that the amendment to the amendment will not prevail.

The question was taken on Mr. SMITH's amendment to the amendment, offered by Mr. QUITMAN, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I move to amend the first section, by striking out the words "not less than $100 for any such note," and inserting in lieu thereof the words, "of $100, $500, and $1,000 respectively." I offer this amendment, Mr. Chairman, in good faith.

Mr. QUITMAN. I submit the question to the Chair whether that amendment is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PHILLIPS] is not, at this time, in order.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, by striking out the words "one thousand," and inserting the word "fifty." Either this bill is authorized by the Constitution of the United States or it is not. The amount of the Treasury drafts cannot affect the power of the Government under the Constitution—

Mr. QUITMAN. I would submit the question whether the gentleman is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SEWARD] submits an amendment to the amendment, and is in order, discussing it.

Mr. QUITMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman, in courtesy, not to embarrass an amendment which I proposed in good faith. He will have an opportunity of voting directly on his own proposition afterwards.

Mr. SEWARD. I offer my amendment in just as good faith; and the House will determine between the gentleman and myself. If this bill is unconstitutional, then you cannot issue the Treasury note for any amount. The difficulty cannot be removed by the proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi to enlarge the amount, because, if $1,000 notes are issued, the wrong would be ten times greater than if $100 notes were issued. But I am opposed to issuing large Treasury notes, and I prefer to see them all in $50 notes, because I want them to go into circulation as money, in the present financial condition of the country. The uses that the people may make of these Treasury notes, if issued, cannot affect the constitutional power of Government to issue them. They are not bank bills, because they are paper payable twelve months ahead, and drawing interest. If the people think proper to use these bills as money to control and regulate exchanges, and for the transmission of money, so much the better; and that is one reason why I am in favor of the bill.

I am not afraid of being charged with favoring a Bank of the United States, because I think that that is an entirely different thing from this bill, in any aspect in which you can view it. A Treasury note would be no more a bank bill than the Government stock which gentlemen talk about, because these Treasury notes are payable at twelve months, drawing interest. Every man knows that stocks are put in the market every day and sold. They are exchanged every hour in Wall street, and are used, if not for the purpose of circulation, at least for the purpose of raising money on, just as these Treasury notes can be used. So that in any shape you can put it, the Treasury securities will become, to some extent, a circulating medium. You cannot avoid it. Therefore, I think it much better to have small notes than large ones. I am in favor of that for another reason. I want some of these notes to go down South. If they are issued of the denomination of $1,000 and $5,000 and $10,000 and $50,000, the notes will stay in the northern States, and give relief there to the detriment of the South, and will produce the same mischief as the United States Bank. Therefore I want them to be issued of small denominations.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the amendment proposed, it is to insert "fifty" instead of "one hundred." I am opposed to the amendment, though I am in favor of an alteration of the section. I also am in favor of so altering it that the sums for which these Treasury notes shall be issued shall be fixed by law, and not left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury; not that I doubt that a wise use will be made of that discretion, but because I think that such an alteration will be the means of saving the Secretary of the Treasury from much annoyance, and at the same time make these Treasury notes much more valuable for all the proper purposes for which they ought to be issued. I propose, sir, to move, at the proper time, that these notes shall be issued in sums of $100, $500, and $1,000. The bill itself provides that they shall not be issued in sums of less than $100; but it does not prohibit their issue in fractional sums over $100. If they can have any valuable effect upon the community, though they may not be legitimately issued for that direct purpose, let us put them into a shape by which that effect may be realized.

I take this occasion to say, Mr. Chairman, because I think it is germane to the subject, that these Treasury notes, in my judgment, are the very things which ought to be issued. The President of the United States, in his annual message, commends to the attention of Congress the report of the Secretary of the Treasury which recommends them; and my colleague, [Mr. RITCHIE,] in stating that the President did not recommend them while they were recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, has fallen into a mistake; not intentionally, of course. His view, as I understand it, is that the President, in the body of his message, speaks of a loan, and, with respect to Treasury notes, merely indorses the action of the Secretary of the Treasury. If my colleague will look further he will see that the President in his message speaks of a temporary loan in case the exigency of the public service should require it; and certainly he will admit that in commending the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury to the notice of Congress, the President intends to refer to what he had stated previously—that, whenever the exigency of the public service requires that which he has called a temporary loan, it shall be realized in this manner.

But why should this loan be made? Why should these Treasury notes be issued? My colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] tells this House that it had better begin to retrench. Does he recollect that every dollar now asked for is asked for to pay the debts of a Congress in which he was one of the majority? Does he not know that the appropriations to be made by this Congress will be made at a late period, and for the fiscal year to commence in July next? Does the gentleman forget that an appropriation bill, demanded by the real wants of the country, the Army appropriation bill, was, during the last Congress, three times rejected? Why is it, Mr. Chairman, that this side of the House is reproached with advocating measures of extravagant appropriation, when we only ask for means to replenish the Treasury in order that the debts contracted by the gentleman and his friends may be paid. We do not say to the creditor of the Government that he must accept these notes; but the bill very wisely provides that unless he chooses to accept them he need not do so.

I shall take the opportunity again of saying a few words on this subject, unless by doing so I shall embarrass the action of the committee on this bill. I prefer that the amount of these Treasury notes shall be fixed, and for that reason I shall vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. SEWARD.]

Mr. CLINGMAN. I think the debate has gone far enough on this bill. I move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. QUITMAN. I ask the gentleman that he will not apply the previous question upon this bill in committee, which will have the effect, if I understand it, of cutting off a vote upon the amendments which are pending.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I am disposed to make a question of order upon the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina. I know it has been the practice established during the Congress before the last to entertain such a motion in committee; but I did not believe it was in order then, nor do I believe that it is in order now. I believe it is trampling down the rights of this House to permit a majority, by striking out the enacting clause of a bill, to cut off all debate upon any question whatever, no matter how important. If the motion can be applied to this bill, it can be applied to any bill. If it can be applied at this stage of the proceedings, it can be applied in any stage of the proceedings in committee. No matter how important the measure, the gag may be applied in Committee of the Whole at any time, if the Chair rules the motion in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order submitted by the gentleman from Maine, and decides that the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina is in order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CLINGMAN. At the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] I will withdraw the motion for the present.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to; and the question recurring upon the amendment offered by Mr. QUITMAN.

Mr. WARREN. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, by striking out "$1,000" and inserting "$1,500." The object which I have in view in offering this amendment, is simply, in a few words, to give my opinions in reference to this bill. I dislike very much to oppose the bill in any shape in which it can possibly be presented, but unless some amendment of this character is made, I shall feel myself bound to oppose it.

My object and that which my friend from Mississippi seeks to accomplish, are precisely the same. It is to provide that these Treasury notes shall not, by any possible contingency, be made a circulating medium in this country. It has been the policy of the party to which I belong, as I have understood it—it has been my policy at any rate—to oppose any proposition upon the part of this Government, by virtue of which any thing other than gold and silver shall become a circulating medium. I propose, therefore, by the amendment which I have introduced, to make the lowest limit for these Treasury notes so large as to prevent the possibility of such an occurrence.

I desire not to oppose this measure, and I have very reluctantly taken the position which I have in objecting in good faith to this feature of the bill. I hope the amendment will be adopted, because I desire to aid, by my vote, the Government in carrying on its affairs. But, sir, I will not do it in opposition to the firm and fixed principles for which I have contended all the preceding days of my life. If this amendment be adopted, the desire I have will be accomplished; otherwise I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas. I am opposed to the issue of any of these notes, and I ask a vote upon the question.

Mr. EUSTIS. When the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] withdrew his motion, I renewed it. The Chair did not hear me; but I now renew the motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. I made the motion before, distinctly to the hearing of gentlemen around me.

Mr. STANTON. I submit that the motion is not in order, pending the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the motion is in order. "A motion to strike out the enacting words of a bill shall have precedence of a motion to amend."

Mr. BANKS. I trust the gentleman from Louisiana will withdraw the motion, in order that we may take one or two votes upon propositions we propose to offer in good faith. There is no desire to defeat the bill by procrastination.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not hear the motion submitted by the gentleman from Louisiana at the time he submitted it, otherwise the Chair would have entertained the motion.

Mr. EUSTIS. I made it distinctly at the time, but inasmuch as gentlemen desire to take some votes in good faith, I withdraw my motion.

The amendment of Mr. WARREN to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the amendment offered by Mr. QUITMAN,

Mr. QUITMAN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. QUITMAN, and SMITH of Tennessee, were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 76, noes 105.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BANKS. I offer the following amendment, to come in after the first section of the bill:

And be it further enacted, That the President, if in his opinion it shall be the interest of the United States so to do, instead of issuing the whole amount of Treasury notes authorized by the first section of this act, may borrow, on the credit of the United States, such an amount of money as he may deem proper, and issue therefor stock of the United States, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding six per centum per annum for the sum thus borrowed, redeemable after the 31st day of December, 1859: Provided, That the sum so borrowed, together with the Treasury notes, issued under the authority of this act, outstanding, and the stock created under the authority of this act, shall not in the whole exceed $20,000,000: And provided further, That no stock shall be issued at a less rate than par.

I will not, sir, detain an impatient House by any extended remarks. The amendment gives to the President all the authority that his friends claim for him under the bill to issue Treasury notes. But it superadds also the authority, that if he shall deem it for the interest of the United States, he shall also have authority to issue United States stock for any part of this amount of $20,000,000; that both the stock and the Treasury notes issued shall not together exceed $20,000,000; and that no stock shall be issued below par.

This will be a precedent for the Government in future time, and stand upon the authority of the Democratic Administration of this year. There has been no bill passed of this character, under a similar condition of the country; and every previous bill, giving the President authority to issue Treasury notes, has proceeded and been defended upon the admitted fact that a loan was impracticable at the time of the issue of the notes. Now this will be as a precedent, that if the Treasury notes be issued, a loan will, at the same time, be authorized; and, if the act shall be temporary in its character, that it may extend two years instead of one.

As for the authority upon which the Democrats upon this side of the House stand, to which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] alluded, I ask leave to read to him the words of one standing in the position of authority to that gentleman and his friends. I read an extract from a letter of Andrew Jackson, to the editor of the Globe, dated July 23, 1837. He says:

"I hope no Treasury notes will be issued. The Treasury drafts upon actual deposits are constitutional, and do not partake of paper credits, as Treasury notes, which are subject to depreciation by merchants and banks, and shavers and brokers, and will be, if issued; and the Government cannot avoid it."

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts. I think, however, that it presents to the committee the real point in controversy. There are certain gentlemen here who advocate a loan in preference to the issue of Treasury notes. Well, if the amendment really has the effect of providing for a loan, redeemable in twelve months, it will be identically the same as if you carry out the policy proposed in the bill. It is the same as the bill, except that the matter is to be left at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury; but if you were to adopt the bill in the shape proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, I take it that capitalists would hesitate to take the notes, because they would prefer a loan for a long time.

Now, let us see how it will operate. The times are hard, and I have no doubt that those who have money with which to make investments desire a movement of this kind. If the Secretary of the Treasury shall be compelled to take a loan for ten or twenty years, capitalists will come forward and take the stock, perhaps at par or a little more. In six or twelve months, when money matters get easier, these stocks will go up ten, fifteen, and perhaps twenty per cent., and will be sold in England and elsewhere, and several millions of dollars will be realized by these capitalists. Well, your debt is then outstanding, and some two, three, or four years hence, when we have a surplus in the Treasury, the Secretary of the Treasury will be authorized to buy in the stock, and he will have to give a premium of twenty per cent. for it, and the men who hold it will derive a further advantage from it. The effect of the amendment, therefore, would be to enable capitalists to make large sums of money at the expense of the Government. I do not say that that is the intention of the gentleman from Massachusetts, for I believe it is not; but the effect would be to enable them to make large profits without the Government or the country deriving any corresponding advantage. I am, therefore, opposed to the amendment. Let us make these Treasury notes redeemable in twelve months. By that time the Government will probably have means to redeem them, and in a year or two probably they will all be brought in. But if you provide for a loan, or the issue of Treasury notes, the capitalists will not take the notes. They will hold back and tell the Secretary that his notes will not go, and that he must have a loan for ten or twenty years.

Gentlemen have said, during this discussion, that the Secretary of the Treasury has made a very great mistake. Well, if that be so, I am not willing to trust him with this discretion, for he may make another mistake. I do not say that he has made a mistake; but gentlemen say he committed a blunder by buying up Government stocks at a premium, and they ought not, therefore, to desire to trust him. I am opposed to the amendment, therefore, for the reason that, if you put in the alternative, you cripple the proposition for the issue of Treasury notes. I hope we shall stand by the bill as we have now got it, and that we shall have a vote at once upon the pending amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Let us vote on this amendment first.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. As it is desired to take a vote on this amendment, I withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask for tellers on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. TAYLOR of New York, and WASHBURN of Illinois, were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 103.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I request the gentleman from Mississippi to withdraw his motion till I offer an amendment to the second section; I wish to offer it in good faith and have it voted on. It will take but a few moments.

Mr. BOCOCK. If any gentleman on the other side has a bona fide amendment to offer, I think he will be allowed to offer it, and have a test vote upon it. And, then, when these test amendments are offered and decided, we can come to a vote on the bill.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I would like to accommodate the gentleman from Maine, but I think that the best course for the House to pursue would be to strike out the enacting clause, and put the bill on its passage.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I understand the gentleman from Mississippi refuses to withdraw his motion to strike out the enacting clause. Does the gentleman propose to speak his five minutes on the proposition to amend?

Mr. BARKSDALE. I do not.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then I have a word or two to say against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not an amendment. It is a motion to strike out the enacting clause, and, in the opinion of the Chair, is not debatable.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I submit that it is a proposition to amend the bill by striking out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to strike out the enacting clause takes precedence of an amendment, and is not of the nature of an amendment, for it is for the purpose of withdrawing the bill. The Chair therefore rules that the motion is not debatable.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think that the rule referred to by the Chair is not applicable at all to proceedings in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It certainly never was designed that the previous question should prevail practically in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I submit that discussion is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so ruled.

Mr. BARKSDALE. This plan has been repeatedly pursued during the last two Congresses.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I desire to appeal to the gentleman from Mississippi to withdraw that motion but for a single moment. I have an amendment which I wish to offer in good faith, and have it voted on.

Mr. BARKSDALE. The committee can vote down my motion if it choose to do so, but I refuse to withdraw it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. The Chair has decided that a motion to strike out is in order. From that decision of the Chair I respectfully take an appeal, and I will state the grounds of my appeal. The Chair, if I understand him, decides that the motion is in order, under the 119th rule. This rule is:

"A motion to strike out the enacting words of a bill shall have precedence of a motion to amend; and, if carried, shall be considered equivalent to its rejection."

That rule was adopted in 1822. Now, I understand that any subsequent rule or law that is inconsistent with this rule must modify and change, or abrogate it. I call the attention of the Chair to the 34th rule, adopted in 1847, and which, I submit, in view of its inconsistency with the 119th rule, adopted in 1822, changes or repeals that rule.

"34. No member shall occupy more than one hour in debate on any question in the House or in committee; but a member reporting the measure under consideration from a committee, may open and close the debate: Provided, That where debate is closed by order of the House, any member shall be allowed, in committee, five minutes to explain any amendment he may offer, after which any member who shall first obtain the floor shall be allowed to speak five minutes in opposition to it, and there shall be no further debate on the amendment; but the same privilege on debate shall be allowed in favor of and against any amendment that may be offered to the amendment."

Now, I desire, under the rule that I have read, to offer an amendment to this bill. The rule provides that I shall have an opportunity to offer it, and shall have an opportunity to speak five minutes to it. The gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BARKSDALE,] invoking the aid of a rule established twenty years before that, says that I shall be prevented from offering my amendment. It is a right granted to me by the rule of the House, established in 1847.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Is it in order for me to say anything in reply to the gentleman from Maine?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is not debatable.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Does the Chair say that the question is not debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair says that under the rules it is not debatable.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Then I desire to inquire why the gentleman from Maine was allowed to make a speech, while I am not allowed to reply to it. I know the question is not debatable; but, as he made a speech, I desired to make one too.

The CHAIRMAN. The 119th rule provides that a motion to strike out the enacting words of a bill shall have precedence of a motion to amend, and if carried, shall be considered equivalent to its rejection.

Mr. STANTON. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. LOVEJOY demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. What has become of my appeal?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the gentleman as appealing.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I did appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well; the appeal will be entertained. From the decision of the Chair on the point of order made by the gentleman from Maine, that gentleman takes an appeal. The question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. LETCHER and LOVEJOY were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes one hundred and eight, noes not counted.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The question then recurred on Mr. BARKSDALE's motion, and it was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PHELPS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly Senate bill (No. 13) to authorize the issue of Treasury notes; and had directed him to report the same back to the House, with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I suppose the question before the House will be upon concurring in the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole in striking out the enacting clause.

The SPEAKER. That will be the first question.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I hope that motion will not prevail. I call the previous question upon it.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered to be put.

The House then refused to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved the previous question upon ordering the bill to a third reading.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered to be put.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. BILLINGHURST demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 118, nays 86; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Boccock, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Chapman, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochran, Cockerill, Comins, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Dean, Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Gartrell, Gillis, Giltner, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, J. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Warren, Cadwalader C. Washburne, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, and Zollcoffer—86.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved that the vote by which the bill passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER THE HOLIDAYS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the House proceed to the business on the Speaker's table. My purpose is to take up the Senate resolution for a recess.

Mr. STANTON. Is that motion in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is.
